HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXXXIII.—JUNE, 1861.—VOL. XXIII.

I.—THE ASSOCIATION.

A VERY serious duty devolves upon me. If I were going to write a history of past ages there would be no difficulty about it. I could invent heroic characters to suit the public taste. Nothing is easier than to describe things that happened a thousand years ago, or never happened at all. There is but little danger of going wrong; and if you do, what difference does it make to the mass of mankind?

Entirely different is the task of the historiographer who writes not only of his own times, but of his own friends and associates. The simple truth will not shield him from the shafts of criticism; for no two persons see the same things with the same eyes, any more than they masticate their food with the same mouth, or take a pinch of snuff with the same nose. In my case the position is peculiarly embarrassing. I have to speak of events the most remarkable in the very face of numerous living witnesses; to describe scenes the most extraordinary without the slightest approach to exuberance of fancy; to paint portraits of distinguished characters that will be true to nature and satisfactory to the originals: in short, to be entertaining without offense, and complimentary without flattery. The sword of Damocles hangs over me. I can only hope that it will not fall until after the next election of Historiographer by the gentlemen of the "Coast Range Association."

I never could tell exactly why they selected me for this duty. Of late years my business has been to examine public depositories, and ascertain the amount of money left in them by the officers in charge. A considerable portion of my practice has been in the examination of vouchers for disbursements. What connection that is supposed to have with a record of facts I am at a loss to determine. My friend, Captain Toby, who has been a member of the Association for the past six years, says they make it a practice to select for this position persons of unusually idle habits and lazy disposition, on the ground that such worthless fellows must have ample time to do justice to the subject; as the Government appoints vagrant politicians to handle the public funds, because it affords them an opportunity of being honest—a species of penance devised originally by the burghers of Schilda, who, when they wanted to put a lobster to death, cast him into the water in order to drown him.

The "Coast Rangers" are not, as may be supposed, a formidable body of armed men, like the famous Rangers of Texas, whose business it was to scour the country and protect the settlers from the attacks of hostile Indians. We profess, on the contrary, to be eminently peaceful. The destruction of quails and rabbits is sufficient, generally, to satisfy our most sanguinary propensities; though there are some among us who are ambitious enough to aspire to deer, elk, and grizzly bears. If we now and then take a pop at an Indian, it is only in the way of practice, and not from any unfriendly feeling toward that race. In the course of our travels we take a very extensive range of country, but make it a point to avoid all dangers not necessarily embraced within the limits of our researches, which, for the most part, are of a literary and scientific character.

The city of San Francisco is our usual place of residence. Of course we claim the privilege, under the Constitution, of residing where we please; hence some of us build handsome villas across the bay, by which means we enjoy the summer breeze on both sides. During the principal part of the year we are engaged in the various pursuits of literature, art, science, agriculture, commerce, law, and the contemplation of the heavenly bodies. Our distinguished president belongs to the bench—a position to which he does great credit. Although profoundly versed in the intricacies of the judiciary, he is by no means ignorant of music and polite literature. He has a fine eye for scenery, and generally a good appetite after a long day's journey. On every subject he is thoroughly genial and entertaining; abounding in conversational resources, always in a pleasant humor, and ever ready to contribute to the happiness of others. Long life to his Honor the Judge! There are few better men in this world—certainly few who could not be better spared.

The bar is also honorably represented in our Association. We have among us several very respectable lawyers, in whose general good conduct we take considerable pride. Not one of them has ever been known to appropriate the blankets, saddle, bridle, spurs, or boots of any other member to his own use; and I do not hesitate to say that, in any case not involving an additional title to my property in Oakland, I would as soon trust in the honor of any of these gentlemen as in that of any other class, not excepting Collectors of Customs, Members of Congress, and Senators of the United States.

The only physician attached to our party is our cook, one Dr. CAMPBELL, a very worthy personage of African descent. In the art of preparing prescriptions of fish-chowder, broiled steaks, slap-jacks, and puddings, I defy any medical man in existence to compete with Doctor Campbell. The great beauty of his system is that he invariably cures every body, and has never been known to charge an extravagant price for writing illegible Latin. His pills of chopped venison, mashed potatoes, and onions, rolled in the gravy, and covered with a nicely-browned coating of flour, are the very best dinner pills ever invented. I have known them to bring men to life who could not possibly have existed for fifteen minutes longer without perishing of hunger. Apart from the color of his skin—which must have been very nearly black originally, but which, by long accumulations of grease, smoke, and soot, aided by exposure to the weather, has become somewhat piebald—the Doctor is not, strictly speaking, a handsome man; nor is his costume calculated to improve the general effect of his figure. The great importance of the art which he professes, and in which his soul is wrapped, has given something of a grave cast to his features, naturally not very symmetrical; and constant stooping over pots, pans, and kettles, together with a chronic “rheumatiz,” so stiffened his joints, that there is but one left of which he can make any particular use, and that is at the extremity of his back-bone. The Doctor is also afflicted with a “misery in the head,” the exact nature of which I have never been able to ascertain. It may be constitutional, or the effects of accident—probably a confusion of the brain, caused by some brilliant idea that struck him in early youth on the subject of his great future Mission in the culinary line. Every morning when he gets up he is only “tolerable, thank God!” The “rheumatiz” troubles his bones, and the “misery” is in his head; but when he gets the fire under full headway, and the pots, pans, and kettles bubbling, fizzing, and steaming, a trifling dose from the blue keg sets him all right; the “rheumatiz” and the “misery” are forgotten; a genial smile irradiates his countenance, his dusky skin glistens, and he hobbles around from pot to kettle, and from kettle to frying-pan, stirring up the savory messes, mumbling quaint anecdotes, or humming over the plantation melodies of his early youth, in a manner highly instructive and entertaining. By-and-by all is ready except a pot of refractory potatoes that will not get done. The Doctor stirs them, rakes the coals under them, piles on another stick or two of wood, gives them another stir, and then, in a voice of gravity becoming the importance of the occasion, informs the gentlemen of the Association that "De taters is biled, gemmen!"

Next to the cook, in proper order, comes his chief patron, Mr. TOM FRY, another distinguished member of our Association.

If it were my fortune to possess an imaginative turn of mind, I would paint my friend Tom in an allegorical scene of great beauty and originality. The principal object in the fore-ground would be a large mince-pie, in the midst of which a round and jolly figure would be seated in the act of devouring his way out of the crust. That figure would be Tom. In the distance I would paint a beautiful sugar-loaf mountain, with rivers of Champagne running along its base. At one side would be a glimpse of the sea, with an oyster-boat stranded on the shore, and six men in red shirts turning over a tremendous green turtle by means of hand-spikes and beams of timber. I would make groves of trees in the middle ground, bearing, instead of fruit, the most beautiful roast turkeys imaginable, with here and there little pigs running about in the old fashion crying out for somebody to come and eat them. I would make the sky mackerel, and the sun broiling hot; and if I put a moon in some obscure part of the heavens to give effect to the scene, it would be an exact representation of a green cheese. I would then paint the goddess Hebe, with a face resembling a blazing fritter, in the act of approaching Tom and offering him a large punch-bowl full of mulled wine, while the Genius of Hunger would sit howling on the peak of a high rock in the distance. The picture would be at once original and striking; but then it would require extraordinary artistic powers to do it justice.

I can only introduce Tom as he is—the simplest and most genial of good fellows, loving all human kind, and free and jovial as the morning sunshine. Yet withal, Tom has his troubles in life as well as the happiest of us. While it is the lot of some to suffer from actual want, others are afflicted with imaginary grievances. By a kind dispensation of Providence an equalizing principle prevails in all nature. Nobody is allowed to be perfectly satisfied in this world. The besetting trouble of Tom's life is the want of something to eat. In the midst of plenty he is afflicted with a chronic starvation. It is a constant struggle with him to appease the cravings of a peculiar and insatiable appetite. He can never enjoy to the full extent the good things that fortune has spread before him because of that terrible vision of Hunger which sits howling in the distance. But he has glimpses of happiness such as few of us can enjoy. Breakfast is the illuminating orb to which he turns with a grateful heart in the morning; lunch is the meridian of glory to which he aspires after breakfast; and dinner the grand ultimatum of existence at which he hopes to arrive after lunch. Meet him of a fine morning, when the birds are singing in the trees and the jasmine sheds its odors upon the balmy air, and he is absolutely inspired. He snuffs the air; it is redolent of the flesh-pots of Egypt. "What a morning," he exclaims enthusiastically, "for grouse or mushrooms!" Comment upon the pastoral beauties of the scene, and he espies a fat cow. "Gad," says he, "there's a fine cow! What sirloin steaks she would make!" and forthwith he resolves to ascertain whether she is designed for the shambles. By-the-way, do you know how to cook a steak? Whereupon you are button-holed a good hour on the prevailing erroneous methods of cooking steak, and half an hour more on the true method. Beef reminds him of mutton. From mutton he rises into the tenderness of lamb. Did you ever read Lamb?—a glorious fellow; understood thoroughly how to cook a pig. And with tears in his eyes Tom quotes the gentle Elia—crisp, tawny, well-watched, not over-roasted—overcoming the coy, brittle resistance—the adhesive oleaginous, oh call it not fat, but the tender blossoming of fat! "A splendid fellow, Lamb. Why, Sir, there is nothing like it in English literature; not even the 240 Ways of Cooking a Rabbit, by an English Epicure. Did you ever read it? No? Then buy it by all means. There are some good things in it."

Tom is a traveler. Though always at home in the metaphysics of lobster sauce, he makes occasional excursions into the broad fields of deviled kidney. While Captain Cook, Sir John Simpson, Bayard Taylor, and other ambitious travelers, have contented themselves by putting a girdle round about the earth, Tom has made life-long and hazardous explorations from the cupboard to the kitchen, from the hen-yard to the frying-pan, from the cooking-stove to the table. Others, at the close of day, wrap the drapey of their couch around them and lie down to pleasant dreams. Not so Tom. More indefatigable than the midnight astronomer, who peers at the stars through monster telescopes, he rises in the dead of night, drags forth his pocket-stove, strikes a light and cooks a snipe.

In camp he is the best of companions—ever jolly in the midst of afflictions. It is a greater pleasure to see him starve on rounds of venison, baked deer's heads, ribs of elk, and marrowed toast, than to see other men feed. He luxuriates in the dirt, smoke, and savory odor of camp. His face beams with good-nature and grease; his voice assumes an oleaginous unction; he is prolific in anecdotes of by-gone dinners, and swells with a surplus of genial humanity and broiled venison. Long life to Tom Fry! Surely he will never stop living while his appetite lasts. On the sad day when it may please Providence to knock him into pie, he will at least be rid of one affliction—never more suffer from hunger or thirst. Should it be his misfortune to fall into evil hands, poor fellow, which all the saints forbid! I trust he may be properly done up in batter, with a sprinkling of nutmeg. If he should be called for at an untimely hour, it will certainly be by the ghost of a fat capon.

PHIL WILKINS.

As many incomprehensible things happen in the course of our annual expeditions, it has become necessary to enlist in the service a gentleman of a metaphysical turn of mind—one Mr. PHIL WILKINS, who is a famous hand at abstruse questions. I think his brain must be constructed somewhat in the fashion of a cobweb, it possesses such an extraordinary faculty for catching at the various troublesome problems that buzz around the circle of humanity. Combined with this trait, his propensity for argument is perfectly incorrigible; and, indeed, now while I write, I am haunted by a fear that he will suddenly appear before me, and not only dispute every word I say, but prove that words are merely arbitrary signs, possessing intrinsically no more meaning than sticks and stones. It is a favorite theory of his, that, if it were not for the sake of commerce, we might as well talk to one another by means of punches and blows as by oral or written signs—a fact which I am not at all prepared to dispute. I have no doubt that, upon entering the world, Mr. Phil Wilkins must have questioned the right of mankind to propagate the human species; and that, being unable to obtain a satisfactory solution of his proposition, he set to work and devoted his infancy to the grand question of sleep. When he woke up, in the due course of years, it is supposed that he astonished and confounded his nurse by demanding to be informed—"What, after all, is sleep?" For the last thirty years of his life he has given himself completely up to logical analysis. He considers the mysteries of nature and creation generally in a philosophical point of view. When he has arrived at that point, however, various others present themselves, like the points of the Rocky Mountains, dim in the distance, and upon each he becomes lost in a fog of argument. He arrives at a conclusion that there is considerable doubt whether there is such a thing as a conclusion, and concludes not to conclude, but to argue the point in a different aspect, and show that, after all, points are no points. When men of this genius, as Sir Richard Steele observes, "are pretty far gone in learning, they will put you to prove that snow is white, and when you are upon that topic can say that there is really no such thing as color in nature." And what is Nature? Upon that point there has been a great diversity of opinions from the days of Plato and Aristotle down to the days of our excellent friend Phil Wilkins; but he is learned in them all, and can take all sides of the question, and defeat his opponent upon any. He was never yet known to be convinced. Truth will not convince him, for therein arises a question to his speculative mind as to the exact nature of truth. Is it Perfection, or is it the fountain of Perfection? Is it the negative of Error, or is it the positive of Actuality? All these matters must be duly weighed and considered; and he will weigh and consider them all night long—destroying your rest, filling your brain with dreadful difficulties which you never can get over, answering the most timid suggestion by a flood of argument on the opposite side, and maintaining what you dare not dispute with all the tenacity of an advocate at law. When you avow that you are convinced, and beg for quarter, he turns upon you like Captain Sentry, of the Spectator, and proves to you that you are wrong—that you are not convinced, and can not be convinced, so that there is no resource but to remain silent. Even that will not serve you when our friend Phil is in an ordinarily good vein. He is indefatigable in the pursuit of favorite crotchets, and will never let up while there is a word to be said on either side of the subject. I have often been tempted to end the matter by an appeal to Club Law; but what can one do with such a fellow as Phil? Over all the quirks and quibbles of his composition stature has cast such a gauze-work of genial humanity that he wins our hearts with affection while he puzzles our brains with metaphysics.

I now come, by an easy and gradual transition, to the chief ornament of our society, familiarly known throughout the Coast Range as "THE GENERAL." To know him is to love him. At least the ladies think so; for the General is the very handsomest man in the whole party, not excepting the writer, whose highest claim is to be considered the next best-looking. Indeed, with the exception of the State Gauger, who is admitted on all hands to be the most portly and commanding gentleman in the State, in point of personal beauty I know of no person in the entire range of my acquaintance who can compare favorably with the General. His form is of magnificent proportions, with just a sufficient tendency to corpulency to give it a splendid effect in the distance. His features are finely rounded; the expression of his eye is at once genial and fascinating. No lady, possessing the slightest claims to a heart, was ever subjected to the magic influence of the General's eye without immediately admitting that further resistance would be useless. But his admiration is of too diffusive a character ever to result in matrimony. The number of hearts that he has broken is perfectly incredible; and the only excuse I can make for him in this respect is that he does it undesignedly. It is purely the result of a constitutional admiration for the sex, which he can no more resist than less favored gentlemen can avoid being ugly and unattractive.

To see the General in his magnificent hunting costume of tanned deer-skin; to hear him sing in his grand bravura style the inspiring song of the "Little Black Elephant that came down from the top of the Mountings;" to stand upon a projecting rock and gaze upon that manly form as he buffets the surf amidst shoals of seal and porpoises; to sit by the crackling camp-fire, and hear him discourse of female beauty and all the charms of the tender sex; to shake that honest hand of his after a week's absence, and bask for a while in the broad sunshine of his presence, these are among the things never to be forgotten. What if years have the General carries in his heart an inexhaustible fountain of youth, from which there is ever a genial flow. The head may have become destitute of vegetation as the summit of Mount Etna, but its very barrenness is evidence of the volcanic fires that burn within. The parched declivities of the cranium tell of the generous warmth of the man. I hold that the crowning glory of humanity is a bare crown; and I am the more tenacious of this opinion since my own has begun to make its appearance in public.

"Stamped with their signet that ingenuous brow, And mellowed the music of his eloquence,"

Without the General, we could no more perform those extraordinary exploits in the mountains, which have given us such an enviable reputation throughout the State, than without our right arms.

THE GENERAL.

Not that he is any great hand at the rifle or shot-gun, for I never heard of any living animal that suffered the least injury from being shot at by him; nor because he climbs higher mountains, or jumps over wider creeks, or carries more wood upon his back, or runs away any faster when a grizzly bear appears in camp than the rest of us; but because he is the very best soul that ever lived—because we naturally like him, and can not help it. If he were in the slightest degree different from what he is, he would not be “the General;” and without him, we might as well undertake to spend a month of midnights agreeably at the North Pole as to make an expedition in the Coast Range with any prospect of pleasure.

By common consent CAPTAIN TOBY has been appointed guide and caterer to the Association—a position for which he is considered eminently fitted by nature and long experience in mountaineering. A better selection could not have been made. The Captain is a wild Irishman by birth, and an Indian by instinct. His home is in the saddle, his bedroom under the trees. For houses of all sorts he has an innate aversion. He considers cities a great waste of valuable hunting-ground; and looks upon crowds of well-dressed men as a very dreary spectacle, without any well-defined object.

He can not conceive what sense there is in burrowing among bricks and piles of merchandise, when there is so much more room outside in the open country where one can breathe the fresh air.

I say the Captain is eminently qualified by nature to be a guide. In making that assertion I do not mean to intimate that he was ever known to find the right trail, or to avoid losing himself and the entire party committed to his charge before the expiration of each day's travel. The special quality in which he excels is in the art of persuading every body that he is familiar with every stick and stone on the route, and within an extensive circuit of country; in fact, that he was the original discoverer of the particular range in question, and knows it better than he knows his own face when he stands in front of a looking-glass. On this mountain he has killed a large she-bear, with four cubs; on that, a remarkably fine buck; in this cañon he has been chased by a band of hostile Indians, and only escaped by stopping suddenly and singing the famous pig-song, consisting of a whistle and a grunt; in that cañon he has captured a live grizzly single-handed, by making him drunk with sugar and whisky, to which grizzlies are notoriously addicted: in short, no matter how the facts may be against him, Captain Toby is never known to be at fault. I even knew him on one occasion, when a member of the party produced a pocket-compass to prove that we were traveling east instead of west, make good his position by asserting that there were four points of variation; and when that was shown to be insufficient, he clearly demonstrated that the point of north was erroneously marked on the compass, and that it should be substituted by the point of south.

Besides these high qualifications, so useful in the development of new regions, and so well calculated to result in perilous adventures, Captain Toby possesses a wonderful flow of good-humor, and an inexhaustible fund of anecdote, aided by an imagination the most marvelous in its capacity. The camp is his home, and the whole party are his guests. He is continually saddling or unsaddling horses for inexperienced members of the Society, piling up wood on the fire, wiping out rifles, frying or broiling choice scraps of venison, digging holes in the ground for deer's heads, detailing some extraordinary adventure, or singing the famous pig-song, with the whistle and the grunt.

Captain Toby, although not much given to literary pursuits, became satisfied, during some of his solitary expeditions, that the English language is very imperfect in its construction; so much so that he has composed a new grammar, which is very popular in camp, as "Toby's Improved English Speaker." The principal object in view is to remodel the arbitrary system of moods, tenses, and numbers, somewhat on the Cobbett principle, but to a much more alarming extent. He has also composed an "Improved Method of Swearing," by means of which many of those vulgar oaths so frequently used by the citizens of California in common conversation may be dispensed with; as, for example, instead of using the name of the Creator, he proposes to swear "By the mystic moonbeam's struggling light! By the banks of the blue Moselle! By the margin of fair Zurich's waters! a ha! ha! e-you!" Or for brief oaths, to be used on occasions of no pressing importance, he suggests—"Buy a broom!" or "By-the-by!" which, by means of fierce looks and strong emphasis, may be made sufficiently forcible for ordinary purposes.

But the predominating talent of the Captain is his wonderful capacity for finding bad trails. If there is an impracticable mountain within ten miles of the direct route, or a cañon out of which no white man was ever before known to make his exit on mule-back, Toby is sure to find it, and end the labors of the day by getting the whole party involved in a complication of difficulties for which there seems to be no earthly remedy. For rocky and precipitous trails he has an absolute passion, amounting almost to a mania. He generally rides down-hill at a full gallop, and when that is impracticable, compels his animal to slide or make "buck jumps" over the worst places, apparently with no other motive than that of trying how near he can come to killing his mule or breaking his own neck without actually doing it. If there be a trail covered over with the trunks of large trees, or winding through an extensive region of chaparral, he will spend a week trying to find it, in order that he may enjoy the luxury of being thoroughly jarred and scarified, and seeing every body else in the same predicament. Not that he subjects his friends to these trying ordeals from any malicious spirit, or any desire to enjoy himself at their expense. On the contrary, the marvel of the thing is, that he always imagines he is doing them the greatest possible kindness, and seems distressed and mortified when they complain. His good-nature is particularly manifest on the point of hills and distances. To oblige a tired man he will make a mole-hill out of the most formidable mountain, and assert in the most positive manner that it is only three miles to the camping-ground when it is at least ten. If the day's travel happens to be unusually rough, he calls the trail "a little gulchy," but promises that it will be "all easy work to-morrow." For those who "give out," and protest they can not go an inch farther, he carries an infallible remedy in the interior of a large pewter flask which usually hangs from his saddle. What it is I am entirely unable to say, but it always has the desired effect. He calls it "nourishment," and says it is "good for man or beast."

His hunting stories are of a kind well calculated to interest the inexperienced members of our Association. Many of his adventures are wonderful—some absolutely improbable. With all respect for Captain Toby, and great confidence in his general veracity, I never could force myself to accept without some allowance his adventure with the California hare, or, as it is vulgarly called, the "jackass rabbit." I have seen several very large hares in the San Joaquin Valley, but none large enough to kick a man over, as the Captain professes to have been kicked on one occasion. To speak frankly, I do not believe it, though it may be true; for I remember some years ago I shot at one in mistake for an antelope, but having the misfortune to be a little near-sighted, I discovered upon going up to the spot that it was neither an antelope nor a hare, but one of the settler's hogs, for which I was subsequently damaged to the extent of five dollars.

The Captain professes, in another favorite story, to have killed a deer without ever shooting at it. There were three together. He crept upon them so stealthily that they were not aware of his approach until he was within a few feet, when they all bounded off at random. One tripped against a projecting branch of a tree, fell down unexpectedly, and dislocated his neck; upon which the Captain immediately seized him and cut his throat to let the blood flow. Possibly this too may have happened, though I have my doubts on the subject. Deer are not apt to allow sporting gentlemen with rifles to approach within ten feet of them, and then break their necks attempting to jump out of their way. The does with young fawns are exceedingly wary, and their sagacity in concealing their offspring is one of the most beautiful traits of maternal instinct.

CALIFORNIA RABBIT.

I would fain, before closing this imperfect sketch of our Association, give some account of our esteemed friend COLONEL JACK—"the noblest Roman of them all." Yet what can I say of him in the brief space of a few pages that will convey an adequate idea of his remarkable history and character? If we were only in camp, gentle reader, where it is not the fashion to be accurate in phraseology or historical details, I would take you kindly by the arm, lead you aside under the shade of a wide-spreading tree by the side of a sparkling brook, invite you to a seat on the green sward with a roll of blankets to lean against, hand you a genuine meerschaum filled with the best Turkish tobacco, and tell you to puff away quietly and cozily, and listen to the story of a strange and eventful life. When your eyes were half-closed, and a genial glow suffused your amiable features—when the follies, vexations, and trickeries of the busy multitude had vanished from your mind, and something of the simplicity and freshness of early youth had stolen back again into your heart—when you felt that there was nothing in the world half so fascinating as camp-life, and were overflowing with affection for all your friends—I would tell you of the beautiful prairies of Texas and the blue seas of clover between the Nueces and the Rio Grande; of the Mottes, or woody islands, that loom up in the distance; of the wild spring flowers, and the balmy and odorous atmosphere that never was equaled in any other country; of the wild mustangs that prance along the horizon, occasionally charging up toward you, and sweeping off again till they are lost to the eye; of the deer and the antelope that course over these broad seas of flowers, and the flocks of wild turkeys that range along the water-courses—all these I would endeavor to picture to your mind, so that you might understand the fascination of frontier life in Texas. I would then tell you of the Mexican invasions, and the fierce and bloody contests of the Texans in defense of their country; of the struggles of the settlers with the wild hordes of savage Comanches and Lipans who roamed over these beautiful prairies; of the white women that were carried into captivity and cruelly treated; of the children that were snatched from the door-steps of the cabins, and never heard of again, or only after the lapse of years; of the midnight massacres that struck a gloom into the minds of men, and all the horrors of Indian warfare. And then, in the midst of these scenes of suffering and distress, how a young stranger of gentle manners, but firm and determined aspect, came among the people with his rifle and powder-flask and joined in their defense. I would follow that youth, for there is a fascination in his presence, and point him out to you as he stands with unblenched features and eagle eye in the midst of dangers; often separated from his comrades for days, and compelled to fight his way alone through bands of savage Comanches; always foremost wherever death seemed inevitable, yet of a happy and cheerful disposition, placing a fair estimate upon the value of life, and determined to make the most of it. I would tell of the strong and daring spirits that instinctively gathered around him; how he was chosen leader of a company whose career on the borders of Texas for many years has rarely been paralleled in the annals of frontier life for deeds of chivalrous and romantic daring. In a country where such qualities are by no means rare, it was wonderful how devotedly these men clung to their leader, and what a pride they felt in his growing fame; for soon his exploits were the theme of every tongue, and the whole country echoed with his praises. Amidst all, from first to last, he was brave, gentle, and true; devoted to his friends; every where beloved, yet shrinking from all demonstrations of applause with a timidity almost feminine; seeking no reward save to render some service to a suffering people. In the Mexican invasions he acquired new laurels; and years after, when the war between the United States and Mexico broke out, he rendered distinguished service to his country. Since that period he has occupied several high positions of honor and trust.

This is the man whose history I would give you, gentle reader—one whose like is seldom found in this world. As he sits yonder by the fire cooking a rabbit, you would never take him for a hero. He is the very plainest and most unsophisticated of mortals—is actually unconscious of the difference between a great man and a common man, treats all with equal simplicity and kindness, and likes the whole world so well that he is constantly trying to do somebody a service. I have no doubt you and I will enjoy the benefit of that rabbit. He would give you an entire ox if he had one cooked, and then seem mortified that it was not an elephant or a whale. The only thing of which he is at all chary is any account of his past adventures. It takes time and skill to draw him out, and then no man can be more entertaining. To sit by the crackling camp-fire of a pleasant night and hear Colonel Jack talk of old times in Texas, the hunts and camp-scenes, the Comanches, the wild buffalo, the Mexicans at the Alamo, the massacre of Fannin's party, and all those thrilling events in Texan history, is worth a trip to California. There is such an overflow of genial simplicity about him, such an unconscious power of winning your sympathies and respect, such an entire absence of egotism, and so much that is true, generous, and reliable in his whole nature and character, that you are completely charmed.

It is refreshing to find a man in the full enjoyment of a national reputation who can afford to be perfectly natural and unsophisticated; a genuine hero, modest to the verge of bashfulness, yet brave and steadfast as a true gentleman and a hero should be.

The Colonel, although a skillful hand with the rifle, is not an adept in the ordinary affairs of the world. He has recently purchased a ranch, about five miles from the village of O—, and moved out there with his family. I am told that the removal was very characteristic. They had been living for some time with Captain Johnny, an old Texas friend. When the time arrived to send out the furniture, which was scattered about the house in common, the Colonel said he would help; so he pulled off his coat, told the Mrs. Colonel not to worry herself, "pitched in" like a man, ransacked all the premises looking for things, seized and started off with his pipe and a box of tobacco, then got hold of the wrong bedsteads and tables, put them down again, then hurried off to the village, distant about half a mile, and brought six wagons to the door without previous notice and before any thing was ready; after which he took a glass of whisky, and wondered where the mischief his pipe was. Meantime the Mrs. Colonel was sorely troubled about parting with her friends, which the Colonel perceiving, he jumped up and said: "Now don't fret yourself; it'll be all right; just leave it all to me, and I'll 'tend to every thing;" with which he seized several chairs (Mrs. Captain Johnny's among others) and ran out of doors with them on his back, the ladies calling to him not to put them in the wagons. Puzzled and confounded at the caprices of woman, but ever ready to obey orders of the fair sex, he ran back again with the chairs, the sweat streaming from his face; then tried to pull a bedstead to pieces, and failing in that, picked up his rifle, wrapped it carefully in a blanket which did not belong to him, put it in an empty wagon, told the driver to be off to the ranch and hurry back as fast as possible, after which he returned into the house and discovered his meerschaum on the mantle-piece. This he recognized at once, and forthwith carried it out and sent it off in another wagon. Having thus rendered all the assistance in his power, he whistled for the dogs, took his shot-gun, mounted old Charley, and rode out full tilt to the ranch. When he arrived there he was determined to make the house comfortable, and with that view gathered a tremendous pile of brush and shavings, built a big fire in the kitchen, so that the Mrs. Colonel could warm herself and the children when she came out, and then started up a neighboring cañon to kill some rabbits for supper. Fortunately, about the time the house was catching fire, one of the wagoners discovered and suppressed the flames. In due time the furniture arrived, and with it the family. Colonel Jack cooked supper; fried, broiled, and stewed the rabbits in a manner perfectly inspiring; made the coffee and baked the bread; and after every body was surfeited with the good things he had prepared, nothing would serve him but to spread the beds before the fire, and "all hands camp right there!" For the next three or four days he enjoyed this new species of camp-life so much that he was constantly begging the Mrs. Colonel not to put up the bedsteads or spread the carpets; but woman's will is omnipotent, and the Colonel finally had to give in and suffer his camp to be broken up. It was presently discovered that the rifle and meerschaum, and most of the other articles essential to housekeeping, were all right, except the looking-glass. The Colonel thought he would send for it, and he did so; but owing to the indefinite nature of his instructions the wagon-man got hold of Mrs. Captain Johnny's large parlor mirror, which had just been handsomely gilded, and nobody being at home, carried it out to the ranch, wondering why the Colonel did not send some blankets to keep it from being rubbed. The Mrs. Colonel, of course, was exceedingly vexed and distressed; which so incensed the Colonel at the man's stupidity that he started out to swear at him, but as soon as he saw that the poor fellow looked troubled about the mistake, he came back saying: "Oh, there's no harm done; the poor fellow didn't know any better. We can send it back again!"

After the destruction of his camp the Colonel commenced operations on his ranch. His first great work was to exterminate the gophers in the orchard. The way he did this was to pour a bucket of water into their holes, and then stamp it down with the heel of his boot, since which summary process he says the trees are growing wonderfully, and expresses the hope that next summer he will have fruit enough for all his friends; but "they musn't wait on that account, but come any how: they will always be welcome!"

I will now endeavor to furnish some general idea of the region of country from which our distinguished Association derives its name. Without undertaking a topographical description of California, I may say, in general terms, that the Sierra Nevada is the principal range of mountains bordering the State to the eastward, on the slopes of which are the great mining placers which furnish occupation and wealth to a large and enterprising population. On the western slope are situated the gold placers, and on the eastern the wonderful silver mines of Washoe, which I have endeavored to describe in former articles. Lying between the foot-hills and the mountains of lesser altitude bordering on the coast, are the great valleys of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin, extending nearly north and south a distance of some six hundred miles, and varying in width from sixty to a hundred miles. Between these extensive valleys, which in many places have the appearance of immense plains, and the shores of the Pacific, is a mountainous region of nearly the same width, of irregular conformation, abounding in smaller valleys, and comprising the principal grazing and agricultural territory of the State, designated as the Coast Range. This in reality consists of two nearly parallel ranges, occasionally united or separated only by cañons. In the counties of San Diego and Los Angeles to the southward, and Siskiyou and Del Norte to the northward, the distinction between the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range becomes less manifest—a considerable portion of the country being involved in a labyrinth of mountains of various altitudes, which appear to have become lost and scattered in an attempt to unite upon some fixed point of departure.

The climate of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys is very warm in summer, though seldom oppressive, owing to the dryness of the atmosphere and the relief afforded by the coolness of the nights. In the foot-hills of the Sierra Nevada the thermometer frequently rises to 130° Fahrenheit, where the sun's rays are reflected from the rocks, as in some of the mining gulches; but I have seldom known the heat to produce an injurious effect. These valleys are now nearly covered with fine farms, and produce abundant crops of grain, hay, fruit, and vegetables. The valley of the San Joaquin is not so rich as that of the Sacramento; but along the water-courses and in the vicinity of Stockton, Visalia, and Tule River, are some of the best lands in the State.

In 1849 bands of mustang, or wild horses, roamed over the greater part of this extensive region. The native Californians were in the habit of catching them occasionally by means of corrals and lassoes, but the number did not diminish much until the settlement of the country by the Americans. Horses then became valuable, and the mustang hunters made a good business of it, corralling as many as five hundred in a day. They constructed lines of willow fencing five or six miles in length, converging into a coral, or pocket of stout pickets, into which they drove the wild horses, and secured them by means of lassoes. The remains of these fences are still visible in the vicinity of the great Lagoon, and the bones of thousands of the poor animals that died of thirst during the chase still lie bleaching upon the plains.

Elk and antelope were also numerous, and even now bands of them still roam in the vicinity of the Tulare lakes. The quantity of geese and ducks that frequent the lake region is perfectly incredible. I have seen the plains covered for miles with flocks of geese, and the Tule lagoons literally black with ducks. The few bands of Indians who have been permitted to remain in this vicinity subsist, during a considerable portion of the year, on the wild-fowl, which they catch by means of nets and snares; and if let alone by white men would be enabled to enjoy an easy existence. The settlers, however, are rapidly killing them off. In a few years more there will be none left.

A marked change is perceptible in the climate upon leaving the large basin of the interior and striking into the Coast Range. The air becomes deliciously cool and bracing. The country is better wooded, and has a less parched appearance. Many of the small valleys retain their verdure during the greater part of the year, and numerous streams of deliciously pure water course through the various cañons and ravines. In the northern part of the State the coast-hills are covered, for the most part, with magnificent forests of pine, cedar, and red-wood, interspersed with patches of open country. To the southward there is less timber; but this deficiency is compensated by the extraordinary beauty of the country and fertility of the soil. All those portions not under cultivation are covered with luxuriant crops of wild oats, presenting in early spring the appearance of a robe of velvet, and at a later period that of a golden mantle. In the immediate vicinity of the sea the air is occasionally too bracing for actual comfort, but back a little no climate in the world can compare with that of the Coast Range. It is at once soft, balmy, and invigorating—never too warm, and seldom cool enough even in mid-winter to produce ice in the valleys. Where there is some protection against the ocean breeze tropical plants will flourish luxuriantly. To the southward of Point Conception oranges, figs, citrons, almonds, olives, and other productions of a similar character, arrive at a high degree of perfection; and most of these will, with a little care, grow as far north as Cape Mendocino.

Commencing at San Diego, a series of valleys of greater or less extent, lying within the limits of the Coast Range, may be traced all the way to the Oregon line. The best and most eligibly situated were originally selected by the Jesuits for the uses of the Missions; and it is a striking feature, in traveling from one Mission to another, with what consummate judgment the sites were chosen. All these magnificent ranches, in former years covered with innumerable herds of cattle, have now fallen into private hands, and form the nucleus of smaller ranches and thriving farms. Within the last two or three years nearly every valley of any considerable extent, north of Monterey, has been fenced in and reduced to cultivation. The southern counties have not enjoyed so rapid an increase of population, nor has agriculture advanced in the same ratio; most of the available lands consisting of large grants made by the Mexican Government for military services, and still retained by the original grantees, who, either from pride or principle, make it a point to hold on to them as long as they can. The costs of litigation, however, and the superior energy and sagacity of the incoming population, are gradually absorbing these princely estates; and it will be but a few years more before they are all cut up into prosperous farming districts. Of the many fine valleys in the southern part of the State the principal are—Wetherby's Ranch, San Pasqual, San Ysabel, San Luis Rey, Warner's Ranch, and Tamecula; the beautiful valley of San Bernardino; Los Angeles, San Fernando, Santa Clara, Santa Barbara; and over the pass of the Garrote to San Ynez; the valley of the Purissimo; a series of fine ranches extending through the county of San Luis Obispo; Santa Marguerita, San Miguel, and the Salinas Plains; thence, as you travel north, the vicinity of Monterey and the Paphero—one of the richest and most beautiful agricultural districts in California—the valleys of San Juan, San José, Santa Clara, Alameda, Martinez, and San Ramon, which brings you to the region of the Bay of San Francisco.

To travel through this magnificent country, on horse or mule back, in the spring of the year, in company with a few chosen friends, and without any encumbrance beyond a pack-mule, a rifle, and a few pounds of coffee, sugar, bacon, and bread, is a luxury to be remembered in after-life. The whole face of the country is covered with flowers of the richest hue, and scattered with the most bountiful profusion over hill and valley. The air is fragrant with the scent of wild roses, honey-suckle, and ceonosa. Every stream that gushes from the hill-sides is bordered with green shrubbery; and beds of clover and wild oats invite the traveler to rest at every turn of the trail. Now and then a deer bounds from some neighboring thicket, and stands a moment with antlers erect, gazing at the intruders, then off up the mountain-sides like a dart from the bow. Smaller game, such as rabbits, pheasants, quail, etc., abound in extraordinary numbers, and furnish a livelihood to many hunters who supply the markets of San Francisco.

Continuing thence in a northwardly direction, you strike the splendid valleys of Petaluma and Santa Rosa, Napa and Sonoma, Knight's Valley, Russian River, Yulia, Bechtel's or Little Lake Valley, Long Valley, Round Valley, and so on through a wilder region to Weaver-ville near the Oregon line. The valleys of Napa, Sonoma, Petaluma, and Santa Rosa are now thickly settled by an industrious and thriving population of farmers. Fruit orchards are attached to every farm; the cottages are neat and comfortable, and the country presents quite the appearance of an agricultural region in some of the older States, except that there is no such climate or soil on the Atlantic side.

It is beyond dispute, take it altogether, that California is the most desirable country on the face of the earth to live in. The soil is the richest, the climate the most genial, the people are the most independent, the mountains are the highest, and the rivers are the— Well, no, I admit that the rivers are not so long and so deep as the Mississippi; but then they are a great deal muddier, and the mud has a great deal more gold in it. At all events, it is good enough a country for us, the members of the Coast Range Association; and we hereby respectfully invite all sensible people to come and settle here.

If the reader will now be kind enough to suppose that we have all started out on a hunting expedition, duly equipped and provided with horses, mules, blankets, rifles, shot-guns, pack-animals, provisions, vinegar, etc., headed by our guide and interpreter, Captain Toby, who knows every foot of the way; that we have debarked from the Petaluma steamer, camped our way through Santa Rosa, Russian River, Yukia Valleys, and all the civilized parts of the country, and in due time reached the grand point of deflexion for the wilderness—the Mendocino Indian reservation, at the mouth of the Noyo River; that we are all pleasantly located there under the big redwood trees, rubbing up our rifles, mending our pack-saddles, sharpening our hunting-knives, getting out our note-books, and enjoying ourselves generally in a satisfactory manner prior to engaging in those extraordinary scenes of peril and adventure to which I am approaching by degrees, I will undertake to give in my next chapter a brief account of the Indians of California, and of the system adopted by our Government for their relief and protection.

RECRIMINATION.

I.

THE prime of summer is coming, and with it there comes, to-day,
 A thought of another summer, whose garlands have faded away:
 The tall laburnums are covered with tresses of yellow flowers,
 As they were when under their shadow you used to loiter for hours;
 And the blackberry's starry blossom, and the buttercup's chalice of gold, Bloom bright in the ancient forest where you loved to wander of old—
 Where you loved to wander at even, but wandered never alone;
 For a manly form was beside you, and a voice of manly tone
 Told ever the olden story; the tale that you know so well,
 You seem to think it the only one it is worth man's while to tell.
 Come, sit you down here and listen; I have many things to say,
 And though I am loth to blame you, yet pity I surely may.

II.

Ay, ay, you wince! I fancy you had rather have blame instead;
 Oh, girl! will you never learn wisdom? I had hoped your pride was dead;
 But no—it will last and flourish so long as vanities live—
 So long as you hunger for worship—so long as your subjects give.
 It was strange that he thought you loved him; it was strange that he never knew
 Your heart, except by the shadow that others mistook for you:

But you went well-masked, and no one, whether you laughed or wept, Knew aught of the secret chamber where your broken relics were kept;
You hid them so very securely the wisest had hardly guessed,
From your light-hearted tone and manner, your outer seeming of rest,
That your heart was a drear Golgotha, where all the ground was white
With the wrecks of joys that had perished—the skeletons of delight!

III.

He loved you; his soul was in earnest; at your dainty feet he poured
The purest and best libation that human hearts can afford:
He dreamed of you morn and even; he cherished the flowers you gave;
And I tell you, though they are withered now, they will go with him to the grave!
But you—how was it?—you met him with marvelous glances and smiles;
You wove your glittering meshes; you compassed him with your wiles;
You sang the songs he had written; you talked in your sweetest voice,
Till he thought his bondage was freedom, and wore your fetters by choice.
Then a great joy flooded his spirit, and the yellow laburnum flowers
Heard wondrous vows and pledges in the dusk of the evening hours;
While there in your heart, close hidden with jealousy watchful care,
Lay that strange Golgotha of passion—that arid waste of despair!

IV.

It is well that I know your story—I know that your first love came,
As of old came Jove to Semele, a splendid and fatal flame:
It left all your heart in ashes—dead ashes, that cooled and lay
A wearisome weight in your bosom, a burden to bear for aye.
Since then you have shown no mercy to any that circle around
The dangerous blaze of your beauty, for you no mercy had found.
'Tis for this I offer you pity, and blame you not, as I should
Had you still a heart that was human, with a human knowledge of good;
But the glass of your life is darkened, and darkly through it you see Distorted and ghastly fragments of duty and destiny.
Yet you still can flirt and trifle, still live in folly and mirth—
Ah, they say that revenge is sweeter than any thing else on earth!

V.

But are there no better moments—better? or are they worse?—
When flattery loses its sweetness, and beauty becomes a curse?
When you come from the world of pleasure, the whirl, and glitter, and glare,
The tattle instead of wisdom, the perfume instead of air;
When the hot-house garlands are withered, and the gray dawn breaks in the east,
And the wine grows stale in the goblets that shone so fair at the feast;
When rouge hides paleness no longer, and folly gives way to thought—
Do love, and life, and emotion still count in your creed for naught?
Do you never gaze in your mirror, when your beauty at daybreak goes,
And pressing your throbbing temples, pray God to give you repose?
Repose! it is tardy in coming; when the bitter chalice is filled,
We must wait till the feverish pulses and the passionate heart are stilled.

VI.

There is one that we know thus waiting—waiting and thinking to-day,
Perchance of the happy summer whose blossoms have faded away:
He walks beneath the laburnums, but not with the hopeful pride
That made his world such an Eden when you walked there by his side.
Oh, love! 'tis a wonderful passion; it makes or it mars us all;
By love men may walk with the angels, by love the angels may fall!
And you—it has changed your nature, it has warped you, heart and soul,
Till you flee, with fierce desperation, the genii you can not control.
What, tears? they are not becoming; let others such weakness show—
The hall is garnished for dancing, the wine and the gaslights glow—
Go, stifle your sobs with laughter, let your eyes, like your heart, be dry,
And pray, when the ball is over, to be forgiven—and die!

GEORGE ARNOLD.

HEAD OF THE GORILLA.

ADVENTURES IN GORILLA LAND.*

TOWARD the close of the year 1846, the Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, now the respected Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, but then a missionary in the Gaboon Region of Western Africa, came into possession, accidentally, of the skull and afterward of the greater part of a skeleton of an ape which he was convinced was not known to naturalists. He forwarded these remains to the Boston Society of Natural History, in whose proceedings they were afterward described by Dr. Savage and Professor Jeffries Wyman.

This was the first notice the scientific world had of the existence, in a part of Africa known to the civilized world for twenty centuries, of an animal the most monstrous and cruel, as it has been since demonstrated to be in its frame the most man-like, of all the beasts of the forest.

Mr. Wilson's discovery, whose importance he modestly underrated, devoting to it only a few lines in his interesting account of Western Africa,† caused naturalists to search old books of travel for any description of such an animal; and a few such traces are indeed found, but all evidently negro exaggerations with the glosses of imaginative writers; no civilized man having up to that period ever seen a live gorilla; only Mr. Wilson was known to have had the good fortune to see its carcass. In 1855 Professor Owen, of London, received from the Gaboon, from an old shipmaster, a cask of rum, in which was contained the spoiled body of a huge gorilla. Only the skeleton proved of use for descriptive purposes, and on this Professor Owen founded a most interesting paper, in which he took pains to collect all the meagre accounts so far gathered from the natives, of the appearance and habits of the animal.

With this memoir the subject rested, to all intents, until in the fall of 1859 the naturalists of this country were at last gratified by the return, with a magnificent collection of stuffed gorillas of all ages, of Mr. Paul B. Du Chaillu, an enterprising American citizen, who had spent four years in a thorough exploration of the region in which alone the gorilla is found, and in hunting that animal, and gaining, with the enthusiasm of an ardent naturalist, the fullest knowledge of the habits and nature of the mysterious beast. We propose to follow Mr. Du Chaillu through a portion of his romantic and adventurous travels, as he has recounted them in the magnificent work he has just published; but must pause at the threshold to give the reader some idea of the region which may with justice be called "Gorilla Land." Turn to a map of Africa, on which are marked the most recent explorations, and you will find a belt, narrow, compared with the length of the continent, but containing a vast area of land, lying between lat. 3° North, and lat. 3° South, and which is left blank from the western coast to Captain Burton's Lake Tanganyika on the east. Barth did not reach it from the north; Livingstone stopped short of it from the south; Burton's adventurous march to the long-sought land of the moon was but a step in the long journey across the continent from the east; and the merchants who had for many years more or less drained this mysterious region of ivory, beeswax, ebony, gold dust, and latterly of India-rubber, were content to live carefully on the coast, not caring to risk the limited commerce himself. As a merchant he became familiar with the languages of many of the tribes who came down to trade. Having studied Natural History in France, he profited by his leisure to make collections of the numerous undescribed species of birds found on this little known coast; and at last, desirous alike of extending his trade, and of investigating the habits of the gorilla, about which he had long been curious, he determined to devote a year to an exploration of the mysterious interior.

His year lasted four years! And in this time, as he modestly sums it up in his preface, he traveled—always on foot, and unaccompanied by other white men—about 8000 miles; shot, stuffed, and brought home over 2000 birds, of which more than 60 are new species, and killed upward of 1000 quadrupeds, of which 200 were stuffed and brought home, with more than 80 skeletons. “Not less than 20 of these quadrupeds are species hitherto unknown to science!” He suffered fifty attacks of the African fever, taking, to cure himself, over fourteen ounces of quinine. Of famine, long-continued exposures to the heavy tropical rains, and attacks of ferocious ants and venomous flies, he thinks it not worth while to speak.

These are achievements of which surely any man not yet thirty may be proud, and which place him high in the an almost certain death by rash ventures into an interior thought to be doubly protected by ferocious negro tribes and fatal fevers. Of these merchants the father of Mr. Du Chaillu was one. The son was familiar with the coast from early boyhood, quitted it to attend school, but returned, and on his father's death entered into list of those adventurous spirits—Livingstone, Barth, Burton, and others, the pioneers of African civilization—to whom, some centuries hence, we may imagine the Empire of Africa gratefully erecting statues.

The tribes of West Africa, according to Mr. Du Chaillu, are pre-eminently traders, and on their eagerness for commerce he based, in part, his hopes of safety in his solitary inroads into the far interior. For he was entirely unattended; and when it is remembered that he did not hesitate to encumber himself on his longest journey with about two thousand dollars' worth of the goods most coveted by the savages among whom he lived for two years, it is not strange that Quengeza, the great king, called him "a man with a heart like tiger's."

"When you go out again, you will make up a party of whites?" the present writer one day suggested to him.

"What for? You know they would all die!" was the quick reply.

"But why did not you die?"

"Because I had not time."

The blacks are the most eager traders in the world; but when we know the manner of their trade, we cease to wonder that an enterprising merchant should attempt to work without agents of such double-dyed Jewry. In the first place, all trade is a monopoly. Many of the products are brought from a distance of three or four hundred miles from the interior. There are the elephants, the ebony-trees, the India-rubber vines; and there live the wretched producers. Between them and the coast live perhaps a dozen tribes, who are not producers, but commission merchants. Each holds fast possession of a piece of the river, which is the only highway of the impenetrable country. Each passes to his neighbor below him the tooth, or piece of ebony or barwood, which has passed to him from his neighbor above; and when, at last, the venture reaches the coast, it is already burdened with a series of debts, in the shape of commissions, which too often eat up the principal. "In fact, the first holder has trusted each successive dispenser with his property without any equivalent or 'collateral' security. Now, when the last black fellow disposes of this piece of ebony or ivory to the white merchant or captain, he retains, in the first place, a very liberal percentage of the returns for his valuable services, and turns the remainder over to his next neighbor above. He, in turn, takes out a commission for his trouble, and passes on what is left; and so, finally, a very small remainder—too often nothing at all—is handed over to the poor fellow who has inaugurated the speculation or sent the tusk. The poor interior tribes are kept by their neighbors in the profoundest ignorance of what is done on the coast. They are made to believe the most absurd and horrid stories as to the ferocity, the duplicity, and the cunning of the white traders. They are persuaded that the rascally middle-men are not only in constant danger of their lives by their intercourse with the whites, but that they do not make any profit on the goods which they good-naturedly pass on to a market, so that I have known one of these scoundrels, after having appropriated a large share of the poor remainder of returns for a venture of ivory, actually, by a pitiful story, beg a portion of what he had handed over to his unsuspecting client. Each tribe cheats its next neighbor above, and maligns its next neighbor below. A talent for slander is, of course, a first-rate business talent; and the harder stories one can tell of his neighbors below the greater profit he will make on his neighbor above."

Again, through the anxiety of white traders to secure "trade," there has sprung up along the coast an injurious system of "trust." A merchant, to secure to himself certain quantities of produce yet to come down from the interior, gives to such black fellows as he thinks he can depend on advances of trade goods, often to very considerable amounts. In this way, on the Gaboon and on the coast, often many thousand dollars' worth of goods are in the hands of natives, for which no consideration has been received by the white trader, who meantime waits, and is put to trouble and expense, and thinks himself lucky if he do not eventually lose a part of his investment. And last, though evidently not least, is the vexation and loss of precious time in a climate fatal to white men, of having to deal with a set of fellows to whom time is precisely the thing they least value, and who chaffer all day about the sale of a tooth, and then take it away to try again next day. Here is a scene on board a ship just arrived. She is instantly boarded by a crowd of fellows, each jabbering away, apparently at random, but all telling the same story :

“Never was there such dearth of ivory—or whatever the captain may want !

“Never were the interior tribes so obstinate in demanding a high price !

FAN KNIFE AND AXES.

1. Tomahawk.—2. Knife three feet long.—3. Sheath.—4. War-axe.

“Never was the whole coast so bare!
 “Never were difficulties so great!
 “There have been fights, captain!
 “And fever, captain!
 “And floods, captain!
 “And no trade at all, captain!
 “Not a tooth!”

This point settled, they produce their “good books,” which are certificates of character, in which some captain or other white trader who is known on the coast vouches for the honesty—the great honesty and entire trust-worthiness—of the bearer. It is not worth while for a fellow to present himself without a certificate, and the papers are all good; because, when “the bearer” has cheated, he does not apply for a “character.” Now these certificates help him to cheat. When he finds the need of a new set of papers, he conducts himself with scrupulous honesty toward two or three captains. These, of course, “certify” him, and then he goes into the wildest and most reckless speculations, upheld by the “good books,” which he shows to every captain that comes.

Now, while they are pretending that nothing is to be bought, that there is no ivory on the coast, all this time the lying rascals have their hands full, and are eager to sell. They know the captain is in a hurry. The coast is sickly. The weather is hot. He fears his crew may fall sick or die, and he be left with a broken voyage. Every day is therefore precious to him; but to the black fellows all days are alike. They have no storage, no interest account, no fever to fear, and, accordingly, they can tire the captain out. This they do. In fact, often, if they have an obstinate customer to deal with, they even combine and send all the trade a day’s journey up river, and thus produce a fair show of commercial scarcity. At last, when high prices have been established, when the inroads of fever on his crew or the advance of the season have made the poor captain desperately willing to pay any thing, the ivory comes aboard, and the cunning black rascals chuckle.

In this wretched way no less than 150,000 pounds of ivory, besides quantities of palm-oil, ebony, and barwood are collected on this limited stretch of coast each year.

It is not strange that an enterprising man should tire of this, and leave the coast for the strange interior. The rivers are highways as far as they go. When they fail, the travelers’ luggage is strapped on the backs of women, who support the load by an awkward band wound round the head. There are no beasts of burden. The savage wild bull of these plains has never been tamed; horses are unknown; and the journey must be made on foot. Happy the poor traveler if he does not starve on the way; for game is scarce. “Not even a monkey or a rat!” exclaims hungry Du Chaillu, looking with greedy eyes and watering mouth at a half-roasted snake, twenty-five feet long, which his unscrupulous party are devouring; and cursing in his heart those qualms which forbade him to partake with them.

At every new town our traveler reached he was the object of wonder not unmixed with alarm. His white face—tanned, we imagine, to what we should call a dark bronze; his shoes, which were usually supposed to be his feet; his clothes; and, above all, his long, straight hair, excited by turns the awe and admiration of curious and rankly-smelling crowds; till, at last, when he reached the ultima thule of his first journey, an astonished warrior fell down at his feet, in mortal terror, to worship him as a spirit.

This was among the Fans, a tribe remarkable for the most disgusting species of cannibalism which has ever been witnessed or recorded. They eat habitually the corpses of persons who die a ies between neighboring villages; and our traveler not only found his quarters in the Fan capital surrounded by human remains, but was witness to the division of the spoils of a deceased villager. We have heard Captain Burton relate, with savage glee, how a tribe on the eastern coast, determined to conquer another which offered unexpected resistance, on the field of battle ate the hearts of their enemies in the presence of a number of prisoners, who, being afterward released, carried the terror of this tale to their nation, who immediately submitted. "They could stand being killed," said the redoubtable captain, "but to be eaten struck them with terror." But here was a tribe who eat human flesh habitually, and that of a peculiarly disgusting quality. We shall not forget the incredulous smile with which a dinner party received this relation from the lips of Mr. Du Chaillu, who, quickly perceiving the doubt, capped it with an instance which seemed quite too horrible to be true: "A party of Fans who came down to the sea-shore once to see the sea actually stole a freshly buried body from the cemetery, and cooked it and ate it among them; and another party took another body, conveyed it into the woods, cut it up, and smoked the flesh, which they carried away with them."

Several months afterward we found ourselves one day in Mr. Du Chaillu's museum, and were introduced to the Rev. Mr. Walker, long time a missionary on the Gaboon station, and were by him assured of the literal truth of this story, which no one would before believe.

and very intelligent race; taller than their neighbors; smelting and hammering iron, of which they make spear-heads, and long, savage, two-edged knives, compared with which the Arkansas tooth-pick is a child's plaything. They use a bow of immense strength, which even they can not bend without sitting down to it, and from which are propelled the little poisoned arrows which make them a terror to their enemies. The men plait their wool into a queue behind, lengthening it by the help of tow dyed black, as John Chinaman helps his tail out with black silk. They use a shield of elephant hide, a specimen of which, in Mr. Du Chaillu's collection, needs a strong arm to hold out. They dress themselves in a cloth made, like the South Sea Islander's "tappa," of the beaten bark of a tree; to which are added a leopard's skin about the middle, and an abundance of tigers' teeth, human vertebræ, monkeys' tails, and other absurdities, which are fetiches or amulets, to protect these man-eaters from the arrows and teeth of their enemies. Their country abounds with elephants, which they kill for their meat and the ivory, which is their only "trade" with the coast. And, alas! even these fierce ghouls are cheated by their monopolizing neighbors, to whom they intrust their goods for sale to the white man.

THE OUGANGA (DOCTOR) EXERCISING A SORCERER

When the Fans have discovered the beat of a herd of elephants, they construct, with great labor, a net-work of the abundant vines of the forest, which half incloses a considerable tract. This requires several days. Then, armed with numerous spears, they drive the herd against this fatal barrier, where the huge bodies push vainly against the yielding vines, while their agile enemies attack them from the overhanging branches and from behind the trees, till at last, one after another, the poor victims fall, their hides bristling with spears. But there is no little danger in the mad melée; and the man who loses his presence of mind for a moment is killed by the enraged beast. Of our traveler's party, on one such battue, a poor fellow was caught and trampled into a jelly in an instant by a furious elephant, which suddenly charged an attacking crowd.

We have not space to recount the curious rules which guide the chase among the Fans, or the superstitious observances with which the spoils are afterward divided. Nor can we quote the interesting account of their marriage customs, or of a cannibal wedding at which Mr. Du Chaillu was an honored guest, and where he was deafened by the noise of savage music, and disgusted by the general intoxication with which the feast wound up. The drum is valued the more the greater noise it makes. But these people have also a very remarkable instrument called the handja, whose sweet and silvery tones by no means smack of cannibalism. It consists of a light reed frame, three feet long by one and a half broad, into which are set and securely fastened a set of hollow gourds covered by strips of a hard red wood found in the forests. Each of these cylinders is of a different size, and all are so graduated that the set form a regular series of notes. A handja generally contains seven. The performer sits down, lays the frame across his knees, and strikes the strips lightly with a stick. There are two sticks, one hard, the other soft, and the principle is the same on which music has been produced in France from a series of glasses. The tone is very clear and good; and though their tunes are very rude, they can play them with considerable skill.

It was while among the Fans that our traveler killed his first gorilla, a huge beast lacking but a few inches of being six feet in height. They had been cautiously hunting the dense jungle for some hours. "Suddenly Miengai uttered a little cluck with his tongue, which is the native's way of showing that something is stirring, and that a sharp look-out is necessary. And presently I noticed, ahead of us seemingly, a noise as of some one breaking down branches or twigs of trees.

"This was the gorilla, I knew at once, by the eager and satisfied looks of the men. They looked once more carefully at their guns, to see if by any chance the powder had fallen out of the pans; I also examined mine, to make sure that all were right; and then we marched on cautiously.

"The singular noise of the breaking of tree-branches continued. We walked with the greatest care, making no noise at all. The countenances of the men showed that they thought themselves engaged in a very serious undertaking; but we pushed on, until finally we thought we saw through the thick woods the moving of the branches and small trees which the great beast was tearing down, probably to get from them the berries and fruits he lives on.

"Suddenly, as we were yet creeping along, in a silence which made a heavy breath seem loud and distinct, the woods were filled with the tremendous barking roar of the gorilla.

"Then the underbrush swayed rapidly just ahead, and presently before us stood an immense male gorilla. He had gone through the jungle on his all-fours; but when he saw our party he erected himself and looked us boldly in the face. He stood about a dozen yards from us, and was a sight I think never to forget. Nearly six feet high, with immense body, huge chest, and great muscular arms, with fiercely-glaring, large, deep gray eyes, and a hellish expression of face, which seemed to me like some nightmare vision: thus stood before us this king of the African forests.

"He was not afraid of us. He stood there, and beat his breast with his huge fists till it resounded like an immense bass drum, which is their mode of offering defiance; meantime giving vent to roar after roar.

"The roar of the gorilla is the most singular and awful noise heard in these African woods. It begins with a sharp bark like an angry dog, then glides into a deep bass roll, which literally and closely resembles the roll of distant thunder along the sky, for which I have sometimes been tempted to take it where I did not see the animal. So deep is it that it seems to proceed less from the mouth and throat than from the deep chest and vast paunch.

"His eyes began to flash fiercer fire as we stood motionless on the defensive, and the crest of short hair which stands on his forehead began to twitch rapidly up and down, while his powerful fangs were shown as he again sent forth a thunderous roar. And now truly he reminded me of nothing but some hellish dream creature—a being of that hideous order, half man half beast, which we find pictured by old artists in some representations of the infernal regions. He advanced a few steps—then stopped to utter that hideous roar again—advanced again, and finally stopped when at a distance of about six yards from us. And here, as he began another of his roars and beating his breast in rage, we fired, and killed him.

"With a groan which had something terribly human in it, and yet was full of brutishness, it fell forward on its face. The body shook convulsively for a few minutes, the limbs moved about in a struggling way, and then all was quiet—death had done its work, and I had leisure to examine the huge body. It proved to be five feet eight inches high, and the muscular development of the arms and breast showed what immense strength it had possessed.

"My men, though rejoicing at our luck, immediately began to quarrel about the apportionment of the meat—for they really eat this creature. I saw that we should come to blows presently if I did not interfere, and therefore said I should myself give each man his share, which satisfied all. As we were too tired to return to our camp of last night, we determined to camp here on the spot, and accordingly soon had some shelters erected and dinner going on. Luckily, one of the fellows shot a deer just as we began to camp, and on its meat I feasted while my men ate gorilla.

"I noticed that they very carefully saved the brain, and was told that charms were made of this—charms of two kinds. Prepared in one way, the charm gave the wearer a strong hand for the hunt, and in another it gave him success with women."

The evening was spent, as was usual on such occasions, in telling superstitious stories of the powers and evil doings of the mysterious brute, which has taken so strong a hold of the imaginations of these Africans that it is in all these regions a household word of dread. We cull a few of the many curious stories which Mr. Du Chaillu thus gathered at different times about the camp-fire. He says: "I listened in silence to the conversation, which was not addressed to me, and was rewarded by hearing the stories as they are believed, and not as a stranger would be apt to draw them out by questions. One of the men told of two Mbondemo women who were walking together through the woods, when suddenly an immense gorilla stepped into the path, and, clutching one of the women, bore her off in spite of the screams and struggles of both. The other woman returned to the village, sadly frightened, and related the story. Of course her companion was given up for lost. Great was the surprise, therefore, when, a few days afterward, she returned to her home. She related that the gorilla had forced her to accompany him for many miles, but had not seriously injured her, and that she had easily escaped from him.

“‘Yes,’ said one, ‘that was a gorilla inhabited by a spirit.’

“Which explanation was received with a general grunt of approval.

“They believe, in all this country, that there is a kind of gorilla—known to the initiated by certain mysterious signs, but chiefly by being of extraordinary size—which is the residence of certain spirits of departed negroes. Such gorillas, the natives believe, can never be caught or killed; and, also, they have much more shrewdness and sense than the common animal. In fact, in these 'possessed' beasts, it would seem that the intelligence of man is united with the strength and ferocity of the beast. No wonder the poor African dreads so terrible a being as his imagination thus conjures up.

"One of the men told how, some years ago, a party of gorillas were found in a cane-field tying up the sugar-cane in regular bundles, preparatory to carrying it away. The natives attacked them, but were routed, and several killed, while others were carried off prisoners by the gorillas; but in a few days they returned home uninjured, with this horrid exception: the nails of their fingers and toes had been torn off by their captors.

"Some years ago a man suddenly disappeared from his village. It is probable that he was carried off by a tiger; but as no news came of him, the native superstition invented a cause for his absence. It was related and believed that, as he walked through the wood one day, he was suddenly changed into a hideous large gorilla, which was often pursued afterward, but never killed, though it continually haunted the neighborhood of the village.

"Here several spoke up and mentioned names of men now dead whose spirits were known to be dwelling in gorillas.

"Finally was rehearsed the story which is current among all the tribes who at all know the gorilla: that this animal lies in wait in the lower branches of trees, watching for people who go to and fro; and, when one passes sufficiently near, grasps the luckless fellow with his powerful feet and draws him up into the tree, where he quietly chokes him."

Such stories as these, the wild imaginings of terror-stricken negroes, have, until now, passed current as at least largely founded in fact. They are gathered in Professor Owen's before mentioned very interesting Memoir of the Gorilla; and it seems a pity to wipe away at one blow so horrible and pleasing a picture as is thus made up. But Mr. Du Chaillu must be believed, and he says: "I am sorry to be the dispeller of such agreeable delusions; but the gorilla does not lurk in trees by the roadside, and drag up unsuspecting passers-by in its claws, and choke them to death in its vice-like paws; it does not attack the elephant and beat him to death with sticks; it does not carry off women from the native villages; it does not even build itself a house of leaves and twigs in the forest-trees and sit on the roof, as has been confidently reported of it. It is not gregarious even; and the numerous stories of its attacking in great numbers have not a grain of truth in them."

It lives in the loneliest and darkest portions of the dense African jungle, preferring deep wooded valleys and also rugged heights. It does not live much, if at all in trees, only the young ones sleeping in the branches, while the adults make their beds at the foot of some monarch of the woods, sleeping, as Mr. Du Chaillu thinks, in a sitting posture. Though the animal has such immense teeth and jaws, it is a strict vegetarian; its favorite food being pine-apple leaves, a small berry which grows near the ground, the soft pith of a tree, to get at which the gorilla uses his vast strength to break the tree down; and, lastly, a nut with a very hard shell, which it cracks with its strong jaws. It is not gregarious. The young are found in flocks of never more than five; and these, as well as females when found alone, make off in great haste from the hunter. But the adult male gorilla is never known to run from his enemy, man. This is not only the experience of Mr. Du Chaillu, but the universal testimony of the negroes. "When I surprised a pair of gorillas, the male was generally sitting down on a rock or against a tree, in some darkest corner of the jungle, where the brightest sun left its traces only in a dim and gloomy twilight. The female was mostly feeding near by; and it is singular that she almost always gave the alarm by running off, with loud and sudden cries or shrieks. Then the male, sitting for a moment with a savage frown on his face, slowly rises to his feet, and, looking with glowing and malign eyes at the intruders, begins to beat his breast, and, lifting up his round head, utters his frightful roar. This begins with several sharp barks, like an enraged or mad dog, whereupon ensues a long, deeply guttural rolling roar, continued for over a minute, and which, doubled and multiplied by the resounding echoes of the forest, fills the hunter's ears like the deep rolling thunder of an approaching storm. I have reason to believe that I have heard this roar at a distance of three miles. The horror of the animal's appearance at this time is beyond description. It seems as monstrous as a nightmare dream—so impossible a piece of hideousness that, were it not for the danger of its savage approach, the hunter might fancy himself in some ugly dream. At such a sight I could forgive my brave native hunters that they were sometimes overcome with superstitious fears, and ceased to wonder at the strange, weird 'gorilla stories' of the negroes."

It is a maxim with the well-trained gorilla-hunters to reserve their fire till the very last moment. Experience has shown them that—whether the enraged beast takes the report of the gun for an answering defiance, or for what other reason unknown—if the hunter fires and misses, the gorilla at once rushes upon him; and this onset no man can withstand. One blow of that huge paw, with its bony claws, and the poor hunter's entrails are torn out, his breast-bone broken, or his skull crushed. It is too late to reload, and flight is vain. There have been negroes who in such cases, made desperate by their frightful danger, have faced the gorilla, and struck at him with the empty gun. But they had time for only one harmless blow. The next moment the huge arm came down with fatal force, breaking musket and skull with one blow.

NSHIEGO, AND YOUNG.

One poor fellow, an attached follower of our traveler, was thus slain, the gorilla with one blow from its tremendous arm laying his bowels open. Then the furious animal seized the gun, whose barrel it bent, and bit so as to leave the dents of its teeth on the iron! "I imagine," says Mr. Du Chaillu, "that no animal is so fatal in its attack on man as this, for the reason that it meets him face to face, and uses its arms as its weapons of offense, just as a man or a prize-fighter would—only that it has longer arms, and vastly greater strength than the strongest boxer the world ever saw."

But we must refer the reader to Mr. Du Chaillu's work for farther particulars of the gorilla, whose nature and actions he was able to study, not only in the forests, but in his camps, where he had at various times no less than five young captive gorillas. Utterly untamable, ferocious, and not to be touched either by kindness or severity, these treacherous little beasts wore out their lives by vain struggles for liberty and savage attempts at revenge upon their captors. There is a monstrous fascination about his accounts of this animal which is scarcely equaled by the most horrid of Edgar Poe's nightmare-breeding romances.

Our remaining space suffices only to give a running summary of Mr. Du Chaillu's journeys and their results. His longest and most important explorations were made by the favor of a powerful king, Quengeza by name, whose shrewd mind appreciated the benefit he was likely to derive from the friendship of a white man. At Goombi, Quengeza's capital, the traveler was received with great honor, and, with the exception of one unfortunate execution for witchcraft, when two of his own friends were murdered in cold blood, he enjoyed here a great influence over the people; many of whom begged him to send them white men to teach them. The oungangas, or medicine-men, however, hated him, because he spoke with disrespect of their superstitions, and tried to induce the king to abolish the cruel poison-ordeal to which persons accused of sorcery are obliged to submit, and by which thousands lose their lives every year through this region.

One of these medicine-men played him in return a very shrewd trick, which we must relate. A man had died in the town owned by our traveler at the mouth of the Fernand Vaz, and which was the base of his operations, where his surplus goods were stored in houses built by him at considerable expense. Now when a man dies in that country, it is supposed to be only because some enemy of his has bewitched him. Hence an ounganga was called from the interior, whose duty it was to discover the culprit—who would then be submitted to the ordeal of poison, and if this, by its effects, declared him guilty, would be decapitated, quartered, and his remains cast away. The shrewd ounganga came, and after various incantations declared himself unable to discover the sorcerer; but gave it as his opinion that if the people did not abandon their town, and remove farther up the river, they would all die. And before twenty-four hours were over poor Du Chaillu was left entirely alone! The medicine-man had played him a trick which nearly proved fatal to his enterprise, as it was only by promises of extravagant pay that he could induce three or four men to come back and live with him, and to keep watch over his property in his absence.

Before ascending the Rembo to Goombi, Du Chaillu explored the Ogobay, to its termination, or source, in a lake called the Anengue, which he found, at the dry season, filled with little blotches of mud-islands, covered with astonishing numbers of crocodiles, who came down from the surrounding marshes to feed on the fish, which abound in the lake at this season. On these crocodiles the natives of the region live; killing them with a rude but effective harpoon, which is darted from a long and very flat-bottomed boat, which skims over the turbid surface raising scarce a ripple. Crocodile shooting by moonlight—which is the best time—is a novel and exciting sport, which he here enjoyed for the first time, and which we find no note of in former African travelers.

Above Goombi, the Rembo, which was originally the Fernand Vaz, takes the name of Ovenga—Rembo meaning, in fact, only river. Here our traveler came upon a region somewhat healthier, with a soil of considerable fertility, though, in the utter ignorance of the negroes, they do not cultivate the ground with sufficient regularity to draw from it even subsistence for themselves: a more idle, hand-to-mouth living set of people it would be difficult to imagine. They cut small quantities of the abundant ebony, kill a few elephants, and cut sometimes a little barwood, and with these manage to obtain scant supplies of beads, guns, powder, and iron and copper kettles, from the sea-shore. In all this region the gorilla is found; and while staying with a chief named Obindji, Mr. Du Chaillu was so fortunate as to discover two new species of apes—of which the world did not before possess even that scant intelligence it had of the gorilla. These were the Kooloo-Kamba—so named from its singular cry—which is pronounced by comparative anatomists the most man-like of all the apes; and the Nshiego Mbouvé, a remarkably docile and intelligent animal, which builds for itself, with a surprising ingenuity, a leafy roof, in the forks of some high tree, where it rests at night, secure from the drenching rains of this country, and from the attacks of beasts. Of the last, our traveler possessed several young ones, which exhibited an astonishing docility and love for the company of man—very different from the morose and treacherous disposition of the young gorilla. And, most singular of all, the young Nshiego is born with a face as perfectly white as the whitest child! It is not till it enters its second year that its face assumes a yellow tint, and at three years old it is pitchy black like its mother. We can not spare room here for a more detailed account of these remarkable animals.

Among all the tribes he had hitherto visited he had found a kind of grass-cloth, used for the scanty covering of both men and women—but nowhere, so far, had he seen a loom. To the question, "Where do you get this?" the invariable answer was, "from the East, from a people who are cloth-makers, and great magicians, and whose tongue we do not speak, and who can kill men whom they do not like." This people—cloth-makers and magicians—he had long wished to see; and at last, after many delays, he set out for the high table-lands in which they were said to dwell. After many days' journey, through a mountainous region, they did reach the plains, and found the Ashira, the mysterious nation of cloth-makers, to be really a superior people, industrious, living in permanent towns, and peaceable. Here he was received as a spirit of great power; the maker of guns and powder and beads—for though these negroes had never even hoped to see a white man, they knew the use of guns. Hence he journeyed yet farther east, to the Apingi, a tribe who were yet farther advanced than the Ashira, being not only better weavers, but also workers in iron, and of no mean skill, for savages, to judge by their knives and other weapons, brought home by Mr. Du Chaillu, which we have seen. The Apingi not only looked upon him as an all-potent spirit, but thought him a cannibal; and with a hospitality which can not be too much admired, the king sent him, on his arrival, a fat slave, to be roasted for his supper, promising a farther supply when it was needed.

“What, then, do you white spirits do with the men you buy on the sea-shore?” queried the Apingi king, curiously, of our horror-struck traveler. “If you don’t eat them, what do you want of them?” It seems that in the far interior the whole white race is believed to be in the practice of cannibalism; and having a short supply of human flesh at home, these people believe that we are forced to seek our supply from among them, in Africa.

In Apingi-land Mr. Du Chaillu stood upon the threshold of what he justly regards as his most important geographical discovery. He found himself at the beginning of a range of mountains, extending, so far as any of the negroes could tell him, in a direction nearly due east; that is to say, across the continent. He determined to follow the line of this mountain range as far as possible; though, from lack of preparations, and the debility resulting from some twenty-five attacks of African fever within two years, with constant exposure, poor fare, and hard work, forbade him to hope to cross the Continent. We must remember, in addition, that the only food which could be carried by his party was the plantain and yam, both, by their bulk and weight, rendering it impossible to carry more than a few days' supply; and that the forests of all this region are almost barren of life—vast solitudes, in which the stately ebony rears its head high above its neighbors; in which the barwood and various other precious woods are found in abundance, and where the traveler's steps are cumbered by the abounding vines which yield the caoutchouc of Africa.

CAMA MAN AND WOMAN.

The only hope of penetrating such a country was to push desperately on from tribe to tribe; but when our traveler reached the Isogo villages, some four days' journey east from the Apingi, he found that the next stopping-place—with no intermediate villages—was put at three days' journey, due east, which he well guessed would prove nearer six. Nevertheless, the mountain-range still pointed eastward; and it was not in the heart of a man who had pierced this great secret so far, alone, and against all odds, to give it up now. Gathering what scant supplies he could obtain, and putting on, alas! his last pair of stout shoes, he set out, determined, if possible, by energetic travel to reach the Ashango villages, where he might rest.

On that last pair of stout shoes rested in reality all his hopes. Starvation he had now got pretty well accustomed to, and we think of him, in the last extremity bracing his stomach to receive a proper portion of roasted boa-constrictor, if nothing better offered.

But the ground proved too much for the shoes. On the third day he tied his shirt-sleeves about his bleeding feet—and yet pushed on, with empty stomach, no villages yet in sight; the jungle dense as ever; the mountains still ranging eastward, as far as the eye could reach from any unobstructed point.

At last the swollen, torn, and bleeding feet could bear him on no longer. He sat down by the side of a purling brook, bathed his feet, and sent his men to ascend an eminence near by, from whence perhaps they might descry human habitations. But there was nothing but the dreary jungle, and the mountains still ranging eastward, as far as the eye could distinguish their peaks in the distance.

They returned with a snake and a monkey, having dined on which, and fastened a small American flag to the top of the highest tree they saw, as a symbol of possession, in right of first discovery, they set out on their backward trip, desperate with hunger, and not daring to stop, even to hunt, by the way.

"Of the journey back," he writes, "I have but a dim and feverish recollection. I remember that my feet got worse instead of better; that when the wretched shoes were beyond even tying together with vines, I cast them away, and bandaged bare feet with what remained of my shirt. That on the second and third day of our journey we had not even a little bird to eat, but plunged forward in a stupid apathy of hunger and pain. That on the fourth morning one of the men espied a gorilla, who came roaring toward us, beating his vast chest, and waddling up to the attack with such horrid utterances and soul-freezing aspect, eyes glaring, and the monstrous face distorted with impotent rage, that for once, waking out of my dreamy stupor, and seeing this image of the devil coming upon us, I would have run if my feet had borne me. I remember that, when my gun-carrier shot the huge beast, the men rushed upon it, and tore rather than cut it up, to stifle with its loathed flesh the hunger which was gnawing at their vitals.

"Then we went on, relieved for a time from starvation, I dragging my bleeding, bare, and swollen feet over the rough and thorny ground, till at last, at noon of the fifth day, we came to the Isogo towns."

And here we leave him.

The discoveries of Mr. Du Chaillu in the Department of Natural History alone, have been proclaimed in this country and in Europe, to be of such value and interest as to make his name honored among those enterprising men to whom Natural History is under the greatest obligations. But he has shown us not only the terrible gorilla, the curious nest-building nshiego, and many other new and beautiful animals; he has laid bare, for the operations of our enterprising commerce, a large region fruitful in many products which take the first rank in the world's commerce. India-rubber, ebony (of which he imported a cargo cut in the upper Ovenga, under his own supervision, and which was counted first-class wood for size and grain), ivory, barwood, palm-oil, are found here—in a virgin country, only needing shrewd management to become a source of wealth to our merchants and of new hopes of civilization to Africa.

APPLE-BLOSSOMS.

HITHER and thither they swung, Madeline Hays—

The bloom-loaded apple-tree boughs,
The rose-scented apple-tree boughs,
The pink-tinted apple-tree boughs—
In the merry May days.

Hither and thither they swung, Madeline Hays;
The blossoms and you together,
Rose-tinted, and light as a feather,
All in the merry May weather,
My rose-tinted Madeline Hays.

Down in the wet green grass, Madeline Hays,
Where the brown bees cluster and hover;
Down in the cowslips and clover,
With the apple-tree blooms sprinkled over,
I awaited you, Madeline Hays.

Down in the wet green grass, Madeline Hays,
Ankle-deep, I pleaded and flattered,
While the blackbird whistled and chattered,
And the pink-blossoms, pelted and pattered,
All in the merry May days.

“Come down, come down to me, Madeline Hays!”

I pleaded, and pleaded in vain;
While the pink pelting rain
And your laugh of disdain
Only answered me, Madeline Hays.

“Come down, come down to me, Madeline Hays!”

I pleaded, and flattered once more,
And you laughed in my face as before,
“Till the wind blew down with a roar!—
What happened then, Madeline Hays?

The wind blew down with a roar, Madeline Hays,

Breaking branches and boughs in the race,
Blowing blossoms and buds in my face;
What else did I catch and embrace
As the bough broke, Madeline Hays?

Soft yellow silk hair, Madeline Hays,
Unrolling its lovely Greek twist,
Blowing out its goldening mist—
It was this that I caught first and kiss’d,
My bloom-blushing Madeline Hays!

Then through hair all a-dazzle, Madeline Hays,
Eyes and mouth, cheek and chin too,
Out of the dazzle came glimmering through;
All the love colors—red, white, and blue—
What could a man do, Madeline Hays?

CHAPTER V.

SIR PEREGRINE MAKES A SECOND PROMISE.

WE left Lady Mason very grateful, at the end of the last chapter, for the promise made to her by Sir Peregrine with reference to her son; but there was still a weight on Lady Mason's mind. They say that the pith of a lady's letter is in the postscript, and it may be that that which remained for Lady Mason to say, was after all the matter as to which she was most anxious for assistance. "As you are here," she said to the baronet, "would you let me mention another subject?"

"Surely," said he, again putting down his hat and riding-stick.

Sir Peregrine was not given to close observation of those around him, or he might have seen by the heightened color of the lady's face, and by the slight nervous hesitation with which she began to speak, that she was much in earnest as to this other matter. And had he been clever in his powers of observation he might have seen also that she was anxious to hide this feeling. "You remember the circumstances of that terrible lawsuit?" she said, at last.

"What; as to Sir Joseph's will? Yes; I remember them well."

"I know that I shall never forget all the kindness that you showed me," said she. "I don't know how I should have lived through it without you and dear Mrs. Orme."

"But what about it now?"

"I fear I am going to have further trouble."

"Do you mean that the man at Groby Park is going to try the case again? It is not possible after such a lapse of time. I am no lawyer, but I do not think that he can do it."

"I do not know—I do not know what he intends, or whether he intends any thing; but I am sure of this—that he will give me trouble if he can. But I will tell you the whole story, Sir Peregrine. It is not much, and perhaps after all may not be worth attention. You know the attorney in Hamworth who married Miriam Usbech?"

"What, Samuel Dockwrath? Oh, yes; I know him well enough; and to tell the truth I do not think very well of him. Is he not a tenant of yours?"

"Not at present." And then Lady Mason explained the manner in which the two fields had been taken out of the lawyer's hands by her son's order.

"Ah! he was wrong there," said the baronet. "When a man has held land so long it should not be taken away from him except under pressing circumstances; that is, if he pays his rent."

"Mr. Dockwrath did pay his rent, certainly; and now, I fear, he is determined to do all he can to injure us."

"But what injury can Mr. Dockwrath do you?"

"I do not know; but he has gone down to Yorkshire—to Mr. Mason's place; I know that; and he was searching through some papers of old Mr. Usbech's before he went. Indeed, I may say that I know as a fact that he has gone to Mr. Mason with the hope that these law proceedings may be brought on again."

"You know it as a fact?"

"I think I may say so."

"But, dear Lady Mason, may I ask you how you know this as a fact?"

"His wife was with me yesterday," she said, with some feeling of shame as she disclosed the source from whence she had obtained her information.

"And did she tell the tale against her own husband?"

"Not as meaning to say any thing against him, Sir Peregrine; you must not think so badly of her as that; nor must you think that I would willingly obtain information in such a manner. But you must understand that I have always been her friend; and when she found that Mr. Dockwrath had left home on a matter in which I am so nearly concerned, I can not but think it natural that she should let me know."

To this Sir Peregrine made no direct answer. He could not quite say that he thought it was natural, nor could he give any expressed approval of any such intercourse between Lady Mason and the attorney's wife. He thought it would be better that Mr. Dockwrath should be allowed to do his worst, if he had any intention of doing evil, and that Lady Mason should pass it by without condescending to notice the circumstance. But he made allowances for her weakness, and did not give utterance to his disapproval in words.

"I know you think that I have done wrong," she then said, appealing to him; and there was a tone of sorrow in her voice which went to his heart.

"No, not wrong; I can not say that you have done wrong. It may be a question whether you have done wisely."

"Ah! if you only condemn my folly, I will not despair. It is probable I may not have done wisely, seeing that I had not you to direct me. But what shall I do now? Oh, Sir Peregrine, say that you will not desert me if all this trouble is coming on me again!"

"No, I will not desert you, Lady Mason; you may be sure of that."

"Dearest friend!"

"But I would advise you to take no notice whatever of Mr. Dockwrath and his proceedings. I regard him as a person entirely beneath your notice, and if I were you I should not move at all in this matter unless I received some legal summons which made it necessary for me to do so. I have not the honor of any personal acquaintance with Mr. Mason, of Groby Park." It was in this way that Sir Peregrine always designated his friend's step-son—"but if I understand the motives by which he may probably be actuated in this or in any other matter, I do not think it likely that he will expend money on so very unpromising a case."

"He would do any thing for vengeance."

"I doubt if he would throw away his money even for that, unless he were very sure of his prey. And in this matter what can he possibly do? He has the decision of the jury against him, and at the time he was afraid to carry the case up to a court of appeal."

"But, Sir Peregrine, it is impossible to know what documents he may have obtained since that."

"What documents can do you any harm—unless, indeed, there should turn out to be a will subsequent to that under which your son inherits the property?"

"Oh no; there was no subsequent will."

"Of course there was not; and therefore you need not frighten yourself. It is just possible that some attempt may be made, now that your son is of age; but I regard even that as improbable."

"And you would not advise me, then, to say any thing to Mr. Furnival?"

"No; certainly not—unless you receive some legal notice which may make it necessary for you to consult a lawyer. Do nothing; and if Mrs. Dockwrath comes to you again, tell her that you are not disposed to take any notice of her information. Mrs. Dockwrath is, I am sure, a very good sort of woman. Indeed, I have always heard so. But if I were you, I don't think that I should feel inclined to have much conversation with her about my private affairs. What you tell her you tell also to her husband." And then the baronet, having thus spoken words of wisdom, sat silent in his arm-chair; and Lady Mason, still looking into his face, remained silent also for a few minutes.

"I am so glad I asked you to come," she then said.

"I am delighted if I have been of any service to you."

"Of any service! oh, Sir Peregrine, you can not understand what it is to live alone as I do—for of course I can not trouble Lucius with these matters; nor can a man, gifted as you are, comprehend how a woman can tremble at the very idea that those law proceedings may possibly be repeated."

Sir Peregrine could not but remember, as he looked at her, that during all those law proceedings, when an attack was made, not only on her income but on her honesty, she had never seemed to tremble. She had always been constant to herself, even when things appeared to be going against her. But years passing over her head since that time had perhaps told upon her courage.

"But I will fear nothing now, as you have promised that you will still be my friend."

"You may be very sure of that, Lady Mason. I believe that I may fairly boast that I do not easily abandon those whom I have once regarded with esteem and affection; among whom Lady Mason will, I am sure, allow me to say that she is reckoned as by no means the least." And then taking her hand, the old gentleman bowed over it and kissed it.

"My dearest, dearest friend!" said she; and lifting Sir Peregrine's beautifully white hand to her lips she also kissed that. It will be remembered that the gentleman was over seventy, and that this pretty scene could therefore be enacted without impropriety on either side. Sir Peregrine then went, and as he passed out of the door Lady Mason smiled on him very sweetly. It is quite true that he was over seventy; but nevertheless the smile of a pretty woman still had charms for him, more especially if there was a tear in her eye the while; for Sir Peregrine Orme had a soft heart.

As soon as the door was closed behind him Lady Mason seated herself in her accustomed chair, and all trace of the smile vanished from her face. She was alone now, and could allow her countenance to be a true index of her mind. If such was the case her heart surely was very sad. She sat there perfectly still for nearly an hour, and during the whole of that time there was the same look of agony on her brow. Once or twice she rubbed her hands across her forehead, brushing back her hair, and showing, had there been any one by to see it, that there was many a gray lock there mixed with the brown hairs. Had there been any one by, she would, it may be surmised, have been more careful.

There was no smile in her face now, neither was there any tear in her eye. The one and the other emblem were equally alien to her present mood. But there was sorrow at her heart, and deep thought in her mind. She knew that her enemies were conspiring against her—against her and against her son; and what steps might she best take in order that she might baffle them?

"I have got that woman on the hip now." Those were the words which Mr. Dockwrath had uttered into his wife's ears, after two days spent in searching through her father's papers. The poor woman had once thought of burning all those papers—in old days before she had become Mrs. Dockwrath. Her friend, Lady Mason, had counseled her to do so, pointing out to her that they were troublesome, and could by no possibility lead to profit; but she had consulted her lover, and he had counseled her to burn nothing. "Would that she had been guided by her friend!" she now said to herself with regard to that old trunk, and perhaps occasionally with regard to some other things.

"I have got that woman on the hip at last!" and there had been a gleam of satisfaction in Samuel's eye as he uttered the words which had convinced his wife that it was not an idle threat. She knew nothing of what the box had contained; and now, even if it had not been kept safe from her under Samuel's private key, the contents which were of interest had of course gone. "I have business in the north, and shall be away for about a week," Mr. Dockwrath had said to her on the following morning.

"Oh, very well; then I'll put up your things," she had answered, in her usual mild, sad, whining, household voice. Her voice at home was always sad and whining, for she was overworked, and had too many cares, and her lord was a tyrant to her rather than a husband.

"Yes, I must see Mr. Mason immediately. And look here, Miriam, I positively insist that you do not go to Orley Farm, or hold any intercourse whatever with Lady Mason. D'ye hear?"

Mrs. Dockwrath said that she did hear, and promised obedience. Mr. Dockwrath probably guessed that the moment his back was turned all would be told at the farm, and probably also had no real objection to her doing so. Had he in truth wished to keep his proceedings secret from Lady Mason he would not have divulged them to his wife. And then Mr. Dockwrath did start for the north, bearing certain documents with him; and soon after his departure Mrs. Dockwrath did pay a visit to Orley Farm.

Lady Mason sat there perfectly still for about an hour thinking what she would do. She had asked Sir Peregrine, and had the advantage of his advice; but that did not weigh much with her. What she wanted from Sir Peregrine was countenance and absolute assistance in the day of trouble—not advice. She had desired to renew his interest in her favor, and to receive from him his assurance that he would not desert her; and that she had obtained. It was of course also necessary that she should consult him; but in turning over within her own mind this and that line of conduct, she did not, consciously, attach any weight to Sir Peregrine's opinion. The great question for her to decide was this; should she put herself and her case into the hands of her friend Mr. Furnival now at once, or should she wait till she had received some certain symptom of hostile proceedings? If she did see Mr. Furnival, what could she tell him? only this, that Mr. Dockwrath had found some document among the papers of old Mr. Usbech, and had gone off with the same to Groby Park in Yorkshire. What that document might be she was as ignorant as the attorney's wife.

When the hour was ended she had made up her mind that she would do nothing more in the matter, at any rate on that day.

CHAPTER VI.

THE COMMERCIAL ROOM, BULL INN, LEEDS.

MR. SAMUEL DOCKWRATH was a little man, with sandy hair, a pale face, and stone-blue eyes. In judging of him by appearance only and not by the ear, one would be inclined to doubt that he could be a very sharp attorney abroad and a very persistent tyrant at home. But when Mr. Dockwrath began to talk one's respect for him began to grow. He talked well and to the point, and with a tone of voice that could command where command was possible, persuade where persuasion was required, mystify where mystification was needed, and express with accuracy the tone of an obedient humble servant when servility was thought to be expedient. We will now accompany him on his little tour into Yorkshire.

Groby Park is about seven miles from Leeds, and as Mr. Dockwrath had in the first instance to travel from Hamworth up to London, he did not reach Leeds till late in the evening. It was a nasty, cold, drizzling night, so that the beauties and marvels of the large manufacturing town offered him no attraction, and at nine o'clock he had seated himself before the fire in the commercial room at The Bull, had called for a pair of public slippers, and was about to solace all his cares with a glass of mahogany-colored brandy-and-water and a cigar. The room had no present occupant but himself, and therefore he was able to make the most of all its comforts. He had taken the solitary arm-chair, and had so placed himself that the gas would fall direct from behind his head on to that day's Leeds and Halifax Chronicle, as soon as he should choose to devote himself to local politics.

The waiter had looked at him with doubtful eyes when he asked to be shown into the commercial room, feeling all but confident that such a guest had no right to be there. He had no bulky bundles of samples, nor any of those outward characteristics of a commercial "gent" with which all men conversant with the rail and road are acquainted, and which the accustomed eye of a waiter recognizes at a glance. And here it may be well to explain that ordinary travelers are in this respect badly treated by the customs of England, or rather by the hotel-keepers. All inn-keepers have commercial rooms, as certainly as they have taps and bars, but all of them do not have commercial rooms in the properly exclusive sense. A stranger, therefore, who has asked for and obtained his mutton-chop in the commercial room of The Dolphin, The Bear, and The George, not unnaturally asks to be shown into the same chamber at the King's Head. But the King's Head does a business with real commercials, and the stranger finds himself—out of his element.

"Mercial, Sir?" said the waiter at The Bull Inn, Leeds, to Mr. Dockwrath, in that tone of doubt which seemed to carry an answer to his own question. But Mr. Dockwrath was not a man to be put down by a waiter. "Yes," said he. "Didn't you hear me say so?" And then the waiter gave way. None of those lords of the road were in the house at the moment, and it might be that none would come that night.

Mr. Dockwrath had arrived by the 8.22 P.M. down, but the 8.45 P.M. up from the north followed quick upon his heels, and he had hardly put his brandy-and-water to his mouth before a rush and a sound of many voices were heard in the hall. There is a great difference between the entrance into an inn of men who are not known there and of men who are known. The men who are not known are shy, diffident, doubtful, and anxious to propitiate the chambermaid by great courtesy. The men who are known are loud, jocular, and assured; or else, in case of deficient accommodation, loud, angry, and full of threats. The guests who had now arrived were well known, and seemed at present to be in the former mood. "Well, Mary, my dear, what's the time of day with you?" said a rough, bass voice, within the hearing of Mr. Dockwrath. "Much about the old tune, Mr. Moulder," said the girl at the bar. "Time to look alive and keep moving. Will you have them boxes up stairs, Mr. Kantwise?" and then there were a few words about the luggage, and two real commercial gentlemen walked into the room.

Mr. Dockwrath resolved to stand upon his rights, so he did not move his chair, but looked up over his shoulder at the new-comers. The first man who entered was short and very fat—so fat that he could not have seen his own knees for some considerable time past. His face rolled with fat, as also did all his limbs. His eyes were large and bloodshot. He wore no beard, and therefore showed plainly the triple bagging of his fat chin. In spite of his overwhelming fatness there was something in his face that was masterful and almost vicious. His body had been overcome by eating, but not as yet his spirit—one would be inclined to say. This was Mr. Moulder, well known on the road as being in the grocery and spirit line—a pushing man, who understood his business, and was well trusted by his firm in spite of his habitual intemperance. What did the firm care whether or no he killed himself by eating and drinking? He sold his goods, collected his money, and made his remittances. If he got drunk at night that was nothing to them, seeing that he always did his quota of work the next day. But Mr. Moulder did not get drunk. His brandy-and-water went into his blood, and into his eyes, and into his feet, and into his hands—but not into his brain.

The other was a little spare man in the hardware line, of the name of Kantwise. He disposed of fire-irons, grates, ovens, and kettles, and was at the present moment heavily engaged in the sale of certain newly-invented metallic tables and chairs lately brought out by the Patent Steel Furniture Company, for which Mr. Kantwise did business. He looked as though a skin rather too small for the purpose had been drawn over his head and face, so that his forehead and cheeks and chin were tight and shiny. His eyes were small and green, always moving about in his head, and were seldom used by Mr. Kantwise in the ordinary way. At whatever he looked he looked sideways; it was not that he did not look you in the face, but he always looked at you with a sidelong glance, never choosing to have you straight in front of him. And the more eager he was in conversation, the more anxious he might be to gain his point, the more he averted his face and looked askance; so that sometimes he would prefer to have his antagonist almost behind his shoulder. And then as he did this he would thrust forward his chin, and having looked at you round the corner till his eyes were nearly out of his head, he would close them both and suck in his lips, and shake his head with rapid little shakes, as though he were saying to himself, "Ah, Sir! you're a bad un, a very bad un." His nose—for I should do Mr. Kantwise injustice if I did not mention this feature—seemed to have been compressed almost into nothing by that skin-squeezing operation. It was long enough, taking the measurement down the bridge, and projected sufficiently, counting the distance from the upper lip; but it had all the properties of a line—it possessed length without breadth. There was nothing in it from side to side. If you essayed to pull it, your fingers would meet. When I shall have also said that the hair on Mr. Kantwise's head stood up erect all round to the height of two inches, and that it was very red, I shall have been accurate enough in his personal description.

That Mr. Moulder represented a firm good business, doing tea, coffee, and British brandy on a well-established basis of capital and profit, the traveling commercial world in the north of England was well aware. No one entertained any doubt about his employers, Hubbles and Grease, of Houndsditch. Hubbles and Grease were all right, as they had been any time for the last twenty years. But I can not say that there was quite so strong a confidence felt in the Patent Steel Furniture Company generally, or in the individual operations of Mr. Kantwise in particular. The world in Yorkshire and Lancashire was doubtful about metallic tables, and it was thought that Mr. Kantwise was too eloquent in their praise.

Mr. Moulder, when he had entered the room, stood still, to enable the waiter to peel off from him his great-coat and the large shawl with which his neck was enveloped, and Mr. Kantwise performed the same operation for himself, carefully folding up the articles of clothing as he took them off. Then Mr. Moulder fixed his eyes on Mr. Dockwrath, and stared at him very hard. "Who's the party, James?" he said, to the waiter, speaking in a whisper that was plainly heard by the attorney.

"Gen'elman by the 8.22 down," said James.

"Commercial?" asked Mr. Moulder, with angry frown.

"He says so himself, anyways," said the waiter.

"Gammon!" replied Mr. Moulder, who knew all the bearings of a commercial man thoroughly, and could have put one together if he were only supplied with a little bit—say the mouth, as Professor Owen always does with the Dodoes. Mr. Moulder now began to be angry, for he was a stickler for the rights and privileges of his class, and had an idea that the world was not so conservative in that respect as it should be. Mr. Dockwrath, however, was not to be frightened, so he drew his chair a thought nearer to the fire, took a sup of brandy-and-water, and prepared himself for war if war should be necessary.

"Cold evening, Sir, for the time of year," said Mr. Moulder, walking up to the fire-place, and rolling the lumps of his forehead about in his attempt at a frown. In spite of his terrible burden of flesh, Mr. Moulder could look angry on occasions, but he could only do so when he was angry. He was not gifted with a command of his facial muscles.

"Yes," said Mr. Dockwrath, not taking his eyes from off the Leeds and Halifax Chronicle. "It is coldish. Waiter, bring me a cigar."

This was very provoking, as must be confessed. Mr. Moulder had not been prepared to take any step toward turning the gentleman out, though doubtless he might have done so had he chosen to exercise his prerogative. But he did expect that the gentleman would have acknowledged the weakness of his footing by moving himself a little toward one side of the fire, and he did not expect that he would have presumed to smoke without asking whether the practice was held to be objectionable by the legal possessors of the room. Mr. Dockwrath was free of any such pusillanimity. "Waiter," he said again, "bring me a cigar, d'ye hear?"

The great heart of Moulder could not stand this unmoved. He had been an accustomed visitor to that room for fifteen years, and had always done his best to preserve the commercial code unsullied. He was now so well known that no one else ever presumed to take the chair at the four o'clock commercial dinner if he were present. It was incumbent on him to stand forward and make a fight, more especially in the presence of Kantwise, who was by no means stanch to his order. Kantwise would at all times have been glad to have outsiders in the room, in order that he might puff his tables and, if possible, effect a sale—a mode of proceeding held in much aversion by the upright, old-fashioned commercial mind.

"Sir," said Mr. Moulder, having become very red about the cheeks and chin, "I and this gentleman are going to have a bit of supper, and it ain't accustomed to smoke in commercial rooms during meals. You know the rules no doubt if you're commercial yourself—as I suppose you are, seeing you in this room."

Now Mr. Moulder was wrong in his law, as he himself was very well aware. Smoking is allowed in all commercial rooms when the dinner has been some hour or so off the table. But then it was necessary that he should hit the stranger in some way, and the chances were that the stranger would know nothing about commercial law. Nor did he; so he merely looked Mr. Moulder hard in the face. But Mr. Kantwise knew the laws well enough, and as he saw before him a possible purchaser of metallic tables, he came to the assistance of the attorney.

"I think you are a little wrong there, Mr. Moulder; eh, ain't you?" said he.

"Wrong about what?" said Moulder, turning very sharply upon his base-minded compatriot.

"Well, as to smoking. It's nine o'clock, and if the gentleman—"

"I don't care a brass farthing about the clock," said the other; "but when I'm going to have a bit of steak with my tea, in my own room, I chooses to have it comfortable."

"Goodness me, Mr. Moulder, how many times have I seen you sitting there with a pipe in your mouth, and half a dozen gents eating their teas the while in this very room? The rule of the case I take it to be this: when—"

"Bother your rules."

"Well, it was you spoke of them."

"The question I take to be this," said Moulder, now emboldened by the opposition he had received. "Has the gentleman any right to be in this room at all, or has he not? Is he commercial, or is he—miscellaneous? That's the chat, as I take it."

"You're on the square there, I must allow," said Kantwise.

"James," said Moulder, appealing with authority to the waiter, who had remained in the room during the controversy; and now Mr. Moulder was determined to do his duty and vindicate his profession, let the consequences be what they might. "James, is that gentleman commercial, or is he not?"

It was clearly necessary now that Mr. Dockwrath himself should take his own part and fight his own battle. "Sir," said he, turning to Mr. Moulder, "I think you'll find it extremely difficult to define that word—extremely difficult. In this enterprising country all men are more or less commercial."

"Hear! hear!" said Mr. Kantwise.

"That's gammon," said Mr. Moulder.

"Gammon it may be," said Mr. Dockwrath, "but nevertheless it's right in law. Taking the word in its broadest, strictest, and most intelligible sense, I am a commercial gentleman; and as such I do maintain that I have a full right to the accommodation of this public room."

"That's very well put," said Mr. Kantwise.

"Waiter," thundered out Mr. Moulder as though he imagined that that functionary was down the yard at the tap-room instead of standing within three feet of his elbow. "Is this gent a commercial, or is he not? Because if not—then I'll trouble you to send Mr. Crump here. My compliments to Mr. Crump, and I wish to see him." Now Mr. Crump was the landlord of the Bull Inn.

"Master's just stepped out, down the street," said James.

"Why don't you answer my question, Sir?" said Moulder, becoming redder and still more red about his shirt-collars.

"The gent said as how he was 'mercial,'" said the poor man. "Was I to go to contradict a gent, and tell him he wasn't when he said as how he was?"

"If you please," said Mr. Dockwraith, "we will not bring the waiter into this discussion. I asked for the commercial room, and he did his duty in showing me to the door of it. The fact I take to be this; in the south of England the rules to which you refer are not kept so strictly as in these more mercantile localities."

"I've always observed that," said Kantwise.

"I traveled for three years in Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire," said Moulder, "and the commercial rooms were as well kept there as any I ever see."

"I alluded to Surrey and Kent," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"They're uncommonly miscellaneous in Surrey and Kent," said Kantwise. "There's no doubt in the world about that."

"If the gentleman means to say that he's come in here because he didn't know the custom of the country, I've no more to say, of course," said Moulder. "And in that case, I, for one, shall be very happy if the gentleman can make himself comfortable in this room as a stranger, and I may say guest—paying his own shot, of course."

"And as for me, I shall be delighted," said Kantwise. "I never did like too much exclusiveness. What's the use of bottling one's self up? that's what I always say. Besides, there's no charity in it. We gents as are always on the road should show a little charity to them as ain't so well accustomed to the work."

At this allusion to charity Mr. Moulder snuffed through his nose to show his great disgust, but he made no further answer. Mr. Dockwrath, who was determined not to yield, but who had nothing to gain by further fighting, bowed his head, and declared that he felt very much obliged. Whether or no there was any touch of irony in his tone, Mr. Moulder's ears were not fine enough to discover. So they now sat round the fire together, the attorney still keeping his seat in the middle. And then Mr. Moulder ordered his little bit of steak with his tea. "With the gravy in it, James," he said, solemnly. "And a bit of fat, and a few slices of onion—thin mind, put on raw, not with all the taste fried out; and tell the cook if she don't do it as it should be done, I'll be down into the kitchen and do it myself. You'll join me, Kantwise, eh?"

"Well, I think not; I dined at three, you know."

"Dined at three! What of that? a dinner at three won't last a man forever. You might as well join me."

"No, I think not. Have you got such a thing as a nice red herring in the house, James?"

"Get one round the corner, Sir."

"Do, there's a good fellow; and I'll take it for a relish with my tea. I'm not so fond of your solids three times a day. They heat the blood too much."

"Bother," grunted Moulder; and then they went to their evening meal, over which we will not disturb them. The steak, we may presume, was cooked aright, as Mr. Moulder did not visit the kitchen, and Mr. Kantwise no doubt made good play with his unsubstantial dainty, as he spoke no further till his meal was altogether finished.

"Did you ever hear any thing of that Mr. Mason who lives near Bradford?" asked Mr. Kantwise, addressing himself to Mr. Moulder, as soon as the things had been cleared from the table, and that latter gentleman had been furnished with a pipe and a supply of cold without.

"I remember his father when I was a boy," said Moulder, not troubling himself to take his pipe from his mouth. "Mason and Martock in the Old Jewry—very good people they were too."

"He's decently well off now, I suppose, isn't he?" said Kantwise, turning away his face, and looking at his companion out of the corners of his eyes.

"I suppose he is. That place there by the road-side is all his own, I take it. Have you been at him with some of your rusty, rickety tables and chairs?"

"Mr. Moulder, you forget that there is a gentleman here who won't understand that you're at your jokes. I was doing business at Groby Park, but I found the party uncommon hard to deal with."

"Didn't complete the transaction?"

"Well, no, not exactly; but I intend to call again. He's close enough himself, is Mr. Mason. But his lady, Mrs. M.! Lord love you, Mr. Moulder, that is a woman!"

"She is, is she? As for me I never have none of these private dealings. It don't suit my book at all; nor it ain't what I've been accustomed to. If a man's wholesale, let him be wholesale." And then, having enunciated this excellent opinion with much energy, he took a long pull at his brandy-and-water.

"Very old-fashioned, Mr. Moulder," said Kantwise, looking round the corner, then shutting his eyes and shaking his head.

"Maybe," said Moulder, "and yet none the worse for that. I call it hawking and peddling, that going round the country with your goods on your back. It ain't trade." And then there was a lull in the conversation, Mr. Kantwise, who was a very religious gentleman, having closed his eyes, and being occupied with some internal anathema against Mr. Moulder.

"Begging your pardon, Sir, I think you were talking about one Mr. Mason who lives in these parts," said Dockwrath.

"Exactly. Joseph Mason, Esq., of Groby Park," said Mr. Kantwise, now turning his face upon the attorney.

"I suppose I shall be likely to find him at home to-morrow, if I call?"

"Certainly, Sir, certainly; leastwise I should say so. Any personal acquaintance with Mr. Mason, Sir? If so, I meant nothing offensive by my allusion to the lady, Sir; nothing at all, I can assure you."

"The lady's nothing to me, Sir, nor the gentleman either; only that I have a little business with him."

"Shall be very happy to join you in a gig, Sir, to-morrow, as far as Groby Park; or fly, if more convenient. I shall only take a few patterns with me, and they're no weight at all; none in the least, Sir. They go on behind, and you wouldn't know it, Sir." To this, however, Mr. Dockwrath would not assent. As he wanted to see Mr. Mason very specially, he should go early, and preferred going by himself.

"No offense, I hope," said Mr. Kantwise.

"None in the least," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"And if you would allow me, Sir, to have the pleasure of showing you a few of my patterns, I'm sure I should be delighted." This he said, observing that Mr. Moulder was sitting over his empty glass with the pipe in his hand and his eyes fast closed. "I think, Sir, I could show you an article that would please you very much. You see, Sir, that new ideas are coming in every day, and wood, Sir, is altogether going out—altogether going out as regards furniture. In another twenty years, Sir, there won't be such a thing as a wooden table in the country, unless with some poor person that can't afford to refurnish. Believe me, Sir, iron's the thing nowadays."

"And Indian rubber," said Dockwrath.

"Yes, Indian rubber's wonderful too. Are you in that line, Sir?"

"Well, no; not exactly."

"It's not like iron, Sir. You can't make a dinner-table for fourteen people out of Indian rubber that will shut up into a box 3—6 by 2—4 deep, and 2—6 broad. Why, Sir, I can let you have a set of drawing-room furniture for fifteen ten that you've never seen equaled in wood for three times the money; ornamented in the tastiest way, Sir, and fit for any lady's drawing-room or boodoor. The ladies of quality are all getting them now for their boodoors. There's three tables, eight chairs, easy rocking-chair, music-stand, stool to match, and pair of stand-up screens, all gilt in real Louey catorse; and it goes in three boxes 4—2 by 2—1 and 2—3. Think of that, Sir. For fifteen ten and the boxes in." Then there was a pause, after which Mr. Kantwise added, "If ready money, the carriage paid." And then he turned his head very much away, and looked back very hard at his expected customer.

"I'm afraid the articles are not in my line," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"It's the tastiest present for a gentleman to make to his lady that has come out since—since those sort of things have come out at all. You'll let me show you the articles, Sir. It will give me the sincerest pleasure." And Mr. Kantwise proposed to leave the room in order that he might introduce the three boxes in question.

"They would not be at all in my way," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"The trouble would be nothing," said Mr. Kantwise, "and it gives me the greatest pleasure to make them known when I find any one who can appreciate such undoubted luxuries;" and so saying Mr. Kantwise skipped out of the room, and soon returned with James and Boots, each of the three bearing on his shoulder a deal box nearly as big as a coffin, all of which were deposited in different parts of the room. Mr. Moulder in the mean time snored heavily, his head falling on to his breast every now and again. But nevertheless he held fast by his pipe.

Mr. Kantwise skipped about the room with wonderful agility, unfastening the boxes, and taking out the contents, while Joe the boots and James the waiter stood by assisting. They had never yet seen the glories of these chairs and tables, and were therefore not unwilling to be present. It was singular to see how ready Mr. Kantwise was at the work, how recklessly he threw aside the whitey-brown paper in which the various pieces of painted iron were enveloped, and with what a practiced hand he put together one article after another. First there was a round loo-table, not quite so large in its circumference as some people might think desirable, but, nevertheless, a round loo-table. The pedestal with its three claws was all together. With a knowing touch Mr. Kantwise separated the bottom of what looked like a yellow stick, and, lo! there were three legs, which he placed carefully on the ground. Then a small bar was screwed on to the top, and over the bar was screwed the leaf, or table itself, which consisted of three pieces unfolding with hinges. These, when the screw had been duly fastened in the centre, opened out upon the bar, and there was the table complete.

It was certainly a "tasty" article, and the pride with which Mr. Kantwise glanced back at it was quite delightful. The top of the table was blue, with a red bird of paradise in the middle; and the edges of the table, to the breadth of a couple of inches, were yellow. The pillar also was yellow, as were the three legs. "It's the real Louey catorse," said Mr. Kantwise, stooping down to go on with table number two, which was, as he described it, a "chess," having the proper number of blue and light-pink squares marked upon it; but this also had been made Louey catorse with reference to its legs and edges. The third table was a "sofa," of proper shape, but rather small in size. Then, one after another, he brought forth and screwed up the chairs, stools, and sundry screens, and within a quarter of an hour he had put up the whole set complete. The red bird of paradise and the blue ground appeared on all, as did also the yellow legs and edgings which gave to them their peculiarly fashionable character. "There," said Mr. Kantwise, looking at them with fond admiration, "I don't mind giving a personal guarantee that there's nothing equal to that for the money either in England or in France."

"They are very nice," said Mr. Dockwrath. When a man has had produced before him for his own and sole delectation any article or articles, how can he avoid eulogium? Mr. Dockwrath found himself obliged to pause, and almost feared that he should find himself obliged to buy.

"Nice! I should rather think they are," said Mr. Kantwise, becoming triumphant; "and for fifteen ten, delivered, boxes included. There's nothing like iron, Sir, nothing; you may take my word for that. They're so strong, you know. Look here, Sir." And then Mr. Kantwise, taking two of the pieces of whitey-brown paper which had been laid aside, carefully spread one on the centre of the round table, and the other on the seat of one of the chairs. Then lightly poising himself on his toe, he stepped on to the chair, and from thence on to the table. In that position he skillfully brought his feet together, so that his weight was directly on the leg, and gracefully waved his hands over his head. James and Boots stood by admiring, with open mouths, and Mr. Dockwrath, with his hands in his pockets, was meditating whether he could not give the order without complying with the terms as to ready money.

"Look at that for strength," said Mr. Kantwise from his exalted position. "I don't think any lady of your acquaintance, Sir, would allow you to stand on her rosewood or mahogany loo-table. And if she did, you would not like to adventure it yourself. But look at this for strength," and he waved his arms abroad, still keeping his feet skillfully together in the same exact position.

At that moment Mr. Moulder awoke. "So you've got your iron traps out, have you?" said he. "What; you're there, are you? Upon my word I'd sooner you than me."

"I certainly should not like to see you up here, Mr. Moulder. I doubt whether even this table would bear five-and-twenty stone. Joe, lend me your shoulder, there's a good fellow." And then Mr. Kantwise, bearing very lightly on the chair, descended to the ground without accident.

"Now, that's what I call gammon," said Moulder.

"What is gammon, Mr. Moulder?" said the other, beginning to be angry.

"It's all gammon. The chairs and tables is gammon, and so is the stools and the screens."

"Mr. Moulder, I didn't call your tea and coffee and brandy gammon."

"You can't; and you wouldn't do any harm if you did. Hubbles and Grease are too well known in Yorkshire for you to hurt them. But as for all that show-off and gimerack-work, I tell you fairly it ain't what I call trade, and it ain't fit for a commercial room. It's gammon, gammon, gammon! James, give me a bed-candle." And so Mr. Moulder took himself off to bed.

"I think I'll go too," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"You'll let me put you up the set, eh?" said Mr. Kantwise.

"Well, I'll think about it," said the attorney. "I'll not just give you an answer to-night. Good-night, Sir; I'm very much obliged to you." And he too went, leaving Mr. Kantwise to repack his chairs and tables with the assistance of James the waiter.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MASONS OF GROBY PARK.

GROBY PARK is about seven miles from Leeds, in the direction of Bradford, and thither on the morning after the scene described in the last chapter Mr. Dockwrath was driven in one of the gigs belonging to the Bull Inn. The park itself is spacious, but is flat and uninteresting, being surrounded by a thin belt of new-looking fir-trees, and containing but very little old or handsome timber. There are on the high road two very important lodges, between which is a large ornamented gate, and from thence an excellent road leads to the mansion, situated in the very middle of the domain. The house is Greek in its style of architecture—at least so the owner says; and if a portico with a pediment and seven Ionic columns makes a house Greek, the house in Groby Park undoubtedly is Greek.

Here lived Mr. and Mrs. Mason, the three

Misses Mason, and occasionally the two young Messrs. Mason; for the master of Groby Park was blessed with five children. He himself was a big, broad, heavy-browed man, in whose composition there was nothing of tenderness, nothing of poetry, and nothing of taste; but I can not say that he was on the whole a bad man. He was just in his dealings, or at any rate endeavored to be so. He strove hard to do his duty as a county magistrate against very adverse circumstances. He endeavored to enable his tenants and laborers to live. He was severe to his children, and was not loved by them; but nevertheless they were dear to him, and he endeavored to do his duty by them. The wife of his bosom was not a pleasant woman, but nevertheless he did his duty by her; that is, he neither deserted her, nor beat her, nor locked her up. I am not sure that he would not have been justified in doing one of these three things, or even all the three; for Mrs. Mason, of Groby Park, was not a pleasant woman.

But yet he was a bad man in that he could never forget and never forgive. His mind and heart were equally harsh and hard and inflexible. He was a man who considered that it behooved him as a man to resent all injuries, and to have his pound of flesh in all cases. In his inner thoughts he had ever boasted to himself that he had paid all men all that he owed. He had, so he thought, injured no one in any of the relations of life. His tradesmen got their money regularly. He answered every man's letter. He exacted nothing from any man for which he did not pay. He never ill-used a servant either by bad language or by overwork. He never amused himself, but devoted his whole time to duties. He would fain even have been hospitable, could he have gotten his neighbors to come to him and have induced his wife to put upon the table sufficient food for them to eat.

Such being his virtues, what right had any one to injure him? When he got from his grocer adulterated coffee—he analyzed the coffee, as his half-brother had done the guano—he would have flayed the man alive if the law would have allowed him. Had he not paid the man monthly, giving him the best price as though for the best article? When he was taken in with a warranty for a horse, he pursued the culprit to the uttermost. Maid-servants who would not come from their bedrooms at six o'clock he would himself disturb while enjoying their stolen slumbers. From his children he exacted all titles of respect, because he had a right to them. He wanted nothing that belonged to any one else, but he could not endure that aught should be kept from him which he believed to be his own. It may be imagined, therefore, in what light he esteemed Lady Mason and her son, and how he regarded their residence at Orley Farm, seeing that he firmly believed that Orley Farm was his own, if all the truth were known.

I have already hinted that Mrs. Mason was not a delightful woman. She had been a beauty, and still imagined that she had not lost all pretension to be so considered. She spent, therefore, a considerable portion of her day in her dressing-room, spent a great deal of money for clothes, and gave herself sundry airs. She was a little woman with long eyes, and regular eyelashes, with a straight nose, and thin lips, and regular teeth. Her face was oval, and her hair was brown. It had at least once been all brown, and that which was now seen was brown also. But, nevertheless, although she was possessed of all these charms, you might look at her for ten days together, and on the eleventh you would not know her if you met her in the streets.

But the appearance of Mrs. Mason was not her forte. She had been a beauty; but if it had been her lot to be known in history, it was not as a beauty that she would have been famous. Parsimony was her great virtue, and a power of saving her strong point. I have said that she spent much money in dress, and some people will perhaps think that the two points of character are not compatible. Such people know nothing of a true spirit of parsimony. It is from the backs and bellies of other people that savings are made with the greatest constancy and the most satisfactory results.

The parsimony of a mistress of a household is best displayed on matters eatable—on matters eatable and drinkable; for there is a fine scope for domestic savings in tea, beer, and milk. And in such matters chiefly did Mrs. Mason operate, going as far as she dared toward starving even her husband. But nevertheless she would feed herself in the middle of the day, having a roast fowl with bread sauce in her own room. The miser who starves himself and dies without an ounce of flesh on his bones, while his skinny head lies on a bag of gold, is, after all, respectable. There has been a grand passion in his life, and that grandest work of man, self-denial. You can not altogether despise one who has clothed himself with rags and fed himself with bone-scrapings, while broadcloth and ortolans were within his easy reach. But there are women, wives and mothers of families, who would give the bone-scrapings to their husbands and the bones to their servants, while they hide the ortolans for themselves; and would dress their children in rags, while they cram chests, drawers, and boxes with silks and satins for their own backs. Such a woman one can thoroughly despise, and even hate; and such a woman was Mrs. Mason, of Groby Park.

I shall not trouble the reader at present with much description of the young Masons. The eldest son was in the army, and the younger at Cambridge, both spending much more money than their father allowed them. Not that he, in this respect, was specially close-fisted. He ascertained what was sufficient—amply sufficient, as he was told by the colonel of the regiment and the tutor of the college—and that amount he allowed, assuring both Joseph and John that if they spent more they would themselves have to pay for it out of the moneys which should enrich them in future years. But how could the sons of such a mother be other than spend-thrifts? Of course they were extravagant; of course they spent more than they should have done; and their father resolved that he would keep his word with them religiously.

The daughters were much less fortunate, having no possible means of extravagance allowed to them. Both the father and mother decided that they should go out into the county society, and therefore their clothing was not absolutely of rags. But any young lady who does go into society, whether it be of county or town, will fully understand the difference between a liberal and a stingy wardrobe. Girls with slender provisions of millinery may be fit to go out—quite fit in their father's eyes; and yet all such going out may be matter of intense pain. It is all very well for the world to say that a girl should be happy without reference to her clothes. Show me such a girl, and I will show you one whom I should be very sorry that a boy of mine should choose as his sweet-heart.

The three Misses Mason, as they always were called by the Groby Park people, had been christened Diana, Creusa, and Penelope, their mother having a passion for classic literature, which she indulged by a use of Lemprière's dictionary. They were not especially pretty, nor were they especially plain. They were well grown and healthy, and quite capable of enjoying themselves in any of the amusements customary to young ladies—if only the opportunities were afforded them.

Mr. Dockwrath had thought it well to write to Mr. Mason, acquainting that gentleman with his intended visit. Mr. Mason, he said to himself, would recognize his name, and know whence he came, and under such circumstances would be sure to see him, although the express purpose of the proposed interview should not have been explained to him. Such in result was exactly the case. Mr. Mason did remember the name of Dockwrath, though he had never hitherto seen the bearer of it; and as the letter was dated from Hamworth, he felt sufficient interest in the matter to await at home the coming of his visitor.

"I know your name, Mr. Mason, Sir, and have known it long," said Mr. Dockwrath, seating himself in the chair which was offered to him in the magistrate's study, "though I never had the pleasure of seeing you before—to my knowledge. My name is Dockwrath, Sir, and I am a solicitor. I live at Hamworth, and I married the daughter of old Mr. Usbech, Sir, whom you will remember."

Mr. Mason listened attentively as these details were uttered before him so clearly, but he said nothing, merely bowing his head at each separate statement. He knew all about old Usbech's daughter nearly as well as Mr. Dockwrath did himself, but he was a man who knew how to be silent upon occasions.

"I was too young, Sir," continued Dockwrath, "when you had that trial about Orley Farm to have any thing to do with the matter myself, but nevertheless I remember all the circumstances as though it was yesterday. I suppose, Sir, you remember them also?"

"Yes, Mr. Dockwrath, I remember them very well."

"Well, Sir, my impression has always been that—" And then the attorney stopped. It was quite his intention to speak out plainly before Mr. Mason, but he was anxious that that gentleman should speak out too. At any rate, it might be well that he should be induced to express some little interest in the matter.

"Your impression, you say, has always been—" said Mr. Mason, repeating the words of his companion, and looking as ponderous and grave as ever. His countenance, however, expressed nothing but his usual ponderous solemnity.

"My impression always was—that there was something that had not been as yet found out."

"What sort of thing, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"Well; some secret. I don't think that your lawyers managed the matter well, Mr. Mason."

"You think you would have done it better, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"I don't say that, Mr. Mason. I was only a lad at the time, and could not have managed it at all. But they didn't ferret about enough. Mr. Mason, there's a deal better evidence than any that is given by word of mouth. A clever counsel can turn a witness pretty nearly any way he likes, but he can't do that with little facts. He hasn't the time, you see, to get round them. Your lawyers, Sir, didn't get up the little facts as they should have done."

"And you have got them up since, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"I don't say that, Mr. Mason. You see all my interest lies in maintaining the codicil. My wife's fortune came to her under that deed. To be sure that's gone and spent long since, and the Lord Chancellor with all the judges couldn't enforce restitution; but, nevertheless, I wouldn't wish that any one should have a claim against me on that account."

"Perhaps you will not object to say what it is that you do wish?"

"I wish to see right done, Mr. Mason; that's all. I don't think that Lady Mason or her son have any right to the possession of that place. I don't think that that codicil was a correct instrument; and in that case of Mason versus Mason I don't think that you and your friends got to the bottom of it." And then Mr. Dockwrath leaned back in his chair with an inward determination to say nothing more until Mr. Mason should make some sign.

That gentleman, however, still remained ponderous and heavy, and therefore there was a short period of silence—"And have you got to the bottom of it since, Mr. Dockwrath?" at last he said.

"I don't say that I have," said the attorney.

"Might I ask, then, what it is you purpose to effect by the visit with which you have honored me? Of course you are aware that these are very private matters; and although I should feel myself under an obligation to you, or to any man who might assist me to arrive at any true facts which have hitherto been concealed, I am not disposed to discuss the affair with a stranger on grounds of mere suspicion."

"I shouldn't have come here, Mr. Mason, at very great expense, and personal inconvenience to myself in my profession, if I had not some good reason for doing so. I don't think that you ever got to the bottom of that matter, and I can't say that I have done so now; I haven't even tried. But I tell you what, Mr. Mason; if you wish it, I think I could put you in the way of—trying."

"My lawyers are Messrs. Round and Crook, of Bedford Row. Will it not be better that you should go to them, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"No, Mr. Mason. I don't think it will be better that I should go to them. I know Round and Crook well, and don't mean to say a word against them; but if I go any farther in this affair I must do it with the principal. I am not going to cut my own throat for the sake of mending any man's little finger. I have a family of sixteen children, Mr. Mason, and I have to look about very sharp—very sharp indeed." Then there was another pause, and Mr. Dockwrath began to perceive that Mr. Mason was not by nature an open, demonstrative, or communicative man. If any thing further was to be done, he himself must open out a little. "The fact is, Mr. Mason, that I have come across documents which you should have had at that trial. Round and Crook ought to have had them, only they weren't half sharp. Why, Sir, Mr. Usbech had been your father's man of business for years upon years, and yet they didn't half go through his papers. They turned 'em over and looked at 'em; but never thought of seeing what little facts might be proved."

"And these documents are with you now, here?"

"No, Mr. Mason, I am not so soft as that, I never carry about original documents unless when ordered to prove. Copies of one or two items I have made; not regular copies, Mr. Mason, but just a line or two to refresh my memory." And Mr. Dockwrath took a small letter-case out of his breast coat-pocket.

By this time Mr. Mason's curiosity had been roused, and he began to think it possible that his visitor had discovered information which might be of importance to him. "Are you going to show me any document?" said he.

"That's as may be," said the attorney. "I don't know as yet whether you care to see it. I have come a long way to do you a service, and it seems to me you are rather shy of coming forward to meet me. As I said before, I've a very heavy family, and I'm not going to cut the nose off my own face to put money into any other man's pocket. What do you think my journey down here will cost me, including loss of time, and interruption to my business?"

"Look here, Mr. Dockwrath, if you are really able to put me into possession of any facts regarding the Orley Farm estate which I ought to know, I will see that you are compensated for your time and trouble. Messrs. Round and Crook—"

"I'll have nothing to do with Round and Crook. So that's settled, Mr. Mason."

"Then, Mr. Dockwrath—"

"Half a minute, Mr. Mason. I'll have nothing to do with Round and Crook; but as I know you to be a gentleman and a man of honor, I'll put you in possession of what I've discovered, and leave it to you afterward to do what you think right about my expenses, time, and services. You won't forget that it is a long way from Hamworth to Groby Park. And if you should succeed—"

"If I am to look at this document I must do so without pledging myself to any thing," said Mr. Mason, still with much solemnity. He had great doubts as to his new acquaintance, and much feared that he was derogating from his dignity as a county magistrate and owner of Groby Park in holding any personal intercourse with him; but nevertheless he could not resist the temptation. He most firmly believed that that codicil had not expressed the genuine last will and fair disposition of property made by his father, and it might certainly be the case that proof of all that he believed was to be found among the papers of the old lawyer. He hated Lady Mason with all his power of hatred, and if there did, even yet, exist for him a chance of upsetting her claims and ruining her before the world, he was not the man to forego that chance.

"Well, Sir, you shall see it," said Mr. Dockwrath; "or rather hear it, for there is not much to see." And so saying he extracted from his pocket-book a very small bit of paper.

"I should prefer to read it, if it's all the same to you, Mr. Dockwrath. I shall understand it much better in that way."

"As you like, Mr. Mason," said the attorney, handing him the small bit of paper. "You will understand, Sir, that it's no real copy, but only a few dates and particulars, just jotted down to assist my own memory." The document, supported by which Mr. Dockwrath had come down to Yorkshire, consisted of half a sheet of note-paper, and the writing upon this covered hardly the half of it. The words which Mr. Mason read were as follows:

"Date of codicil. 14th July, 18—.

"Witnesses to the instrument. John Kenneby; Bridget Bolster; Jonathan Usbech. N.B. Jonathan Usbech died before the testator.

"Mason and Martock. Deed of separation; dated 14th July, 18—.

"Executed at Orley Farm.

"Witnesses, John Kenneby and Bridget Bolster. Deed was prepared in the office of Jonathan Usbech, and probably executed in his presence."

That was all that was written on the paper, and Mr. Mason read the words to himself three times before he looked up or said any thing concerning them. He was not a man quick at receiving new ideas into his mind, or of understanding new points; but that which had once become intelligible to him and been made his own remained so always. "Well," said he, when he read the above words for the third time.

"You don't see it, Sir?" said Mr. Dockwrath.

"See what?" said Mr. Mason, still looking at the scrap of paper.

"Why, the dates, to begin with."

"I see that the dates are the same—the 14th of July in the same year."

"Well," said Mr. Dockwrath, looking very keenly into the magistrate's face.

"Well," said Mr. Mason, looking over the paper at his boot.

"John Kenneby and Bridget Bolster were witnesses to both the instruments," said the attorney.

"So I see," said the magistrate.

"But I don't remember that it came out in evidence that either of them recollected having been called on for two signatures on the same day."

"No; there was nothing of that came out, or was even hinted at."

"No; nothing even hinted at, Mr. Mason, as you justly observe. That is what I mean by saying that Round and Crook's people didn't get up their little facts. Believe me, Sir, there are men in the profession out of London who know quite as much as Round and Crook. They ought to have had those facts, seeing that the very copy of the document was turned over by their hands." And Mr. Dockwrath hit the table heavily in the warmth of his indignation against his negligent professional brethren. Earlier in the interview Mr. Mason would have been made very angry by such freedom, but he was not angry now.

"Yes; they ought to have known it," said he. But he did not even yet see the point. He merely saw that there was a point worth seeing.

"Known it! Of course they ought to have known it. Look here, Mr. Mason! If I had it on my mind that I'd thrown over a client of mine by such carelessness as that, I'd—I'd strike my own name off the rolls; I would indeed. I never could look a counsel in the face again, if I'd neglected to brief him with such facts as those. I suppose it was carelessness; eh, Mr. Mason?"

"Oh yes; I'm afraid so," said Mr. Mason, still rather in the dark.

"They could have had no object in keeping it back, I should say."

"No; none in life. But let us see, Mr. Dockwrath; how does it bear upon us? The dates are the same, and the witnesses the same."

"The deed of separation is genuine. There is no doubt about that."

"Oh, you're sure of that?"

"Quite certain. I found it entered in the old office-books. It was the last of a lot of such documents executed between Mason and Martock after the old man gave up the business. You see she was always with him, and knew all about it."

"About the partnership deed?"

"Of course she did. She's a clever woman, Mr. Mason; very clever, and it's almost a pity that she should come to grief. She has carried it on so well; hasn't she?"

Mr. Mason's face now became very black. "Why," said he, "if what you seem to allege be true, she must be a—a—a—. What do you mean, Sir, by pity?"

Mr. Dockwrath shrugged his shoulders. "It is very blue," said he, "uncommon blue."

"She must be a swindler—a common swindler. Nay, worse than that."

"Oh yes, a deal worse than that, Mr. Mason. And as for common—according to my way of thinking there's nothing at all common about it. I look upon it as about the best got-up plant I ever remember to have heard of. I do, indeed, Mr. Mason." The attorney during the last ten minutes of the conversation had quite altered his tone, understanding that he had already achieved a great part of his object; but Mr. Mason in his intense anxiety did not observe this. Had Mr. Dockwrath, in commencing the conversation, talked about "plants" and "blue," Mr. Mason would probably have rung his bell for the servant. "If it's any thing, it's forgery," said Mr. Dockwrath, looking his companion full in the face.

"I always felt sure that my father never intended to sign such a codicil as that."

"He never did sign it, Mr. Mason."

"And—and the witnesses!" said Mr. Mason, still not enlightened as to the true extent of the attorney's suspicion.

"They signed the other deed; that is two of them did. There is no doubt about that—on that very day. They certainly did witness a signature made by the old gentleman in his own room on that 14th of July. The original of that document, with the date and their names, will be forthcoming soon enough."

"Well," said Mr. Mason.

"But they did not witness two signatures."

"You think not, eh?"

"I'm sure of it. The girl Bolster would have remembered it, and would have said so. She was sharp enough."

"Who wrote all the names then at the foot of the will?" said Mr. Mason.

"Ah! that's the question. Who did write them? We know very well, Mr. Mason, you and I that is, who did not. And having come to that, I think we may give a very good guess who did."

And then they both sat silent for some three or four minutes. Mr. Dockwrath was quite at his ease, rubbing his chin with his hand, playing with a paper-knife which he had taken from the study table, and waiting till it should please Mr. Mason to renew the conversation. Mr. Mason was not at his ease, though all idea of affecting any reserve before the attorney had left him. He was thinking how best he might confound and destroy the woman who had robbed him for so many years; who had defied him, got the better of him, and put him to terrible cost; who had vexed his spirit through his whole life, deprived him of content, and had been to him as a thorn ever present in a festering sore. He had always believed that she had defrauded him, but this belief had been qualified by the unbelief of others. It might have been, he had half thought, that the old man had signed the codicil in his dotage, having been cheated and bullied into it by the woman. There had been no day in her life on which he would not have ruined her, had it been in his power to do so. But now—now, new and grander ideas were breaking in upon his mind. Could it be possible that he might live to see her, not merely deprived of her ill-gained money, but standing in the dock as a felon to receive sentence for her terrible misdeeds? If that might be so, would he not receive great compensation for all that he had suffered? Would it not be sweet to his sense of justice that both of them should thus at last have their own? He did not even yet understand all that Mr. Dockwrath suspected. He did not fully perceive why the woman was supposed to have chosen as the date of her forgery the date of that other genuine deed. But he did understand, he did perceive—at least so he thought—that new and perhaps conclusive evidence of her villainy was at last within his reach.

"And what shall we do now, Mr. Dockwrath?" he said at last.

"Well; am I to understand that you do me the honor of asking my advice upon that question as being your lawyer?"

This question immediately brought Mr. Mason back to business that he did understand. "A man in my position can not very well change his legal advisers at a moment's notice. You must be very well aware of that, Mr. Dockwrath. Messrs. Round and Crook—"

"Messrs. Round and Crook, Sir, have neglected your business in a most shameful manner. Let me tell you that, Sir."

"Well; that's as may be. I'll tell you what I'll do, Mr. Dockwrath; I'll think over this matter in quiet, and then I'll come up to town. Perhaps when there I may expect the honor of a further visit from you."

"And you won't mention the matter to Round and Crook?"

"I can't undertake to say that, Mr. Dockwrath. I think it will perhaps be better that I should mention it, and then see you afterwards."

"And how about my expenses down here?"

Just at this moment there came a light tap at the study door, and before the master of the house could give or withhold permission the mistress of the house entered the room. "My dear," she said, "I didn't know that you were engaged."

"Yes, I am engaged," said the gentleman.

"Oh, I'm sure I beg pardon. Perhaps this is the gentleman from Hamworth?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Mr. Dockwrath. "I am the gentleman from Hamworth. I hope I have the pleasure of seeing you very well, ma'am?" And getting up from his chair he bowed politely.

"Mr. Dockwrath, Mrs. Mason," said the lady's husband, introducing them; and then Mrs. Mason courtesied to the stranger. She too was very anxious to know what might be the news from Hamworth.

"Mr. Dockwrath will lunch with us, my dear," said Mr. Mason. And then the lady, on hospitable cares intent, left them again to themselves.

CHAPTER VIII.

MRS. MASON'S HOT LUNCHEON.

THOUGH Mr. Dockwrath was somewhat elated by this invitation to lunch, he was also somewhat abashed by it. He had been far from expecting that Mr. Mason, of Groby Park, would do him any such honor, and was made aware by it of the great hold which he must have made upon the attention of his host. But nevertheless he immediately felt that his hands were to a certain degree tied. He having been invited to sit down at Mr. Mason's table with Mrs. M. and the family, having been treated as though he were a gentleman, and thus being for the time put on a footing of equality with the county magistrate, could not repeat that last important question, "How about my expenses down here?" nor could he immediately go on with the grand subject in any frame of mind which would tend to further his own interests. Having been invited to lunch he could not haggle with due persistency for his share of the business in crushing Lady Mason, nor stipulate that the whole concern should not be trusted to the management of Round and Crook. As a source of pride this invitation to eat was pleasant to him, but he was forced to acknowledge to himself that it interfered with business.

Nor did Mr. Mason feel himself ready to go on with the conversation in the manner in which it had been hitherto conducted. His mind was full of Orley Farm and his wrongs, and he could bring himself to think of nothing else; but he could no longer talk about it to the attorney sitting there in his study. "Will you take a turn about the place while the lunch is getting ready?" he said. So they took their hats and went out into the garden.

"It is dreadful to think of," said Mr. Mason, after they had twice walked in silence the length of a broad gravel terrace.

"What, about her ladyship?" said the attorney.

"Quite dreadful!" and Mr. Mason shuddered. "I don't think I ever heard of any thing so shocking in my life. For twenty years, Mr. Dockwrath, think of that. Twenty years!" and his face as he spoke became almost black with horror.

"It is very shocking," said Mr. Dockwrath—"very shocking. What on earth will be her fate if it be proved against her? She has brought it on herself; that is all that one can say of her."

"D—— her! d—— her!" exclaimed the other, gnashing his teeth with concentrated wrath. "No punishment will be bad enough for her. Hanging would not be bad enough."

"They can't hang her, Mr. Mason," said Mr. Dockwrath, almost frightened by the violence of his companion.

"No; they have altered the laws, giving every encouragement to forgers, villains, and perjurers. But they can give her penal servitude for life. They must do it."

"She is not convicted yet, you know."

"D—— her!" repeated the owner of Groby Park again, as he thought of his twenty years of loss. Eight hundred a year for twenty years had been taken away from him; and he had been worsted before the world after a hard fight. "D—— her!" he continued, in a growl between his teeth. Mr. Dockwrath, when he had first heard his companion say how horrid and dreadful the affair was, had thought that Mr. Mason was alluding to the condition in which the lady had placed herself by her assumed guilt. But it was of his own condition that he was speaking. The idea which shocked him was the thought of the treatment which he himself had undergone. The dreadful thing at which he shuddered was his own ill-usage. As for her—pity for her! Did a man ever pity a rat that had eaten into his choicest dainties?

"The lunch is on the table, Sir," said the Groby Park footman in the Groby Park livery. Under the present household arrangement of Groby Park all the servants lived on board wages. Mrs. Mason did not like this system, though it had about it certain circumstances of economy which recommended it to her; it interfered greatly with the stringent aptitudes of her character and the warmest passion of her heart; it took away from her the delicious power of serving out the servants' food, of locking up the scraps of meat, and of charging the maids with voracity. But, to tell the truth, Mr. Mason had been driven by sheer necessity to take this step, as it had been found impossible to induce his wife to give out sufficient food to enable the servants to live and work. She knew that in not doing so she injured herself; but she could not do it. The knife, in passing through the loaf, would make the portion to be parted with less by one-third than the portion to be retained. Half a pound of salt butter would reduce itself to a quarter of a pound. Portions of meat would become infinitesimal. When standing with viands before her she had not free-will over her hands. She could not bring herself to part with victuals, though she might ruin herself by retaining them. Therefore, by the order of the master, were the servants placed on board wages.

Mr. Dockwrath soon found himself in the dining-room, where the three young ladies with their mamma were already seated at the table. It was a handsome room, and the furniture was handsome; but nevertheless it was a heavy room, and the furniture was heavy. The table was large enough for a party of twelve, and might have borne a noble banquet; as it was the promise was not bad, for there were three large plated covers concealing hot viands, and in some houses lunch means only bread and cheese.

Mr. Mason went through a form of introduction between Mr. Dockwrath and his daughters.

"That is Miss Mason, that Miss Creusa Mason, and this Miss Penelope. John, remove the covers." And the covers were removed, John taking them from the table with a magnificent action of his arm, which I am inclined to think was not innocent of irony. On the dish before the master of the house—a large dish which must, I fancy, have been selected by the cook with some similar attempt at sarcasm—there reposed three scraps, as to the nature of which Mr. Dockwrath, though he looked hard at them, was unable to enlighten himself. But Mr. Mason knew them well, as he now placed his eyes on them for the third time. They were old enemies of his, and his brow again became black as he looked at them. The scraps, in fact, consisted of two drumsticks of a fowl and some indescribable bone out of the back of the same. The original bird had no doubt first revealed all its glories to human eyes—presuming the eyes of the cook to be inhuman—in Mrs. Mason's "boodoor." Then, on the dish before the lady, there were three other morsels, black-looking and very suspicious to the eye, which in the course of conversation were proclaimed to be ham—broiled ham. Mrs. Mason would never allow a ham in its proper shape to come into the room, because it is an article upon which the guests are themselves supposed to operate with the carving-knife. Lastly, on the dish before Miss Creusa there reposed three potatoes.

The face of Mr. Mason became very black as he looked at the banquet which was spread upon his board, and Mrs. Mason, eying him across the table, saw that it was so. She was not a lady who despired such symptoms in her lord, or disregarded in her valor the violence of marital storms. She had quailed more than once or twice under rebuke occasioned by her great domestic virtue, and knew that her husband, though he might put up with much as regarded his own comfort and that of his children, could be very angry at injuries done to his household honor and character as a hospitable English country gentleman.

Consequently, the lady smiled and tried to look self-satisfied as she invited her guest to eat. "This is ham," said she, with a little simper—"broiled ham, Mr. Dockwrath; and there is chicken at the other end; I think they call it—deviled."

"Shall I assist the young ladies to any thing first?" said the attorney, wishing to be polite.

"Nothing, thank you," said Miss Penelope, with a very stiff bow. She also knew that Mr. Dockwrath was an attorney from Hamworth, and considered herself by no means bound to hold any sort of conversation with him.

"My daughters only eat bread and butter in the middle of the day," said the lady. "Creusa, my dear, will you give Mr. Dockwrath a potato. Mr. Mason, Mr. Dockwrath will probably take a bit of that chicken."

"I would recommend him to follow the girls' example, and confine himself to the bread and butter," said the master of the house, pushing about the scraps with his knife and fork. "There is nothing here for him to eat."

"My dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Mason.

"There is nothing here for him to eat," repeated Mr. Mason. "And as far as I can see there is nothing there either. What is it you pretend to have in that dish?"

"My dear!" again exclaimed Mrs. Mason.

"What is it?" repeated the lord of the house in an angry tone.

"Broiled ham, Mr. Mason."

"Then let the ham be brought in," said he. "Diana, ring the bell."

"But the ham is not cooked, Mr. Mason," said the lady. "Broiled ham is always better when it has not been first boiled."

"Is there no cold meat in the house?" he asked.

"I am afraid not," she replied, now trembling a little in anticipation of what might be coming after the stranger should have gone. "You never like large joints yourself, Mr. Mason; and for ourselves we don't eat meat at luncheon."

"Nor any body else either, here," said Mr. Mason, in his anger.

"Pray don't mind me, Mr. Mason," said the attorney; "pray don't, Mr. Mason. I am a very poor fist at lunch; I am indeed."

"I am sure I am very sorry, very sorry, Mr. Mason," continued the lady. "If I had known that an early dinner was required, it should have been provided; although the notice given was so very short."

"I never dine early," said Mr. Dockwrath, thinking that some imputation of a low way of living was conveyed in this supposition that he required a dinner under the pseudonym of a lunch. "I never do, upon my word—we are quite regular at home at half past five, and all I ever take in the middle of the day is a biscuit and a glass of sherry—or perhaps a bite of bread and cheese. Don't be uneasy about me, Mrs. Mason."

The three young ladies, having now finished their repast, got up from the table and retired, following each other out of the room in a line. Mrs. Mason remained for a minute or two longer, and then she also went. "The carriage has been ordered at three, Mr. M.," she said. "Shall we have the pleasure of your company?" "No," growled the husband. And then the lady went, sweeping a low courtesy to Mr. Dockwrath as she passed out of the room.

There was again a silence between the host and his guest for some two or three minutes, during which Mr. Mason was endeavoring to get the lunch out of his head, and to redirect his whole mind to Lady Mason and his hopes of vengeance. There is nothing perhaps so generally consoling to a man as a well-established grievance; a feeling of having been injured, on which his mind can brood from hour to hour, allowing him to plead his own cause in his own court, within his own heart—and always to plead it successfully. At last Mr. Mason succeeded, and he could think of his enemy's fraud and forget his wife's meanness. "I suppose I may as well order my gig now," said Mr. Dockwrath, as soon as his host had arrived at this happy frame of mind.

"Your gig? ah, well. Yes. I do not know that I need detain you any longer. I can assure you that I am much obliged to you, Mr. Dockwrath, and I shall hope to see you in London very shortly."

"You are determined to go to Round and Crook, I suppose?"

"Oh, certainly."

"You are wrong, Sir. They'll throw you over again as sure as your name is Mason."

"Mr. Dockwrath, you must, if you please, allow me to judge of that myself."

"Oh, of course, Sir, of course. But I'm sure that a gentleman like you, Mr. Mason, will understand—"

"I shall understand that I can not expect your services, Mr. Dockwrath—your valuable time and services—without remunerating you for them. That shall be fully explained to Messrs. Round and Crook."

"Very well, Sir; very well. As long as I am paid for what I do, I am content. A professional gentleman of course expects that. How is he to get along else; particularly with sixteen children?" And then Mr. Dockwrath got into the gig, and was driven back to the Bull at Leeds.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE.

[CONCLUDED.]

RELIEVED by the result of Gibault's diplomacy at Vincennes from apprehension of an attack from that quarter, Clarke turned his whole attention to the pacification of the neighboring Indian tribes. His plan was to treat them with the strictest justice, adopting a manner kind, haughty, or contemptuous, as occasion demanded; but always reserved and dignified. Maintaining the superiority of the white men, he never allowed himself to be provoked into any unseemly display of passion or excitement. Seldom offering presents; when he did do so, it was always with the distinct understanding that it was a mere act of grace, and not intended as a bribe. Though anxious to secure the neutrality of the tribes of Illinois, he never condescended to invite them to a council; and all the overtures for peace came from those who had begun the war.

Yet, when necessary, no one could be more persuasive, as was proven by his interview with the Big Gate—so called from having, when a youth, shot a British officer standing on the gate of the fort at Detroit, during the attempt of Pontiac to surprise that place. This chief, a deadly foe to the Big Knives, had accidentally met a party of Piankshaws coming to attend the great council, which was being held by the American commander at Kaskaskia; and although an avowed enemy, he resolved to accompany them in order to behold this mighty chief of the pale-faces, whose fame had spread over the whole northwest. With the most audacious calmness he appeared each day in the council, sitting conspicuously in the front of the room in full war-dress, wearing the bloody belt he had received from the English, and elaborately bedecked in his war-paint. Thus he continued to attend for many days, saying not a word to the Americans nor they to him. But on the last day, when the deliberations were closed, Clarke addressed him, apologizing for not noticing him until the public business was over. He said, "Although they were enemies, still it was the custom of the white men, when they met in this way, to treat each other in proportion to their exploits in war." On this account, and because "he was a great chief," the Colonel invited him to dinner—a compliment never extended to less distinguished men. The savage, taken completely by surprise, endeavored to decline; but Clarke would take no denial. At last the chief, confused by such unexpected kindness and attention, and yielding to the spell of a superior mind, could contain his excited feelings no longer. Springing into the middle of the room, he flung down the war-belt and a little British flag that he carried in his bosom, and ended by stripping himself of every article of clothing except his breech-cloth. Then striking himself energetically upon the breast, he told his hearers that "they all knew he had been a great warrior from his youth up and delighted in battle. That he had been out three times against the Big Knives in Kentucky, for the British had told him lies! That he was preparing for another war-party when Clarke arrived, when he determined to rest himself a while, and come and hear what the Americans had to say on their side of the question. Now he knew the Big Knives were right, and as an honest warrior he would no longer fight against them:" upon which he shook hands with Clarke and his officers and saluted them as brothers. He ever afterward remained true to his new friends, and in a private interview detailed to the Colonel the situation of Detroit, and offered to go out and bring him a scalp or a prisoner. Clarke declined the offered scalp, but said that he would be glad to secure a prisoner, from whom he could obtain some information of the movements of the British. The chief, dressed in a fine laced suit, decorated with a silver medal, and bearing a captain's commission, set out on this expedition.

While Clarke was engaged in negotiations with the Indians between the Mississippi and the Wabash he came near falling a victim to a plot for his assassination, concocted by some of the British emissaries, probably without the knowledge of their superiors. They promised a band of Indians, composed of outcasts from all the tribes, a large reward if they would kill "the great chief of the Bostoni." Under pretense of friendship they pitched their camp close by his, and made a treacherous attempt to shoot him at night. The plot failed, and the conspirators were made captive. The chiefs were heavily ironed, and shut up in the guard-house, whence they were every day brought forth and placed in the midst of the council to be gazed at by the assembled tribes, and not allowed to speak or be spoken to. At last, when the council was about to be broken up, Clarke ordered their chains to be taken off, telling them contemptuously "that he had meant to put them to death; but on considering the meanness of watching a bear and catching him asleep, he had found out that they were not warriors, but only old women, whom it would be a shame to kill; but that they ought to be whipped for putting on breech-cloths like men. They shall be taken off of you," he concluded, "and plenty of food given you for your journey home, as squaws do not know how to hunt;" and then turned away to speak with other persons, as though he scorned to talk any longer with such mean creatures. This treatment was too much for the Indians to bear; they begged for forgiveness. Clarke would not allow their speech to be interpreted; and when they offered him the pipe of peace, he broke it with his sword. The other Indians interceded in their favor, but he still refused to listen. Suddenly two young men of the offending tribe stepped into the centre of the room, sat down in silence upon the floor, and threw a blanket over their heads. While all were wondering at this movement, the chief again advanced with the pipe of peace and informed Clarke that these youths offered their own lives as an atonement for the crime of their people, and they hoped the sacrifice would appease the Big Knife. As he spoke he extended the pipe, the pledge and symbol of peace. Clarke was deeply affected by this display of patriotic self-sacrifice. He had intended from the first to grant the tribe peace after a sufficient show of reluctance, and this touching incident enabled him to do so gracefully. As soon as he dared trust his own voice—for, said he afterward, "I never felt so powerful a gush of emotion over my mind, or was ever so incapable of speaking from the impulse of that feeling"—he ordered the young men to rise, saying, "he was rejoiced to find that there were men in all nations, and that they at least were a proof for their own countrymen. Such characters were alone fit to be chiefs, and with such he liked to treat, and through them he granted peace to their tribe; and he, therefore, took them by the hand as its chiefs." They were introduced to the American, French, and Spanish officers, and then to the great men of the other tribes, who saluted them in their new character. A solemn council was held, in which the terms of peace were settled.

By the last of January, 1779, Clarke had finished his task of pacification. In the mean time he had become anxious concerning the state of affairs at Vincennes, from which place he had heard nothing for many weeks. But on the 29th he was once more roused to the most strenuous activity by the arrival of Colonel Viejó, with the intelligence that Governor Hamilton had recaptured that post in December, and was occupying it with about eighty regulars, besides an Indian force of six or eight hundred warriors. Captain Helm, who had been left in the fort with one single private, had made a most vigorous defense—with menaces and profane language—and only surrendered on being allowed all the honors of war, the British commander choosing to humor him so far, rather than run the risk of losing half a dozen of his men by the charge of grape-shot that Helm swore he would send into his ranks if his conditions of capitulation were not granted. Hamilton was provided with a small train of field-pieces, and had orders to penetrate up the Ohio to Fort Pitt, sweeping Kentucky in his course; he was then to pass on to the invasion of Augusta County, by which name all the western part of Virginia was then known. But he had first to dispose of one of the most resolute and vigorous leaders of the age; and in spite of all that had transpired, he had utterly failed to appreciate the character of the man with whom he had to deal. Instead of assailing him at once, he had sent his Indian allies on an expedition against the settlers along the Upper Ohio, intending to recall them early in the spring for an attack on Kaskaskia.

Clarke had no idea of waiting the pleasure of his antagonist, and resolved to bring matters to an instant issue. "I knew," he said, "if I did not take him he would take me;" and he immediately set about preparing his forces for this truly formidable undertaking. He fitted up a sort of a row galley with an armament of two 4-pounders and two swivels, placing on board forty-six men under command of Lieutenant Rogers, with orders to move round by the Mississippi and Ohio to the mouth of the Wabash, up which stream he was to force his way to within a few miles of Vincennes, and suffer nothing to pass. To the remainder of his own force he added two companies of Kaskaskia volunteers, and with this small body of one hundred and seventy men he set out on the 7th of February on a march of two hundred miles across the "drowned lands" of Illinois. The season was rainy but not cold; otherwise no human beings could have endured the hardships of that expedition. Yet it required all the influence of the commander to prevent despondency among those hardy men whose whole lives had been a constant wrestle with difficulties. At length, on the 18th, they reached the Little Wabash, not far from its junction with the larger stream of that name. Instead of finding an end to their toils and suffering, they saw that the worst was still to come. From the western bluff on which they had halted, the high lands that bounded the eastern side of the valley were full five miles distant, and the whole intervening space was one unbroken expanse of water, "three feet deep, never under two, and frequently four;" while two broad bands of ripples on the otherwise motionless surface indicated the channels of the two rivers.

Nothing is more characteristic of great leaders than the art with which, in critical emergencies, they have appealed to the master-feeling in the hearts of their followers. History has preserved many speeches by which men have been nerved to accomplish the seemingly impossible; and we are sometimes inclined to wonder at their effect, forgetting that it was the occasion and the peculiar character of the hearers, with which we do not fully sympathize, that gave them their magic power. Few military orations will stand the test of a strict critical analysis, nor do we claim that our hero's appeal to his followers on this occasion should be received as a model of elegance. His speech on first coming in sight of Kaskaskia was one of the longest he ever uttered in the field, except on one sad future occasion; and that was far more pithy than elaborate, containing only the single sentiment, "We must take the place at all events." Now when he saw his soldiers gazing in gloomy despondency upon the lake through which lay their only road to Vincennes he did not expend even so many words; but stepping to the front so that all might see, he took a little wet powder in his hand, blackened his face, and raising the startling war-whoop, plunged into the water. The men who were educated in the symbolical customs of the Indians saw in this act of their leader an unalterable determination to succeed or perish in the attempt, and the well-known note of border war, which they had heard pealing over many a bloody skirmish or scene of midnight murder, fired them. The right chord had been struck, and echoing the revengeful yell the whole band dashed resolutely into the lake. It was a terrible undertaking, and it seemed as if their strength could not possibly bear them through. The march became slower and more toilsome; the song gradually ceased, and nothing was to be heard but the splashing and loud panting of the men as they struggled painfully onward. The march was not over a smooth bottom of sand, but upon ground encumbered with submerged logs, brushwood, and all the thousand obstructions of uncleared land, and through water often up to the armpits. Here were to be seen men supporting themselves by embracing the tree trunks with their arms, in order to gain a few moments' rest for their aching legs, while others were seen trying to evade some of the difficulties by paddling themselves forward on pieces of floating timber, and one little drummer created some faint merriment by navigating the deeper places on the head of his drum. At last they reached a small island that offered them a resting-place, from which the object of all their labors could plainly be seen. But for that very reason it was impossible to remain there long; yet between them and the shore there still spread a wide expanse of water, entirely destitute of any friendly timber by which they could cling and rest.

Clarke now spoke a few cheering words, and again led the way into the stream; but before stepping off he had ordered Captain Bowman to fall back with twenty-five men and shoot any one who refused to march. But the precaution was needless, and the order was received with a huzza, and every man again took bravely to the water. At last the eastern shore was reached, but so complete was the exhaustion of the party that many of them fell with their bodies half in the water, not able, when the spur of absolute necessity was no longer felt, to take even the one single step that would place them on dry land. It was a wonderful achievement, and without a parallel in history since the time when the rancorous hatred of Dutch and Spaniards marched armies along the bottom of the sea, and covered the straits and estuaries of Zealand with floating corpses.

While the army was resting in this manner an Indian canoe came in sight and was brought to. In it were found a quarter of buffalo beef. The timely supply was at once made into broth. Refreshed by this and somewhat rested the line of march for the town was again taken up, Clarke sending word to the inhabitants of his approach, and warning all who were friendly to the enemy to retire at once to the fort. This stroke of policy had the desired effect, for the astonished people thought that such frankness could only belong to one who felt himself too strong to fear resistance. Indeed, the idea was prevalent throughout the place that it was a new army from Kentucky, as it was deemed impossible that a march could have been made from Kaskaskia in such a state of the waters. This delusion was cunningly kept up by several officers sending a captured hunter with messages to their acquaintances in the town, under the names of persons known to be then in Kentucky. In making his approach Clarke countermarched his men several times around some eminences in the plain, displaying each time they came into view different sets of colors in order to create an exaggerated idea of his numbers. He was received with open arms by the French inhabitants, while even the few who were hostile to the American cause were so completely overawed that they dared not even inform the commander of the fort of what was transpiring. He therefore remained quietly within his walls, never dreaming that his antagonist, instead of waiting in winter-quarters according to established military usage, would in a few minutes be under the guns of his own stronghold, demanding an instant decision of the contest.

In order to make his opponent unmask—if there were really any design concealed behind his apparent inaction—Clarke sent forward fourteen men to begin an attack on the fort. At first the fire of these was attributed to some drunken Indians who had been lying about the place. But one of the men, having had Captain Helm's quarters pointed out to him—who, it will be remembered, was a prisoner in the fort—asked permission of his officer to shoot at the chimney and knock the mortar down into the captain's toddy, which, he said, "was sure to be on the hearth at about this time." The shot was so well aimed that the captain, who was sitting within, engaged as the man conjectured, on seeing this new ingredient added to his favorite beverage, sprang up and exclaimed, "That is Clarke, and he will make us all prisoners; but damn him, he has no business to spoil my toddy!" Immediately afterward a soldier was shot through one of the port-holes, and the truth could no longer be doubted. "Is Colonel Clarke a merciful man?" asked the Governor, anxiously, of his prisoner. But soon recovering himself, the fire was returned and continued hotly throughout the night, and until nine o'clock on the following morning. About that time the Americans, having received a good supply of ammunition—from several of the chief men of the place, who had concealed it during the British occupation—began to push the attack with greater vigor. Lying within thirty yards of the walls, they kept up so murderous a fusillade that the garrison could no longer be kept to their guns, for the instant a port-hole was opened, even a few inches, half a dozen rifle balls would be sent whizzing through the aperture, cutting down every thing in the way; nor could the smallest portion of a person be exposed without receiving the same unwelcome salute. "You had better take care!" said Captain Helm to a man whom he saw trying to get a peep at the state of things without, through a crevice in one of the block-houses, "Clarke's men will shoot your eye out." There was no time to profit by the warning, for the words were scarcely uttered when both the prying organ and the brain behind it were knocked out by a nicely-aimed rifle bullet.

It was said by the English that Clarke's success in this attack was entirely owing to the awkward elevations of the platforms, which prevented the guns being sufficiently depressed to bear upon the assailants. This may be partially true, but it only shows the wisdom of Clarke in adopting a mode of attack never thought of by those who planned the defenses, and which was certainly the most effectual that could have been employed in the absence of a siege artillery; for could the besieged even have brought their guns to bear they might have occasioned us greater loss, and postponed the final result, but could scarcely have changed it, since cannon balls and even grape would have availed but little against riflemen fighting under cover and in the loosest order. This is one of the first instances of attacking fortified places in this manner, and a few years before would have been laughed to scorn as the project of a fool by the scientific martinets of Europe. But one of the greatest improvements in the system of modern tactics grew out of the necessities of Indian warfare in North America, or rather was learned directly from the Indians themselves; we mean the employment of those light corps of rifle-armed sharpshooters, which, under various names, now form an indispensable portion of every perfect military establishment.

Toward three o'clock Hamilton, either on account of the uselessness of his cannon, or because he could no longer make his men face the deadly fusillade of the besieger, sent a flag with an offer to treat. The two leaders therefore met at the village church, the Englishman being accompanied by Captain Helm and a Major Hay. Clarke demanded an unconditional surrender, which Hamilton refused, and a violent scene ensued. Clarke arose to depart, informing the Governor that the firing would recommence in fifteen minutes. But the latter, who knew the discouragement of his men, and dreaded being taken by assault, or that the fort, which stood within thirty feet of the steep river-bank, might be undermined, called to his opponent, as he was retiring, and mildly inquired his reasons for insisting on such harsh terms. "Because," exclaimed Clarke, "I know the principal Indian partisans from Detroit are in the fort, and I want only an honorable opportunity of putting such instigators of Indian barbarities to death. So sacred do I consider this claim upon me that I would rather lose fifty of my men than not execute the vengeance demanded by so much innocent blood. If Governor Hamilton chooses to risk the destruction of his garrison for such miscreants he has it at his pleasure."

It may seem strange that Clarke should risk his own success on such a point. But in order to understand the importance he attached thereto it is only necessary to read the historical collections of that time, and learn something of the feelings with which those wretches called Indian agents or partisans were regarded. We do not mean the officers of the English army, who were sometimes compelled by the cruel policy of their masters to serve in conjunction with the Indians. These were generally as much disgusted at the barbarity of their red allies as civilized men would naturally be. And we remember Colonel Byrd's strange withdrawal from Kentucky after the capture of two stations, and when he might have swept the whole State, because he would not pluck laurels stained with the blood of women and children. But the men to whom Clarke had reference were a set of abandoned villains, many of them renegades from the colonies, who had domesticated themselves among the Indians, whose natural ferocity they were continually stimulating; planning for them expeditions into the settlements, which they not unfrequently led in person, and outdid the savages themselves in deeds of cruelty and blood. The bitter hatred borne by the early settlers of the West toward these men may be conceived from the detestation that is even yet excited in their descendants by the very names of Girty and M'Kee. Hence Clarke felt that he could not render a greater service to his countrymen than by cutting off a number of these their worst enemies.

"And pray, Colonel Clarke," called out Major Hay, "whom do you mean by Indian partisans?"

"I consider Major Hay one of the principal ones," was the prompt, threatening reply.

The other turned pale and trembled when he thus unexpectedly heard himself especially designated as an object of that vengeance which had just been so fiercely denounced. So excessive was his agitation that his own commander blushed for his open exhibition of cowardice; and Clarke, who admired the dignified demeanor of the latter under misfortune as much as he despised that of his subordinate, relented in his heart toward the former, and told him that he "would reconsider the matter, and let him know the result by a flag of truce."

The American officers advised concession, and on the 24th of February, 1779, Fort Sackville was once more surrendered into the hands of our countrymen, the garrison being received as prisoners of war. This victory permanently secured the conquests of the country, and fixed the authority of Virginia on a firm basis; thenceforward it only remained for Clarke to defend that which he had so gallantly won.

At the age of twenty-seven Clarke had reached the goal when he himself thought he had only overcome the first difficulties of the ground, and with powers braced by the previous exertion, saw, or thought he saw, a still further and brighter career opening before him. He felt, indeed, that his plan was only half executed, and his work yet unfinished while Detroit and the other posts along the lakes remained in the hands of the enemy. And it may be, there had floated dimly through his mind the splendid dream of accomplishing the design in which Montgomery had failed, and of striking once more for the possession of the St. Lawrence upon the Plains of Abraham and under the walls of Quebec. And certainly no one of his contemporaries was more worthy of trying his fortune on that "battle-field of empire," where the great prize had twice already been lost and won, and where so many heroes had fallen amidst glorious victory or equally glorious defeat.

Of all the English posts which gave them a direct communication with the savage nations of the Northwest, that of Detroit alone remained to them, and to its capture Clarke's whole attention was now directed. "If I but had five hundred men when I first arrived in this country," he wrote to Mr. Jefferson, "or, when at Vincennes, could I only have secured my prisoners and had three hundred men available, I would have attempted it." But even with his small force of two hundred he was preparing to risk the attempt, when he received a letter from Governor Henry informing him that an additional battalion was to be raised to complete his regiment, and advising a postponement of farther offensive operations until it should join him.

About the same time he received another note, part of which we insert:

"Sir," writes Lieutenant-Governor Page, on the 4th of September, 1779, "I have the honor to inform you that by Captain Rogers I have sent the sword that was purchased by the Governor to be presented to you by order of the General Assembly, as a proof of their approbation of your great and good conduct and gallant behavior. I heartily wish a better could have been procured; but it was thought the best that could be purchased, and was bought of a gentleman who had used it but little, and judged it to be elegant and costly. I am," etc., etc.

We suspect one of our gallant officers of the present day would not feel much flattered by being presented with a second-hand sword, however "elegant and costly" the gentleman "who had used it but little" might judge it to be.

The sword duly arrived; but not so the promised battalion. A change had come over the councils of Virginia; and although at a later period an entire new regiment was formed and placed under Clarke's orders, it was only for purposes of defense, and he was forbidden any offensive operations against the remaining British posts, but ordered to take up his quarters at the falls of the Ohio, and with seven hundred men protect a frontier eight hundred miles in length, exposed at every point to savage incursions.

Here was the turning point in the history of Clarke. Restrained from the prosecution of those plans whereon his heart had from the first been fixed, and the immense utility of which he alone seems clearly to have understood, and compelled to watch the petty attacks of wandering parties of savages, which, though a source of unceasing annoyance, could add nothing to his fame; and reduced all at once to a position of comparative obscurity after having made himself an object of admiring observation to a whole nation by the most dashing and brilliant series of exploits performed during the war; and cut off from those personal adventures in which he had formerly delighted by the duties and proprieties of his position as Brigadier-General of the forces in the West: it is not to be wondered at if his spirits became depressed, or that he should be tempted to seek relief from the dreary monotony of a garrison life in the use of stimulants, as too many men of his ardent temperament have done before and since. It is always painful to speak of the weaknesses of a great man, or the sins of a good one; but truth compels the admission that, from about this time, Clarke began to yield himself more and more to the dominion of this pernicious habit. But the native vigor of his mind long upheld him, and for years he still maintained his high reputation, and even down to the last moment of his command he continued zealously and actively to discharge its onerous duties; and his zeal was always wise as his activity was always prompt and efficient.

His plan of defense included an armed galley that plied along the river monthly, from the Falls to the mouth of the Licking, together with a strong and well-trained body of rangers, who secured both shores from the mouth of the Tennessee to that of the Sciota: whose duty it was to report every movement of the savages that fell under their notice at head-quarters, then fixed at Fort Nelson, which occupied the site of the present city of Louisville. This corps of scouts and spies—for they acted in both capacities—contained many of the choicest spirits of the frontier, among whom were such men as Simon Kenton and Bland Ballard: in connection with the latter of whom there is related a little incident, which also illustrates well the difference between those times and the present. Being out on a scout one foggy morning along the Kentucky shore of the river, a few miles below the Falls, he heard the voices of Indians evidently approaching from the other side. Concealing himself in the bushes he lay in wait for an adventure, and soon a canoe, containing three Indians, became visible through the fog, making directly for his point of ambush. When within range he fired and killed one in the bow, whereupon the others sprang overboard and tried to escape by swimming, but were both slain in the water before they could get out of reach from the hunter's rifle. Thinking that he had now done enough for one morning's work, he returned to the fort and reported his adventure to the General, who, as a reward for his gallant conduct, presented him with a linen shirt, which was the first garment of the kind the hardy borderer had worn for many years, except those made of buckskin.

In the year 1780 Congress had been so far influenced by the intrigues of the Spanish and French ministers, who desired to exclude the new State from the Mississippi, that they had actually instructed their envoys in Europe to be guided on this point by the advice of the French Government in any negotiations for peace, and not even to insist on the free navigation of that stream below latitude 30° north. Compliance with this short-sighted policy of concession would have made Kentucky a Spanish province. But fortunately America had some statesmen who looked beyond the passing moment, and who determined to strengthen their claim by taking actual possession of the whole of the disputed territory. Clarke therefore received orders in the spring of this year to move down with a part of his State regiment and construct a strong fort on the Mississippi below the mouth of the Ohio. This order he promptly executed, and called the new post Fort Jefferson, in honor of the Governor of Virginia, under whose orders it was built.

But the position of commander on the frontier was, in those times, one of ceaseless vigilance and constant activity, and Clarke had scarcely finished this labor when he heard of the irruption of Colonel Byrd into the country along the Licking. It was his settled policy never to let any attack of the enemy pass without immediate retaliation. As soon, therefore, as he heard the news of the capture of the two northern stations he resolved to set out for that region and arouse the people to attempt an expedition into the Indian country beyond the Ohio. For greater safety he disguised himself and his two companions as red men, and struck boldly into the forest, traversed by scores of marauding bands; for the savages, after more than a year of comparative quiet, had this spring again broken out into hostilities with redoubled fury. The wisdom of Clarke's plan for the reduction of the English posts on the lakes was now made manifest, and bitter cause had the Kentuckians for the next four years to curse the short-sighted parsimony by which their execution had been thwarted. During those four years more than one thousand of their people were murdered or captured, besides their enormous losses in other respects. But Clarke was not one of those who, when they can not have their own way, sit down in sullen idleness to complain. Since he could not do what he thought best for the protection of the settlements, he resolved to do what was next best, to carry the war into the villages of the savages. With this purpose in view, he now set out on that perilous journey from Fort Jefferson to Harrodstown, then the largest town in the country.

On reaching the Tennessee River with his companions they found it in a state of flood, foaming from bank to bank; while, to add to the danger, they became aware that they were in the close neighborhood of a large band of Indians. Springing down the bank, they set vigorously to work upon a raft, whereon to transport their guns and baggage. Upon this they piled their arms, and, pushing it off, plunged into the roaring current. They had hardly made one-quarter of the passage when a party of painted warriors came leaping down to the shore they had just quitted, and in a few moments a similar band appeared on that which they were approaching. Here the disguise of the adventurers stood them in good stead, as it concealed their true character until the rapid current had whirled them beyond the effective range of their enemy's rifles. As they shot swiftly past the mouth of a large creek, their minds, practiced in all the arts and devices of forest warfare, instantly perceived in it the means of escape. Running their raft quickly ashore, they plunged into the dense forest at full speed, and thus, while their enemies were making a long detour to reach a ford, gained a start that rendered pursuit hopeless. Shortly after this, while passing through "the barrens," they met a band of forty emigrants, who, though scarcely ever out of sight of large herds of buffalo, were actually on the point of starvation from the inexpertness of their hunters. Clarke and his companions soon gave these unskillful hunters a practical lesson in this branch of business by killing for them fourteen out of the next herd that came in sight.

On arriving at Harrodstown he found it crowded with people from all parts of the country eager to enter land in the office just opened there by George May, surveyor of the newly-erected county of Jefferson. No speculative mania ever raged more virulently than did the "land fever" at this time in Kentucky; and the Colonel knew how useless it would be to ask men to volunteer in defense of the very country of which all were so anxious to secure a portion as long as the office remained open. The mere speculator, who resided at a safe distance and relied on the bravery and industry of others to render his purchase valuable, would, of course, heed no appeal of the kind: on the other hand, he could not expect the real settlers, and those who intended becoming such, to leave the field clear for the former class to secure all the finest lands in the country while they themselves should be absent defending it. It was one of those cases when the good of the country made the violation, or rather suspension, of the laws a solemn duty—cases with which very great and very pure men only are competent to deal. The emergency was too pressing to allow of any communication with the superior authorities of the State at Williamsburg, four hundred miles distant; and Clarke determined to take upon himself the responsibility of closing the office "until"—as the notice to that effect stated—"the return of an expedition, about to be organized under the orders of Brigadier-General Clarke, against the Indian towns on the Great Miami." The success of the measure justified its adoption; for the popularity and high military standing of the leader at once commanded any number of volunteers as soon as the counter-incitement of avarice was removed, and in a very few days two regiments were raised, equipped, and on the march for the place of rendezvous, at the mouth of the Licking, opposite the present site of Cincinnati, while the State troops, with the artillery, moved up the Ohio to the same point: whence the whole army, one thousand strong, advanced into the country of the enemy about the middle of July.

There is no need to describe this expedition minutely, as it differed but little from the half dozen similar ones subsequently set on foot, except in its more complete success—which was indeed too complete to allow of any of those interesting adventures so common in Indian campaigns. Dashing forward with his characteristic celerity the General came upon the town of Pickaway almost by surprise, and after a sharp fight, in which seventeen on each side were killed, the savages were forced to fly, leaving every thing in the power of the spoilers; and were taught for the first time that the arm of the Big Knife could reach them even in their own wigwams, and that hereafter every incursion of their own was to be followed by a speedy and certain vengeance. Every town within reach was burned, the fruit trees girdled, and the standing crops destroyed. This may seem a barbarous method of warfare—and so it undoubtedly was, and so it was meant to be; but it was waged against the most savage and merciless people the world ever saw. To talk of conducting hostilities according to the practice of civilized nations against such a people is the height of sentimental folly.

Such war to them would be no worse, nay, would occasion less of suffering, than they are accustomed to in their ordinary state of peace. War is justifiable only because the dread of its horrors enforces and secures peace; and that to accomplish this the horror must be such as will be felt by those upon whom it is inflicted.

This unexpected blow relieved Kentucky for the remainder of the year from any repetition of such inroads as had just spread terror throughout her borders. The Shawanees—the most implacable and powerful of the hostile tribes—were employed in rebuilding their ruined habitations, and procuring the means of subsistence during the ensuing winter. Clarke therefore discharged the volunteers, and returned with his own troops to Fort Nelson, there to recommence his distasteful routine of garrison duties, and, it is to be feared, to sink still deeper into those habits that were undermining his powers and destroying his usefulness as a public officer. Not that any deficiency can at this distance of time be discovered either in judgment or vigor of his acts, for it takes dissipation a long time to produce a sensible effect on a mind so strong and well-balanced as his. On the contrary, he is seen for the next twelve or eighteen months watching every where his restless and stealthy foes, and ready to swoop at any moment, or upon any point, at which they ventured to make their appearance in force. During this year he removed with his command from the falls of the Ohio to Kaskaskia, in the now regularly organized county of Illinois, where the condition of things had become such as to require his presence.

In the summer of 1781 he was once more summoned to the far south by the pressing danger of his new fort on the Mississippi. It had been built without permission on the lands of the Chickasaws, who, offended at the encroachment, had broken out into hostility against the whites for the first, and, we believe, for the last time; and under the command of a Scotch gentleman named Colbert, laid siege to the place, and seemed resolved to carry in spite of every effort of the little garrison of thirty fever-stricken men. The assault had been urged with unfaltering valor for five days, notwithstanding the terrible slaughter committed in their ranks by the light guns of the fort, and they were apparently on the eve of success when the arrival of Clarke, with a small reinforcement, compelled them to retire. But the fort being only erected in order to strengthen by actual possession the title of the United States to the country on the Mississippi north of latitude thirty, and that object having been shortly afterward accomplished, the place was dismantled, and peaceful relations thus restored with the Chickasaws, the most civilized of all the North American tribes.

Again for almost a year General Clarke lay at Fort Nelson in comparative idleness until, in the summer of 1782, he was once more called forth to vigorous exertion by that terrible disaster—the defeat of the Lower Blue Licks. No event ever made so deep an impression on the public mind of Kentucky, and none occupies a more conspicuous place in her early history. Every Kentucky boy is familiar with the events of that day, when men and officers seemed suddenly stricken with idiocy, and with open eyes rushed headlong into certain destruction. The narrative may not be so familiar to others, but there are few Kentuckians who have not heard how, at the call of the people of Bryant's Station, one hundred and eighty of the most gallant spirits of the land, under Boone, Todd, Trigg, Harland, M'Bride, and M'Gary, hastened to their aid, and finding Girty and his host of savages gone, resolved to follow upon their trail without waiting the arrival of Logan, who was hastening on with the men of Lincoln; and how, on coming in sight of a few stragglers who seemed to invite observation and pursuit, the veteran Boone at once saw that they were only left as a decoy, and told his friends that an ambush was prepared for them if they dared to cross the river, describing the situation of the ground exactly, and telling them the precise spot where the five hundred Indians were lying in wait for their approach; how, in the midst of the debate, the taunt of a hot-brained bravo seemed suddenly to sting the whole party into madness; how they all—men and leaders—plunged pell-mell into the river, without caution and without order, each intent only on proving that he was not a coward, and rushed confusedly onward, no one commanding and no one obeying, till all at once they found themselves huddled in a confused mass upon a bare and rocky ridge, and inclosed in a triangle of fire, without cover, with a deep and narrow ford behind them; how Todd and Trigg and Harland and M'Bride fell, and the survivors fought on until the enemy sprang forth from the ravines, rushed forward tomahawk in hand. The retreat, the route, the massacre in the river; the magnanimity of young Reynolds in dismounting in the midst of the butchery, and giving up his own swift horse to his wounded captain, who had sat down in despair to await the approach of the enemy; the cool conduct of the supposed cowardly Netherland, who wheeled his steed upon the bank, and gathering a few horsemen around him, drove back the savages, who were tomahawking the footmen in the water; the escape of Boone, who, having seen his son shot down at his side, dashed through the savage lines; and, last of all, the sickening appearance of the battle-field, two days afterward, when Logan found the mangled bodies of sixty Kentuckians blackening in the hot sun upon the rocks and in the river. All these are familiar to the ears of the present generation, and render the Lower Blue Licks a name to be shuddered at even to this day.

Upon our ancestors the blow fell like a clap of thunder. Sixty men killed! To us who count our populations by the million it seems an insignificant loss, but to them it had a terrible significance; for it meant one-fourth of the fighting men north of the Kentucky River, and that too, at a time when the Shawanees, Wydots, Ottawas, and Delawares, supported by the English in Canada, had just formed an alliance for the extermination of these settlements, and this was but the first effort of their confederated power. Who could tell then what the end would be when the beginning was so disastrous? The early settlers of Kentucky were probably as brave a race as ever lived; but this defeat following close upon those of Holder, Estell, and Floyd, struck them with bewilderment and dismay, and for the first time they really quailed before the arms of the savages. Almost every family in the country had lost some member in one of those actions, and the gloom was therefore universal, and was increased by the fact that so many of the recognized leaders were among the fallen. Todd, Trigg, Estell, Holder, young Boone, Harland, M'Bride, and Floyd, to whom the people had been accustomed to look for encouragement and guidance, had been cut off in the short space of three months. But happily the greatest of them all still remained, ready and able as ever to meet the crisis.

Clarke was at the Falls when the tidings of the massacre of the Blue Licks reached him, and in pursuance of his plan of never permitting any invasion to pass unpunished, he at once called the superior officers of his brigade to consult on the best means of inflicting a prompt retaliation. The council recommended a draft of men to make up any deficiency of volunteers, and the impressment of horses and provisions, should it be found necessary. But the public spirit of the people precluded the necessity of any harsh measures, and men and horses and beeves poured in so rapidly, that in a remarkably short space of time two entire regiments were formed and on the march for the Ohio. Before the enemy, who had won the late battle, were safe in their own homes again the avengers of blood were upon their footsteps. On the last day of September Clarke assumed the command on the same spot from which he had set out on a similar enterprise the summer before. At the head of one thousand mounted riflemen—the most efficient of all troops for such service, and now first employed—he crossed the Ohio on the same day, and pushing forward with his wonted energy, arrived undiscovered at the nearest Indian town, and within half a mile of the camp of the triumphant victors of the Blue Lick. Here a straggler caught sight of the advancing whites, and at once gave the alarm. The savages instantly fled, bearing the alarm to the various towns in the valley, whose inhabitants, thus warned, succeeded in making their escape without serious loss of life, but leaving their homes to the vengeance of the white men. The effects of this expedition is not to be calculated by the amount of blood shed, but by its influence on the future conduct of the Indians. Tried by this test its success was nearly complete. "It put an end to the formidable invasions of Kentucky." The Indians had at last learned that every aggression would be sure to bring a desolating army into the midst of their own villages, and they became shy of offering the provocation. They were also now made to realize for the first time the immense disproportion between their own numbers and those of the Big Knives, who immediately after receiving a blow that would have prostrated the power of the strongest among their own tribes for many years, were able to send so overwhelming a force to revenge that disaster. No considerable body ever afterward ventured across the Ohio, and the war thenceforward resumed the desultory form it had borne during the years 1775-'76.

Such were the beneficial consequences of this last act of George Rogers Clarke in defense of his adopted State; for here his career may be said to have ended, and had his life terminated at the same time he would have departed with a fame as full-orbed and splendid as any of the worthies of our revolutionary age. And that one dark spot, ominous of the approaching eclipse, would ere now have been forgotten or have passed unnoticed amidst the general radiance of his glory.

Clarke now returned to his post at the Falls as the most central point on the long frontier committed to his charge, and he applied his great mind to the petty but vexatious occupation of listening to the reports of spies and scouts, and repressing or chastising the incursions of fugitive bands of Indians bent more on plunder than war—duties befitting a superintendent of police rather than a commander of an army, and which must have been almost intolerable to a man of his ardent and enterprising temper. But he was soon to be deprived of even this poor resource against ennui. As long as the war lasted he had never ceased to hope that his darling project for the reduction of Detroit might meet with the approbation of his government, and that the career that had been checked in 1779 might yet be successfully resumed, and the work he had appropriated as his especial life-task completed. But the peace, which was about this time concluded, put an end at once and forever to all those long cherished hopes, and to his own public employment.

"The conclusion of the war," wrote Governor Harrison, of Virginia, on the 2d of July, 1783, "and the distressed condition of the finances of the State, call on us to adopt the most prudent economy. It is for this reason alone that I have come to the determination to give over for the present all thought of carrying on offensive war with the Indians, which, you will easily perceive, will render unnecessary the employment of a general officer in that quarter, and will therefore consider yourself as out of command. But before I take leave, I feel called upon in the most forcible manner to return you my thanks, and those of my Council, for the very great and singular services you have rendered to your country by wresting so great and extensive a country out of the hands of the British enemy, repelling the attacks of their savage allies, and carrying on a successful war in the very heart of their country. This tribute of thanks and praise, so justly your due, I am happy to communicate to you as the united voice of the Executive," etc.

With this, and a grant of a splendid tract of land lying in the present state of Indiana, opposite Louisville, George Rogers Clarke was finally dismissed from the service of his country.

But if Virginia no longer had need of such talents, the General Government was compelled for years to continue the war against the Northwestern tribes; and why the one man who had shown himself most consummately qualified for the situation, both by natural aptitude and long experience, should have been persistently neglected is hard to explain. Certainly the captor of Vincennes would have been more efficient than the timid and luxurious Wilkinson; and would not, like Harrison, have sacrificed in weak detachments the best portion of an army of twelve hundred men; or, like St. Clair, have exposed one of three thousand to utter route and destruction by an injudicious encampment. Had either of these armies been placed under the command of Clarke, the United States would have been saved the disgraceful experiences of that long and ill-managed war between 1785 and 1795, which rendered the power of the Confederacy contemptible in the eyes even of the savages, and delayed their submission until General Wayne took the field in the latter year. But Clarke's day of glory was over, and his career finished at an age when that of many has but just begun, and at thirty-one he was laid aside like a superannuated veteran. The very prime of that powerful and active genius was lost to his country, as well as to his own fame, and left to rust away in obscurity; or, sadder still, to destroy itself by seeking a forbidden relief from vain longing and repinings, while war was raging along the whole frontier from Lake Huron to the confines of Florida; and when at times it appeared as if the misdirected power of the whole continent combined would fail to hold that country which he, with a mere handful of men, had wrested from the hands of the English.

At last, so inefficient was the protection afforded by the regular army, and so audacious had the attacks of the savages on the Ohio become, that the Kentuckians thought it necessary once more to take their defense into their own hands. After three years of retirement Clarke was again called to take the command in an expedition against the tribes in Indiana. But he was no longer the leader who had waded the flooded Wabash to recapture Vincennes, and whose swift blows had so promptly avenged the fall of Ruddell's Station, or the defeat of the Blue Licks. The army, numbering about twelve hundred men, marched from the Falls in the summer of 1786 toward Vincennes, expecting to meet at that point their provisions, which had been placed on keel-boats to be transported up the Wabash. But it soon became evident that the General no longer possessed that absolute ascendancy over his soldiers which had rendered his former operations so marvelously rapid and energetic. A spirit of defiance among the superior officers, and of disaffection and insubordination among the men, quickly began to manifest itself. This was increased to absolute mutiny, when it was discovered that the commander had sent a flag of truce to the enemy for the purpose of demanding whether they would have peace or war. This act, which at once destroyed all chance of effecting a surprise, would appear, at first sight, to indicate a state of mind bordering on fatuity. But it is all explained when we learn that the whole enterprise was unlawful, as Kentucky had no right to send, without the authority of the Federal Government, such an expedition against tribes living beyond her own borders; tribes, too, with whom Clarke himself had, as United States Commissioner, negotiated a treaty of peace only one year before; and he was naturally unwilling to make an unannounced attack upon people who had never been proved to have violated that treaty. His error was in accepting the command at all under these circumstances.

At Vincennes the army was compelled to wait many days for the boats, and when they at last came it was discovered that nearly all the provisions were spoiled. The spirit of mutiny now overcame all restraint, and Clarke seems no longer to have possessed the weight of character to deal with it successfully. Three days afterward, when within a few leagues of the Indian town, three hundred men deliberately turned their backs and took up the line of march for home. But the force was still sufficiently strong to accomplish the main object of the expedition, and the General advised a rapid dash forward. The disorganization was, however, now too complete, and the men clamorously and insolently demanded an abandonment of any further attempt. Here, for the first time, Clarke made a long speech, and strove by every means to soothe the discontented and encourage the desponding. But it was in vain: his passionate appeals were all received with coldness, until at last the stern warrior, overcome with mortification and grief, burst into a passion of tears. Even this produced no effect on the mutineers. At length the officers, many of whom had fomented the disaffection on account of personal enmity to their leader, advised a retreat, and he, feeling his utter helplessness and inability to avert the disgrace, reluctantly yielded; and the army from which so much had been expected fell back to Vincennes without striking a blow or having seen an enemy. Here it became entirely disorganized, and the men, breaking up into small squads, made the best of their way home, each "on his own hook."

This failure gave a blow to the reputation of Clarke from which it never recovered. Yet no vital error can be discovered in his conduct, and had his advice been followed success would have been certain. In vigor or generalship we can see no diminution: it was his ability to command obedience that was gone. If any useful lesson could be drawn from examples of this kind, what a moral might be painted here! For who even once would dare to call the fascinating demon to his assistance when all the strength and resolution of such a man as Clarke could not enable him to tear away the iron grip with which it fastens on its victim? and if self-conceit were not the most pervading weakness of men, who could hope to be able to retain reputation and influence, when all the invaluable services, the lofty mind, and pure patriotism of such a man, could not shield him from the inevitable consequences of his fault? But let it not be forgotten that the primary causes of the failure of this expedition were not attributable to the leader himself, and that he only contributed to the disastrous result by having weakened powers which might have enabled him to surmount the difficulties thrown in his way by the malice and folly of others. Kentucky was at that time a hot-bed of intrigues and intriguers. We do not believe a country can be named whose history reveals such an amount of secret and underhand dealing. Her whole early history, between the year 1783 and the breaking out of the late war with England, consists, when closely examined, of one perplexing maze of secret machinations and treasonable and dishonorable intrigues. One of the most deeply implicated in many of these was that political and military Proteus, General James Wilkinson, whose character and career is even yet a mystery. Engaged in early life as aide-camp of Gates, in the campaign against Burgoyne, he aided his patron and his clique to sting Arnold into treason, and in the plot to supersede Washington as Commander-in-Chief. Moving to Kentucky at the close of the war, we find him shipping tobacco to New Orleans, as the accomplice in a corrupt partnership of the Spanish Governor, and soon afterward swearing allegiance to his Catholic Majesty, and engaged with Sebastian and others in the plot to separate Kentucky from the Union and incorporate it with the Province of Louisiana. A few years later, he appears in the capacity of General-in-Chief of the American army in the Southwest, yet corresponding with Aaron Burr in cipher, and receiving assurances that "Wilkinson shall be second only to Burr in the new empire" about to be formed, out of the dominions of the sovereign to whom he had a little while before sworn himself a subject; and his opinion asked to whether the conspirators should begin their operations by seizing on the principal post of the Province intrusted to his charge by the Government whose armies he at that moment commanded. The next year we behold him threatening to employ that army in a filibustering raid into the territory of his old master the King of Spain, for his own personal aggrandizement; while, twelve months afterward, we are edified by the spectacle of his betraying the whole scheme to the President, when there was no longer a possibility of its success—scattering the poor remnant of the expedition as it fled down the Mississippi, hunting his so lately acknowledged leader through the cypress swamps, and throwing one of his most prominent confederates into prison.

Wilkinson had made his home in Kentucky

after the close of the Revolutionary war, and at once undertook to raise himself to the lead in all her affairs. His qualifications as a demagogue were high: he was polished and insinuating in manner, and (according to Mr. Marshall) had made the discovery "that if the way to the hearts of women lay through their eyes, the most direct way to those of men was down their throats." His revolutionary fame was considerable, and connected with the most glorious portion of that struggle. He had acted as Gates's aid at Stillwater and Bemis's Heights, had borne the tidings of victory to Congress, and been lauded in the dispatches of his commander. But in Kentucky he found in George Rogers Clarke one whose fame was far superior to his own, and whose popularity had hitherto been unbounded, and he hated and quarreled with him, as he did with Wayne and every one else who was his own superior.

Besides, Wilkinson was then engaged in his plot to "precipitate"—that was the word—the Western people, not only into a violent separation from Virginia, but into secession from the Confederacy. With this view, he and his accomplices had done their best to magnify the delinquencies of the General Government, in not defending the frontier against the Indians; and persuaded the settlers to take the matter into their own hands, by organizing this unlawful expedition against tribes with whom the United States were at peace. This was done in the hope of embroiling the two governments in a dispute which would greatly favor the "precipitation," particularly if the proud-spirited Kentuckians were at the moment enraged and mortified by a defeat; for the General had been engaged in too many intrigues, and was too well acquainted with the perversities and weaknesses of human nature, not to know that men are easily led into rash and violent measures while laboring under the angry excitement of recent failure. With this end in view, and also in order to rid himself of a personal rival, Wilkinson, who was then residing, or rather tarrying, at Louisville during the assembling of the army there, had done all in his power to foster and extend the spirit of disaffection that had even then begun to manifest itself among the men. Scarcely was the disastrous result known at that point, when he wrote, exultingly, to a friend in Lexington, "The sun of General Clarke's military glory has set never more to rise!" "There was," says a contemporary historian, "a meaning in this sentence which those who had fathomed Wilkinson knew how to interpret and appreciate." But the malignant prophecy was fulfilled to the letter. Clarke's military reputation suffered an eclipse from which it never emerged; nor did he ever recover the personal popularity he had lost by this miserable affair, and henceforth lived neglected, not only by the nation to which he had rendered such inestimable services, but also by the State which may be said to have owed its very existence to him. For six years his acts had constituted almost the whole history of Kentucky and the West. At the age of thirty-four he disappears so completely from that history that, during the thirty-two succeeding years of his life, his name is to be found only upon one obscure page thereof.

Of that one reappearance on the public stage it is both unnecessary and unpleasant to speak at length; for it was in a character entirely unworthy of his former renown, and is connected with a passage of our national history on which no true patriot can reflect without humiliation. When in 1794-'95, the insolent Frenchman, Genet—supported, it must be confessed, by some of our own statesmen high in station—attempted to establish a proconsulship in the United States, and to reduce our country to the rank of a mere satellite of the French Republic, George Rogers Clarke accepted at his hand a commission of Major-General in the armies of France, and Commander-in-Chief of an expedition to be organized in violation of the laws of his country, and in defiance of the proclamations of Washington, for the purpose of attacking the Spanish provinces in the South. A proclamation, which, it is to be hoped, was not Clarke's composition, was issued in his name, offering the plunder of an inoffensive people as a bribe to the reckless adventurers of the West to enlist under the tricolored flag. A counter-revolution in France, however, saved Clarke from the disgrace of carrying out this programme, and merging the character of a patriot-soldier in that of a filibustering adventurer. The party that had been raised to power in Paris by the revolution of Thermidor disavowed all the acts of Genet and his agents, and annulled the commissions granted by him; and Clarke again sank back into the obscurity from which he had thus been for a short time elevated.

Though still a comparatively young man, disease and premature decrepitude had already seized upon him. Rheumatism, that fell foe of the early pioneers, followed by partial paralysis, reduced him to a state of almost childish helplessness. But still he lived on until he had seen the country, whose bounds he himself had carried to the Mississippi, extended to the Pacific; and until he had seen another accomplish the designs which he himself had so ardently wished to attempt—the final annihilation of the British influence in the Northwest. The country whose struggle for existence he had witnessed and assisted in youth had become the undisputed mistress of the New World; and was just taking its place as one of the great powers of the earth when his own existence terminated.

He died of paralysis in February, 1818, at his residence near Louisville—the city which he himself had founded forty-eight years before. His remains lie interred at Locust Grove, where the stranger will in vain seek for a monument worthy of his fame; for none such marks the resting-place of the illustrious founder of Kentucky.

CHARTY SPANGLER.

I.

A QUAIN Cape cottage sitting low on the sand, the doors painted blue, the house rejoicing in a dull red coat that contrived some way to grow brilliant wherever the green vines of the morning glory lay against it. Hollyhocks budded by the door, swinging censers without perfume, but rich in color and dew-sparkles, healthy, straight-backed, and proud of their strength. A great cluster of lilac bushes, the hardy first-fruits of purple and white spring, threw odorous breaths in at the windows, but they were losing their bloom, preparing for their long sleep till the snow should come and melt again.

A narrow path, fringed on each side by gooseberry bushes, and low trailing vines, that flourished without fear of gardener's gleaming shears, led to the gray boulder that served for a threshold, and that was hoary with the tread of venerable men. On each side of this stone, beyond the slight, ornamental herbage, the grass grew undisturbed for some distance, till it was checked again by straggling bushes that seemed almost viciously to strike against and into the wide crevices of a mottled wall, built irregularly of rocks, and tasteful with tufts of many-colored mosses.

The Cape houses are by no means complicated in their interior arrangements. The one of which I speak was the residence of old Captain Spangler, a man long laid by from the occupation of his life by age and infirmities. Much misfortune had the Spanglers known. Of twelve children only one survived, and she had nearly brought the gray hairs of her parents with sorrow to the grave. They were famous as a hard-featured race, but little Charty Spangler, the last born, possessed a beauty as peculiar as it was eminent. There was no regularity about her face: it was all wavy lines and transient touches of fire and color, that on some occasions gave a splendor to the countenance beyond description. One gazed upon her as the traveler upon the blooms of the southern hemisphere—soul and eyes dilating with wonder and admiration, but dumb from very love, very reverence and worship.

"Where did Charty Spangler git her beauty from?" cried old man and matron, as they met her, gay in blue ribbons, walking through the sand on a sunny Sunday morning. And well they might ask, contrasting that sparkling face with the sallow visage of Captain Spangler, who hobbled along leaning on his cane, or the face with disjointed features, tortured with "rheumaty" belonging to the dear old dame, "Aunt Gerty Spang," as she was called by the whole town. After Charty's birth it was said it became the old man's ruling desire that she should live to grow up. All his prayers were colored by that solicitude. He wrestled with the Lord, that he would save one human prop for his old age. In the green church-yard, deformed by many a gray cherub whose stony ugliness must have troubled the rest of an innocent babe below, eleven little mounds, linked mournfully together by shining chains of grass and flowers, told how his hopes had perished, one after the other, as the baby heads were lowered to their cold pillows of clay.

Neale Conrade, a stalwart, brown-eyed fellow, had been to sea before the mast, and now in his eighteenth year stood among the officers of the good ship Clyde first mate. Neale was not particularly handsome, but there was an element of power in his face—a repose, a grandeur of expression that atoned fully for the lack of conventional polish, the absence of symmetry. From the time he left New Town till he achieved at so youthful an age his proud position he had loved little Charty Spangler. For her sake he had deserved distinction—for her sake he had determined to make himself famous. She was only fifteen, but very mature. Having been the sole companion and confidante of her parents, their age and experience had grafted something of wisdom upon her few years, and Charty was a "little woman." Even the sunny curls, falling in masses of golden gleam upon her fair neck, veiling the eyes of such liquid blue, were not accounted so very girlish—Charty was "uncommon for her age."

On a sunny December morning there was a sad little scene in the parlor of the very red house of which I spoke at the commencement of my story. It was a long, low-ceiled room, boasting of a real "three ply," nondescript figures crawling over a crimson ground, and real stuffed chairs. The rocker stood primly in its corner, ornamented with an enormous tidy. Warm hues of red and yellow glorified the chimney-board, and at its feet sat, with the old dignity of ocean cleaving to them still, four enormous conch shells. The mahogany table was garnished with china asters and colored grasses falling from a blue vase; flowers of various hues grouped themselves at forlorn distances on the dingy wall-paper, and curtains of a bright pattern graced the narrow windows. The rocker was still vibrating, and its tidy had fallen in hopeless folds to the floor. Charty stood near the door, hiding her face in her handkerchief, and Neale Conrade, with one of her hands locked in his, stood like a young god triumphant, though the sorrow of parting dimmed his brown eyes.

"It takes away half the anguish, Charty, this knowledge that you do love me," he said, gazing tenderly down on the bright, bowed head. "Three years is a long time, to be sure, but then I may come home captain, you see, or be able to command a better ship than the Clyde. Oh, Charty, darling! with what dread have I looked forward to this hour: and I was a coward to the last, and acted like one, did I not? However, it's all right between us; and you are sure, very sure, you love me?"

"Oh, very sure," she said, softly, lifting her tearful eyes.

"You have seen so few young men, Charty, only our Cape people, that sometimes I dread, if accident should throw you into the great, strange city, some one, brilliantly handsome and rich, Charty, may rob me of you. Darling, I love you so much that the mere thought is agony, and, I am sure, it would kill me."

"If you don't die before that happens you have a great many years before you," said the beautiful girl; thinking, as she spoke, that nowhere in the whole wide world could she find another whom she would deign to compare with the strong, great soul that looked lovingly from those brown eyes. A breeze at the open window put aside the rustling curtain, and broad masses of sunlight and shining green and flashing marigold-hues broke upon the vision. Neale turned quickly, the light was so strong. "Ah! I sha'n't look from that window again for one while," he said, softly.

"But how I shall watch for your return!" Charty whispered, bashfully—the color deepening on her cheek. How she should watch she little dreamed!

"Watch every night, if for a moment only, and say to yourself, 'Some day I shall see him coming up that little path,' and I shall be happy: for I shall remember, and think as I watch the light of the stars trailing along the ocean, Charty speaks of me; hopes to see me again."

"Three long years," murmured the young creature, her lips quivering.

"Yes, Charty, it is a great while; yet some way the time slips on almost before you know. You cease to count the months and the weeks; you begin instead to reckon the days and the hours. Oh, Charty, darling! after all, it won't be so very hard—if only you won't forget me."

It was not long after that old Captain Spangler stood on the door-step, shading his eyes as he looked after the retreating form of his favorite sailor-boy, and Charty had thrown herself in the rocker to have one last good cry that day.

"Charty, child, you know we've got them barberries to pick."

So said her mother, putting her honest old face in at the door—stepping farther into the room of shadows.

"Yes, mother, I'll come in a minute."

"She don't often say that, poor girl; but I know how it is: she needs occupation to keep her mind clear. Nothing like setting yourself about something—I've always found—and dear knows I've had need of it."

How the child-faces thronged in her vision!

In came Captain Gross. He lived where the surf sometimes beat against the ragged wall that bounded his little garden, and within sight of the strong iron light-house.

"Oh, Cap'n, walk in; Charty, git a chair for Cap'n Gross. Well, Sir, and how does things go daown your way?"

"Well, putty much same's ever, Cap'n Spangler—comin' an' goin', goin' and comin'. S'pose you knew the Clyde went aabout yesterdy; course you did, though," added the fat old Captain, with a succession of energetic nods and winks in the direction he imagined Charty to be standing. She had gone out, however, swallowing a great sob that seemed as if it wanted to choke her.

"Sartin', Cap'n Gross. She's got as fine a fust officer, and fust mate, too, as ever handled lines aboard any ship. The Lord bring her back in safety! She's gone on a long cruise."

"So she has. Brother Dilway—Deacon Dilway, that is—he spoke of 'em last night in Conf'rence meetin'. You know the Cap'n's pious, and asked for prayers. He didn't forgit to send up our partitions; and I don't doubt but the Lord'll take her under His special protection—particularly as the Cap'n's pious—

"He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides atop the storm," you know the hymn says. It's a wonderful providence how so many ships comes back when you think of the dangers of the briny ocean. You and I know all about that, hey, Cap'n Spangler?"

"Ay! I've been on a lee-shore more'n once."

"So have I, Cap'n; I tell you, that lee-shore, them breakers, looking like hell's open mouth yawning to gulp down poor souls, is terrible places, Cap'n. Many's the time I've said in my heart, Well, Betsy, good-by. The Lord grant you're sleeping comfortable in your bed, while your poor husband is a staring death right in the face and eyes. There's nothing ashore eal to it, Cap'n; no man knows the meaning of them words, Death's jaws, till he sees the great jagged stones, like so many divel's teeth, standing up out o' the white foam, while the moving waters makes 'em look as if they was snapping and gnashing to git a grind at you. Well, Cap'n, we've done with them things, eh?"

Captain Spangler drew a long sigh—whether of regret or relief we shall never know, for at that moment a tall, gaunt sailor-man appeared, walking leisurely up to the door. In another moment he had entered.

"Hello! Abel Stevens, old chap!" shouted Captain Gross, seizing the long yellow hand of the skipper. "You must a hove in view in a mighty short space of time. I ain't been here half an hour yet, and there wa'n't a sight of you when I started."

"Jest this moment inshore," said the man, with a slow, heavy accent. "I've got to say that the Three Marys has brought a passenger; and I s'pose you've got a spar room for him, Cap'n Spangler?"

This he said making great bulges in his cheek as he rolled his quid from side to side, shaking Captain Spangler's hand as if it were the paw of a Newfoundland dog, and drawing up a heavy chair at one and the same time.

"Parsenger, eh?" cogitated Captain Spangler, who had eked out his slender resources from time to time by boarding visitors who came to the Cape. "Well, isn't it rather late in the season?"

"Rarther," spoke the skipper, broadly, "rarther; but this chap was sick when he came aboard and thought only of the v'yge—was going back with us, d'ye see—takin' ship's fare—but a day or two ago he sprained his ankle, and it's gettin' wuss. He's got to have some tendin', ye know, Cap'n, and as he's a rich chap, why he'll pay accordin'."

"Who is he?" queried the Captain.

"Oh! fust-rate family—some of them Boston folks that live high, and no mistake. He's a pretty looking chap, too, only a little delikit for my notion. He's as white as a lily, but that's owing to the sprain. Well, what say, Cap'n Spangler? It'll be a nice little sum in your pocket, you know."

Whereupon Mrs. Spangler was summoned, and the conference ended by sending the skipper back with the encouraging news that Cap'n Spangler would give the invalid his best front chamber; and Mrs. Spangler, being famous for her knowledge of roots and herbs, would nurse him till he was able to walk.

In due time the invalid was brought to the door in a lumbering wagon and assisted immediately to his chamber, where Mrs. Spangler was in readiness to make him comfortable. Charty heard of his arrival with indifference; all her thoughts were given to poor Neale Conrade, who was by this time fairly out on the perilous ocean. She had less curiosity than most of her sex; so that she seldom asked any questions concerning the stranger, but went contentedly about her work.

"Charty," said her mother, one morning, "I do believe I shall have to lay by;" which "laying by" always meant with her confinement to her round of duties below stairs, and an unwilling removal to a little bedchamber opening out of the keeping-room, instead of her more spacious lodgings up stairs.

"Why, what's the matter, mother?" asked Charty.

"Oh, my rheumaty—it's gettin' into the knee-caps, and every step I take sometimes is like a knife running into 'em. If it wasn't for the gentleman up stairs, I wouldn't care. There ain't much I have to do, to be sure, since he's hired Melindy Perkins to come of mornings and do the dredgery; but his vittles must be carried up and his med'cine must be seen to."

"But, mother, why can't I do it for you?" queried Charty.

"Why, it don't somehow seem the right thing for a young gal to do; but then, you always was so womanly!"

"Is he an oldish man?" asked Charty, pausing a moment in her work.

"La! no, child; scarcely more'n a boy," was the quiet reply.

During this brief conversation the toast had taken on a spice color, and the small 'pat' of butter flecked the saucer of pure china like a bit of shining gold. Charty had been putting the coffee down to settle and cutting ham. Her arms were bare to the elbows. Of exquisite shape, they were only wanting in that softness of shade and brilliancy of polish that makes the more delicate beauty of the city-bred. Her curls were tucked up so carelessly that here and there a stray ringlet fell like a spiral of thin flame, so intensely did it glitter in the sun as she moved to and fro. She had thrown a white handkerchief over her head, and tied it in a loose knot beneath her chin. A dress of neat blue calico, a white linen apron, and dainty shoes—for she was prouder of her foot than of her face—completed her attire.

"You'll have to go, Charty," said her mother, with a sigh. "You'll find the little table drawn up to the bed and the cloth handy. He's had a spell of fever, you see, and is jest gettin' over it. Tell him that I've got the rheumaty powerful bad, or I'd see to things myself."

So counseled, Charty took the small tea-tray with its toast and little delicacies, and throwing a snow-white towel over her arm she went slowly toward and up the stairs. Neither wonder nor pleasure, nor any other sensation stirred her breast—nothing filled it but thoughts of Neale and long stretches of gray-blue water, whose waves sent their curling crests up to the cabin-windows of the good ship Clyde. She saw only a brown and noble face wistfully turned homeward at every pause in duty; she thought what a slow weary waste of time it would be between the now and that future meeting—perhaps they might never see each other again.

The little chamber door opened upon white curtains and sunlight. All the simple finery of the house had been gathered in this east room; the vases on the mantle and window-ledge, the curiously braided mats, the choicest of tidies, the longest fringed valances. Charty's glance turned first to the high-posted old-fashioned bed. Two great blue eyes looked wistfully toward her from out a tangled mass of the lightest, brightest auburn curls, and a quick flush mounted to the cheeks below them. Charty had never seen any thing so purely beautiful in all her life. She felt like letting the tea-tray fall for a second, and snatching the handkerchief from her head, but she didn't. Her better sense led her with blushing cheeks straight up to the little round table, upon which she deposited the sick man's breakfast.

"Mother is not well, Sir," she said, modestly; "so I came in her stead."

"Thank you, Miss—what shall I call you?"

"My name is Charity, Sir;" she replied, blushing yet more deeply.

An almost imperceptible lifting of the thin, well-arched brows—a smile that few would have detected struggling along his lips at the sound of her homely cognomen. She saw it, however, bit her lip, and grew almost stately. In a moment her color was gone.

"Can I do any thing more for you, Sir?"

"Nothing more, I thank you;" he replied, in a changed voice, seeing the difference in her manner. "Give my regards to your kind mother; I'm very sorry she is ill, and hope it is not occasioned by her unwearied attentions to me."

"Oh no, Sir! it is the rheumatism; she has a spell every winter," said Charty, in her simple, quiet manner, and hurried from the room.

"Oh, charming rusticity!" murmured the invalid—"why, she's a perfect little beauty! an angel fledged in sand and red-brown shanties. Upon my word, I'm glad her mother is incapacitated. I shall have something to think of in this dull place, where the very sun looks blocky, and the color of the soil smutches every thing. To be sure the little goddess of this Cape Sahara turned statue-pale and cold when I laughed at her queer name—she's a quick-sighted little witch, and I must mind my P's, Q's, and all the other letters down to Zed, as she would say. Guy Sommers, it's for your advantage to be an interesting invalid as long as you can."

Down in the dingy kitchen, its low ceiling shutting in a clouded atmosphere of various steams, Charty flung herself, her lip quivering, her cheeks almost purple-red.

"Why, Charty, child, what is the matter?" Mrs. Spangler put down the horn-handled knife, also the bread with its heart of coarse, red wheat, and its surface of crisp crust, moving to the end of the table where Charty sat.

"I'm as good as he is, I guess;" and a short, sharp sob followed.

"Why, Charty, what did he say to you?"

"He laughed at me, mother—he sneered; I won't be laughed at, nor sneered at, no not by a king! I hate him; he's no gentleman."

"He shall leave the house, Charty, if he insulted you."

"Oh no, no, mother! Not that; I don't suppose he intended to wound my feelings, but he smiled in such a way at my name—my poor, homely name. I wish it had been any thing but Charity:" and a few tears followed.

"I say he sha'n't stay here if he acted in any way unbecoming. He was uncommon pleasant with me, though," added the good woman in a softened tone.

"I s'pose I'm foolish," half sobbed poor Charty, thinking again of the almost girlish face and the white hands—white, slender, and waxen—lying outside on the home-spun quilt. "Maybe he couldn't help it. Charity does sound strange, even to me—Charity is so much more natural."

"Well, I must try to hobble up myself, I s'pose; it won't do for you to feel this way every time you tend him," sighed Mrs. Spangler.

"No, mother, I must get over being so foolishly sensitive. He spoke so prettily of every thing—sent his regards to you—said he was sorry you were sick; but somehow I felt badly, you know, and every thing worried me—has for two or three days. I'll try and not be so ridiculous."

"I dar' say, Charty, he liked you very much, for every body does, if it's I that tell of it. He ain't used to country-folks, perhaps, and our good old-fashioned Bible-names sounds outlandish to him. There comes par; set the coffee on, Charty."

In hobbled the old Captain, his nose and cheeks bitten red by the frosty air. He hung his woolen cap on its accustomed peg, asked after the sick man, drew up a chair blackened by age though not weakened through infirmity, and standing reverently at the head of his family, called for the blessing of God on his humble household, fare. As for Charty she at length summoned courage to mount the stairs again and get the breakfast-things; but this time the white kerchief was pinned about her fair neck, and the glossy curls hung in their rich abundance over the pretty temples. Guy had been studying his part. His manners were as courteous, as reverential as if she were the finest lady in the land. The languor of illness imparted a dreamy softness to his countenance, and the eyes seemed lazily floating like pearls with purple tints in a sea of liquid crystal. He was not even familiar as one might be with his nurse. In a melodious accent the homely name Charty fell from his lips: it was "Miss Charty, will you please favor—or may I trouble you—it is really asking too much—Oh, I thank you, I thank you!"—almost an excess of grateful enthusiasm.

At last she was rather happy when she thought of it. Like a sweet air that lingers and shapes itself in beauty out of every memory, the words dwelt in her mind. She was less in the kitchen, and began to study the shape of her fingers, the softness of her complexion, with unwonted assiduity. In her dreams the good ship Clyde melted away like a phantom, and the dark face of true and tender Neale Conrade grew as a shadow on her deck; she pictured it no longer gazing with loving eyes Capeward, dwelling with quick beating heart upon her fair words to him; she even grew impatient if she found the matter troubling her mind. Fair, fickle, false Charty Spangler! Her mother had given her much of the money devoted to the board of the stranger—"for the poor girl must grow foot-sore," she said to herself. "He seems to want so much more tending and fussing than he used ter," she added; "but that's always the way when folks are gittin' well—they're so partickler. It's enough to wear Charty clean out."

Charity looked as if she were wearing well, however. Never before was seen so fervid a sparkle in her bright eye; never so gentle a smile on her sweet lips. Love had brought all his graces and showered them upon her. Wrapped in his mantle, there was a softness about the outlines of her figure that was never visible before. ("Folks" thought it was because the girl had such beautiful new dresses.) Crowned with his golden tiara, her brown locks received a splendor that seemed at times to drop showers of amber and gleams of paler light. Her manner became strangely winning, so that her old father, her old mother, felt new joy in her presence, gloried in her more splendid beauty, and in their aged hearts knelt down and worshiped her. So the stranger of a day had stolen the bloom and freshness of a memory that had been for years growing in her soul—as if it were but the froth and sparkle of wine, he had blown it away.

One afternoon, when the spring sun, warmer and redder in its flush, as if it had come from a land of flowers, burst in at all the windows, it brightened up the pale, beautiful face of Guy Sommers. Guy had thrown himself back in the large lounging-chair, and for a moment a shadow that was born of some anguished thought darkened his brow.

"I am doing wrong—I know I am. I am a cursed coward, a scheming villain; and yet I know not how to stop. The weakness of an irresolute will was ever mine—and—oh! Charty, poor little wild-flower! how have I done by you! I dare not undeceive you; I can not lose you—Hark! it is her step!"

He did not lift the languid head—the soft curls grown during his illness lay like clouds of corn-silk clinging to the bright blue covering of the enormous chair. His whole face grew new with a strange fire, a passionate flame playing and quivering through every feature. Charty entered. She, too, came sailing through the intense yellow light, herself a sunbeam; and his breath grew shorter as she drew near him.

"Well, Charty, have you considered?"

A fond, proud smile it was that fell upon her as she nestled close to his feet.

"I want to look at those faces again."

He placed a small box in her hands. From it she drew out two jeweled cases and opened them. The one was the transcript of a haughty face, framed in curls of purple-black; the other that of an elegant woman, fair even in the dead ripeness of age, with eyes like Guy's own, and light, satiny hair. Rich lace hung over the brow and the neck in folds, and the brocaded silk wore a lustre as if the loom and not the artist had produced it.

"And these are your sister and your grandmother. How very proud they look!" said Charty, sorrowfully. "What would they think of a poor little country-girl like me?"

Again a spasm passed over the brow of Guy Sommers.

"Think? why, that you are a Cape jasmine," he said, playfully, her innocent, upward glance disturbing the phantoms that played, cloud-like, over his countenance—"a pretty flower springing up in the sand, and all the more to be prized for its rareness and beauty. They'll think of you as you deserve, my pet bird—my pink rose. Trust me when I tell you so."

"But Guy, dear Guy, it has made me so wretched to think how imperative it is, as you say, for me to leave my home clandestinely. I believe we can dwell upon a terrible thought till it loses half its horror, for when you first spoke to me of it I shuddered from head to foot, and it was not possible for me to consent. Now—God forgive me—oh! no—it's no use—I can't leave them—I must not be willing."

Guy saw that he had gained his point. He stroked the glistening hair, though the long white fingers trembled; he murmured in her ear—the phantom-ship had quite passed from the sea of her treacherous memory—the fine, dark, sailor-face was now as a canvas cut from its frame and turned to the wall. The picture might be reversed some time.

II.

"I don't believe it! I won't believe it!" said Captain Gross, stoutly.

"It's true, father; Jerry came home with it last night."

"I tell you she was in Conf'rence meetin'; didn't I see her there myself?"

"Yes; but, father, that was just the way 'twas done. She slipped out somewhere about eight—hurried to the wharf—jumped into a boat—he was aboard—and off they went together. Old Miss Spangler, and Cap'n too, didn't know nothing about it till to-day. They thought she'd gone to set up with Miss Brown—she that's dying with consumption. I expect it's a house of mournin' at old Cap'n Spangler's to-day."

"The Lord have mercy!" cried Captain Gross, his great chest heaving with unrestrained sobs; "Cap'n's the dearest friend I've got; but I wouldn't see him now for a million. Oh, pity, pity!" and groaning with heart-felt sorrow, the old man leaned forward, burying his face in a huge bandana handkerchief. His daughter, meantime, tied a moon-faced baby in its straw chair and glanced with sad eyes toward her father, over whom great waves of sorrow seemed to surge, for he was certainly weeping.

The whole town was in trouble. Every fireplace was a convention, and young and old discussed the matter with pale faces and frightened eyes.

"Why, what has she done, suppose she has gone away?" asked a little sunny-haired lassie of fifteen.

"She has done such a terrible thing that if you were to meet her here to-morrow you should not so much as look at her," said her stern, Puritan mother. "You must never take her name on your lips. She has ruined herself, broken the hearts of her parents, and disgraced us all, for who did not love and care for Charty Spangler? Oh, Anne, may we see you in your grave rather than left to that terrible sin!—that's my prayer, the prayer of your mother."

The child shrank away in terror from those cold eyes and the lowering brow of the Deacon's wife; went by herself to muse and wonder what this sad thing might be.

Alas for the aged Captain and the old wife! A winter more piercing, more desolating than that which heaped snows about their dwelling lay within their home, about their hearts. At first, they would not believe the girl had gone. Their Charty—their beautiful, loving child—the only rose in their garden—maddening thought!—could she leave them for a stranger? No, no; it was a cruel mistake of the messenger—it was all a delusion—Charty would come back. She had gone to a neighbor's—had overslept herself; they should see her soon; and the old Captain took his walking-stick and hobbled to the door; out past the ghostly bushes, just gathering a few shreds of raiment from the sun, that hung palely over the pastures, brightening not deepening the faint blue of the sky; down into the road, where, when a neighbor met him, the pitying look of the face, the quiet, measured shake of the hand, almost broke his heart.

Home again went the old bowed head, and "It's too true, mother, our child's left us!" burst from his lips prolonged in sob and groan, while she fell back ghastly and stiff.

Well, some neighbors came in because they must. The desolating storm swept every hope away, and left the old people wrecks upon the slow tide of life. They were bowed to the very earth. They could not bear the gaze of any living soul, they said; so their seat in the old Cape Meeting-house was never occupied. How many, as they glanced toward it, thought of the almost angel-face that used to look up over the rude moulding and smile at every thing in sight, even at the grim countenance of Elder Seekless, with the ghostly bands hanging under his heavy chin. They spoke of her now with contempt and loathing; they had no words of pity. To them she was a sinner above all others; an outcast from every good thing. Not so with the two poor souls who bowed themselves night and morning in prayer for the erring child, as two slow years went by.

"If she'd come back, John—if she'd only come back, we'd love her again, wouldn't we, John? She's our only child, you know; spared to us after so much tribulation, after so many sorrows. Oh! John, we'd welcome her; we'd take care of her, wouldn't we?"

"I wonder who else would?" the trembling voice responded, while heavy tears rolled down the hollows worn by years and grief. "Yes, I wonder who else would if we wouldn't?"

It was a cold night in December. The flame of the wood-fire painted uneasy shadows on the white walls—where the smoke had left a background for them—and a strange stillness, almost like the hush of death, reigned through the household. The little parlor closed upon darkness that held no ghost save that of memory. In the corner sat the rocker with the tidy hanging over the back. The chairs were left just as she arranged them for the last time, only a chill of winter air hung over all. It was touching to see the poor old couple sitting by the kitchen fire, hand in hand. She had been quite ill, and he, hobbling round as best he could, had tended her lovingly. That the poor Captain's heart was broken any one might perceive by one glance at his sorrowful face. It was literally a transcript of long-concealed agonies held down by a will of iron—the will of the quarter-deck.

It was not a shadow of the fire that glided grayly from a crouching posture in the corner, and with ghostly tread, save that it was weak and faltering, trembled to the space behind the chairs of the two old people. There it stood, tangible, yet solemnly and strangely unreal; long drapery falling from two outstretched arms—outstretched as if eager to fold those gray, bowed heads; but it still seemed so wan, so spirit-like, that one could almost see the fire through it. Long it wavered there—the head drooping—the frame shivering—and then a great sob sounded—

"Father!—mother!"

And the shadowy figure sank down, down, as if life were leaving it throb by throb, until, the white hands resting one on each aged shoulder, poor Charty Spangler sank to the very ground.

Oh! the cry that went up, wild with anguish but human with love. It was their lost child, her garments crusted with the snow, her fair hair not curling now, but plastered straight to her forehead by the driving storm she had traveled through, and in her large eyes a look of dumb despair.

"Can't you speak, Charty? Can't you say a word, dear?" cried the old mother, her broken voice changed by shrill sobs. "The dear lamb! Help me to lift her, John. Don't turn away. She's ours—our own! God gave her, spared her. What is it, mother's blessed?" she murmured in words of endearment, as if in her heart she were fondling the babe that nineteen years ago lay a helpless, waxen thing over her strong heart. The white lips parted; language hovered over them as a scared bird, then fled afrighted. Presently one tremulous sound echoed along the pale mouth—once so rosy—and though it was like a moan, they shaped it into the word "Hunger!"

"Good Heavens, John, she's fainting—hunger! Go quick—get the milk, father—get—any thing—all the food you can find! Mother's blessing!" she fondly cried, tears and sobs almost choking her, while Captain Spangler hobbled away, in his bewilderment opening the cellar door, down which he would have fallen but for the quick cry of his wife.

There was no rest for the two poor old people till morning. Then, when the gray-white shadows of the coming dawn clouded the dim rays of the night-lamp, Charty told her sad story.

"And you wrote all those letters? We never got one—no, not one;" cried the old mother, distractedly.

"And you believed yourself married all this time till the day you started for home?" It was the old father's voice, trembling with love and anguish.

"Before Heaven I did, father!"

The old wife sought the eyes of her husband; tears, bitter tears, had brimmed them, and each time-worn cheek was channeled with the waters of their grief.

"Father, we never found her in a lie."

"No, Gerty, we never did." And overcome by this sweet proof of their child's honesty, they fell forward into each other's arms, gray hairs and tears and sobbing articulations mingling with the low cry that burst from Charty's lips—"Oh, thank God! they do believe me."

"Charty Spangler has come home!"

The news ran through the town like wild-fire.

Shades of blue, green, and yellow diversified the cold visages of the Cape women. They shook their heads; they clashed their knitting needles; they pursed up their prim mouths, and set their faces as flints Charty-ward. Do not judge them too severely. It was their strong love of virtue that made them over-just. They never reflected that through this humiliation, this crushing sorrow, a soul might be saved. They were like the shore on which they were born, girt in by strong religious prejudices, as they by brown, sand-ribbed rocks."

"I wonder if she expects any of us to visit her?"

"If she does she's mistaken;" answered the good, severe wife of Deacon Dilway, glancing uneasily at her daughter Anne, whose scarlet cheeks betrayed her more womanly knowledge, though averted eye and occupied manner made her seem unconscious. "Anne, child, you remember Charty Spangler?"

"Yes, indeed, I guess I do. How beautiful she was! I used to think she looked like an angel."

"But the angels fell once from their high estate and became devils." This her aunt said with not a little asperity, rocking to and fro, reeling white yarn from the high points of an old pilgrim chair.

"Human beings may repent, aunty," said gentle Anne.

"They may!" and bitter was the accent. "I sha'n't countenance her, though, till I know she's thorough. It's proof enough to me of her wickedness that she tries to make people believe that she thought she was married—a likely story. Why didn't she come like the prodigal son, confessing all? Then I'd a had some faith in her. Heaven save us from contamination with what she's likely been! And to think how poor old Cap'n Spangler used to pray the Lord for that girl!"

"Hurrah! Clyde's out in the stream!" shouted a tow-headed boy, flinging up his cap, displaying breadth and color that would have thrown a Flemish painter into ecstasies. The women looked at each other.

"He'll hear of it," whispered the Deacon's wife.

"The Lord pity him!" echoed her sister. "I wonder if the miserable creature knows it?"

The miserable creature was but too conscious. She was very weak and ill, and the good mother, strong in Christ, had made home seem as it did before the fall. Charty was placed in the capacious rocker—she had refused the bed-chair with strong shuddering—and drawn near the little window rich with sunlighted drops of crystal. The snow had not all gone. Like rounds of frosted sweets it lay here and there, its edges melting into dun and green. Afar off the blue horizon sparkled with cloud wreaths like silver, and faint suggestions of icy peaks outlined themselves on the far horizon. The blood had gone from Charty's wan cheeks—a colorless transparency as of death revived, yet touched with a certain lustre, like that we see on the forehead of an innocent babe sometimes, made her face more than beautiful. She had confessed her whole transgression—a sinner not above all others, but terribly sinned against, and wearing the garments of penitence, as a saintly nun wears her shroud, that she may contemplate that which is beyond death. She did not know the Clyde was in—that its bright flag streamed from the straight mast—or that Neale had indeed fulfilled his prediction, and come home Captain Conrade.

So when she heard his stop on the path her heart stood still. "Help!" was the cry upon her lips. "Father, mother, I can not see him!" But the old Captain had gone out on his morning walk, and the old mother, singing,

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne
And worship only thee;"

with high, wavering voice, sadly broken yet strangely rich through love and divine pity, rolled out paste for the Saturday's baking. Charty grew paler and colder as the step came on. One look through the window—before she had time to think, scarcely to breathe, he was at her side.

"Charty, my darling! I heard nothing of all this. How sick you have been! Thank God that I find you alive. Charty! no word of welcome for me?"

She had covered her face with the thin hands; she was quivering, gasping, dying, it seemed to her. How should she tell him? how gather her failing strength?

"Neale, oh don't; don't come any nearer to me. I have deceived—I am unworthy of you. When you know all, you will hate me. Go ask my mother: no, no; that will be killing her anew. Oh! God help me! what shall I do?"

He stood there in a mist of doubt and uncertainty that veiled him grayly. His florid cheeks had changed to the hue of ashes. His hand, still outstretched, grew rigid. What did she mean? Was that a posture his future wife should take? Charty—and—shame! he could not couple them together. She saw that in his look which humbled her more than the dread of confession—a beauty born of virtue and integrity—a nobility that brought back in wild, hot gushes the pure love of her other life—for she seemed to have endured two separate forms of existence.

Sternly he listened, his arms folded over his chest to keep down the laboring anguish.

"And is it for this I have cherished your image so sacredly!" he cried, in a tumult of passion. "Charty, I find that I am a proud man, very proud. I could not bear the humiliation—yes, humiliation—of a fate united to yours. If it kill me—for I do love you, Charty—God who has heard my prayers for you, who has seen my heart for three years, written all over with your name, knows that—if it kill me, I must live without you. Good-by, and Heaven forgive you, Charty Spangler—I can not."

Her mother came in five minutes after he had gone—came in still singing, stopped, drew her spectacles over her dim eyes—the poor girl lay across the chair as she had fallen—death could not have bleached her face whiter.

"The dearest idol I have known!"

"The Lord has heard me—my idol is gone!" shrieked the poor woman.

Not yet. She lived to read, six months after, in the village paper, that the good ship Clyde was expected to sail for Europe, and Captain Conrade contemplated taking his young wife on the voyage with him. One sigh only told of the past—one spasm darkened the statue-like face.

"He could not have found a better wife or a sweeter than Anne Dilway," she murmured, crowding the tears back; "but oh! I wish he had forgiven me."

Pale and shining—for in her face was the peace of heaven, God had forgiven her!—Charity Spangler moved about her mother's dwelling an earth-bound angel. She it was who conquered their fear and softened their pride, leading them almost hand in hand back to the seat in the sanctuary. Intruding herself on no one's notice, she sat, and walked, wrapped in her cold serenity—fearless as unconscious, I was about to say, but she could not be unconscious of the virtuous scrutiny, the haughty forgetfulness, of those who had once spoken her name with pride. At home she moved quietly back and forth—taking the heaviest duties on her slender hands—lavishing all the now pure wealth of her love on the old parents, who spoke of her to each other as a saint, an angel, with reverent whispers. At last the world's great destroyer shook his heavy wings over the household, and the dews of death fell upon it. Then Charity strengthened the trembling hands—held upon her bosom the aged heads—whispered to them of pearly gates—clear rivers of crystal—golden streets and glory. How she seemed to lift the veil from the misty eyes, and point out the shining ones in flowing garments!

"The house is yours, Charity. God be with you, my own child. I've never been sorry I prayed for your life. Don't weep, dear; it—it won't be long, you know, and we—we'll watch over you."

"We," he said; for in another room the old wife's gray hairs glistened under her shroud-cap. A few neighbors were there, and they marveled at Charity's wonderful calm.

"Her heart is hardened, I'm afeared," muttered an old crone.

"Then Heaven grant that we may all have hard hearts," said the pastor, solemnly, who had stood by the dead, and they had not known it. "I tell you, sisters, before high Heaven, that young girl has redeemed herself. She has had no friend but God. You and I, Heaven forgive me! have turned unchristianly from her striving; and the fire of hell is cold to the fire of our persecution—our unkind unrelenting. From henceforth I am her friend, her father, and she shall be my daughter. Yes, and I pity the man or the woman who can add the anguish-drop of even a cold word to her bitter sorrow."

They were very still after that; and there were two to watch till the grave-sod should be lifted.

Charity Spangler came back to the house where she was born, alone, after the funeral. She had been pressed by more than one near neighbor to go with them. Those who had looked upon her coldly came forward, took her passive hand, and, striving to speak, burst into tears. The contrition, the forgiveness, were complete—nothing was withheld. The old old men who had loved her father looked at the willowy figure, so shrouded in black, and tears streamed down their withered cheeks. They saw before them the innocent Christ-redeemed child of God; they remembered the sunny curls, the tender eyes, the prattling accents of the "old Cap'n's darlin'." So, though Charity went home alone, and, throwing herself upon her knees, cried out with uncontrollable anguish because she felt the sorrowful stillness, she bore with her the prayers, the love of many hearts, and imperceptibly they strengthened her.

She had accepted her lot. Only twenty-three—and the pulses of life throbbed strongly in all her veins. Her father had died at ninety—her mother at seventy; she had no reason to think the threads of her existence might be severed in an undue time, for hers was a long-lived race. Oh, what should she do? how wrap her mind in occupation that it might not beat with resistless longings for a future that might have been so wrapped in joy and beauty?

Looking over the paper one June morning, Charity suddenly sprang from her seat, while, involuntarily, her hand covered her heart.

The Clyde reported; the Captain bringing home the dead body of his young wife.

Oh, those heavy throbs! oh, the sickening desolation that fell over her like a pall!

Charity thought of the home soon to be shrouded in mourning. During the sad days that came after the first blow she kept the house, remained isolated and heart-wearied till the Clyde left for a foreign shore; and she had not once seen him, though she had heard of his quiet but deep sorrow. So he was gone again—gone a weary year, and Charity still remained in the little red Cape house. The sombre shadows of her dreary life were beginning to settle down upon her. There was no compensation in her lot save the love of Heaven. She had kept her beauty, but she no longer valued it—no longer gloried that her eyes were like stars, or her fingers slender and rosy-pointed. More than one good offer she had rejected—she thought to reject all.

One morning there came a letter whose superscription filled her with horror. She tore it open, ran a half-crazed glance over the contents. They softened her terrible resentment. He was dying—he the betrayer, the profligate, his fortune gone, his mother and sister dead, his friends outraged, his humanity set at naught. He only wanted a line from her—would she forgive him? Oh! one word from her might allay the terrible flames of remorse that were burning in his soul.

It was pitiful. With trembling hand, and eyes glistening with such tears as she seldom shed now, she caught paper and pen, and traced the following:

"Go to God for mercy; I have forgiven you.

"CHARTY."

On that same night, while a strange fever sent throbbing heats along her veins, the village postman brought a second letter for Charty. Ah! that handwriting was as familiar to her as the other. She bowed her head upon it, and in her heart she prayed for strength; then opened it, her hands shaking, her eyes mist-covered. Thus it ran:

"ON BOARD THE 'CLYDE,' BOSTON HARBOR.

"DEAR CHARTY,—I went from you one day, five years ago, in anger. Instead of listening to the voice of my own conscience, my own judgment, I allowed myself, in the anguish of my heart, to be influenced by others, and I said I would never forgive you. With many of our town's people, I would not believe your story, although my very soul cried out against the unbelief. To-day I have seen a wretched sinner against God and you. My pride went out, my vengeance fell dead within me, as I witnessed the gloomy death-hour of the man who has cursed my life and yours. Charty, the man I saw to-day lying cold and rigid, the face made almost horrible by the shadows of remorse that the departing spirit threw over it as it fled from the body, was Guy Sommers. No hand ministered to him through love. He was like some poor wrecked ship, deserted to her fate. Oh, Charty, as I sit in my cabin, and hear the waters striking the sides of the vessel, each little wave seems to tell me that I have been a greater sinner than you. I will not enter into details. My wife, the innocent and beautiful girl whom her parents gave to my unhappy keeping is gone from me; she died far out at sea. Heaven knows that I did all for her that mortal man could do; it knows also into what depths of wretchedness my soul entered when I waked up to the truth that you were the only woman I ever loved. She was happy to the last—God be thanked! Her dying head was pillowed on my bosom; and since the time I saw the green grass cover her I have been an altered man. Now I come to you; I throw myself on your mercy. Charty Spangler, I can not live without you. In some mysterious way your presence haunts me—through the still night-watches—in the full glare of day. It was with me in the last storm, when death and destruction rode the waves together; and when I saw the hour in which I said, 'The next I shall be judged by the Eternal,' a pure white angel with your face, Charty Spangler, glided by on the raging waters. Charty, may I come back to you? As humble as before I was proud, I sue to you. Your answer will give me hope or despair. In ten days the Clyde sails. If I go in her without you, I take my final farewell of the land where I was born. Charty—blessed—blessed—may I come?"

NEALE CONRADE."

Ah! what happy tears fell on the paper, as with trembling hand she traced one word:

"Come.

"CHARTY."

Her soul was rich now, richer even than when laden with the wealth of hope and patience and sweet spiritual desires. Heaven was her only goal, and all anticipation of earthly happiness put away from mind and heart; for its joy had the one drop wanting that now brimmed it, shining with a jeweled splendor on the crystal cup of her desire—the honest love of a true and noble man.

So the cabin of the good ship Clyde was from henceforth her throne.

WHAT IS BEST?

I.—WHICH IS PRELIMINARY.

I HOPE every body who sets out to read this story is familiar with the little child's game called "Simon." There is a kind of philosophy in all games, as there is in every thing else, if we could but see it; and this in particular always struck me as a very comical parody on that more mature game of "Follow my leader," which all the world delights to play at, whether the leader be Napoleon, or Mr. Genio C. Scott, who does the fashion-plates with so admirable a grace.

But I do not mean to drag the game of Simon in here on account of any philosophical principles which a crotchety man might pick out of it, as Jersey men pick pearls from decayed clams. The less as, like some stupid Jersey men, I should most likely cook my clam, and thus spoil my pearl. "Simon" comes appositely to me, because the man of whom I am about to write always seemed to me the veritable "old original" Simon—the ideal Simon, of whom all other five-year-old Simons are but the faint reflex; and because in this person's career I seem to detect certain progressive phases which are like nothing so much as the consecutive development of a well-played game of "Simon."

It is as well to own here, at the beginning, that the "hero" of this story is what we call in America a "literary man."

I have noticed that the American public is very fond of gossip about the private lives of great writers. When the beloved Irving died, there was scarce one of us poor devils but remembered or invented some pleasant little anecdote illustrative of his genial character; and even his family physician entered the lists with a pathetic and pathologic description of the disease to which the dear old gentleman succumbed; as though Providence had provided a special and entirely novel extinguisher to put out the lamp of so great a genius, leaving the vulgar rush-lights of common scribblers to be snuffed out in the usual way—with the fingers, so to speak. Now, it is of no use to kick against the pricks; and as it is so evidently the highest duty and business of a magazine writer to please his public, I have determined to communicate here some passages, hitherto unnoted, in the life of the only distinguished writer it has been my good fortune to know.

I met him first one evening at a party given by my good friend, Mr. Brown, in the Fifth Avenue (New York). I was listening to some of the brilliant sallies of the celebrated editor (and part proprietor) of the New York Daily Golden Egg, when he suddenly ceased speaking, and looking over my right shoulder toward a middle-aged, compactly-built, uncomfortable-looking man, dressed in a coat which made my hair stand on end by its frightful unfitness, said,

"Do you know who that is?"

"That?" said I; "no."

"That," said he, "is one of the great editorial lights of this country, and a most successful writer. It is the celebrated MacGurdigan."

"Is it possible!" I exclaimed. "Do I see before me"—I had turned about, and was now facing the renowned personage—"do I see before me the great Stoffle MacGurdigan?"

Then, seized with an irresistible desire to know intimately one of the most remarkable men our country has produced, I said, catching the hand of my friend the editor,

"My dear Goose, do me a great favor: introduce me to a man whom I have heard so greatly admired."

Goose, who is as amiable socially as he is valorous editorially, at once complied with my wishes.

We were introduced to each other! I shook the hand which had penned lines whose matchless eloquence, stern patriotism, and great moral purpose have, in my humble opinion, never been excelled—no, not even by the immortal Tupper. The lustrous eyes of genius beamed a kindly look upon me. Need I add that I was happy?

It is the fate of greatness to be troubled by littleness. It is a misfortune that at our great parties undisturbed intellectual conversation, which is so delightful between friends, is almost impossible. (Mrs. Betsey, my wife, remarks here, parenthetically, that great parties are not given to promote precisely this object—but that is neither here nor there.) I was listening with rapt attention to the words of my distinguished friend, hoping to catch some sentence which I should treasure up hereafter (and perhaps publish at his death, in a little biographical sketch), when some intrusive and ill-mannered person touched him lightly on the arm, and, ere he could remonstrate, bore him off to a distant part of the room.

Thus concluded my first and only meeting with a man who is so often admired as among the chief of those few who have shed such a lustre upon our country's journalism.

And thus we complete this preliminary division of our history, and come, without farther delay, to the story itself—of which, however, I must first be permitted to say, that as the revelations I am about to make are necessarily sometimes unpleasant to the person spoken of—as are many revelations which the intelligent public buys and reads with the utmost avidity—and as I should grieve to have the revered MacGurdigan suspect me as the cause of any pain he may suffer in this case, I have requested the respectable editor of this Magazine to withhold my name from those emissaries of the goddess of Fame who, as I am informed, call upon him monthly to gain that knowledge which enables them to praise or damn impartially each article as it appears, and without the preliminary trouble of reading it. For though, as a rule, I abhor the absurd anonymous system now in vogue in the Magazines—whereby one man becomes as good as another, and sometimes a great deal better—I own that in peculiar cases—as this—it has its conveniences.

And thus we come at last to the beginning of the game.

II.—IN WHICH "SIMON SAYS SHOW YOUR HANDS."

STOFFLE MACGURDIGAN, Esquire, was born in Peoria, a place which has furnished most of our country's great men. This fact is not a very important one; but it is the duty of a biographer, not only to be fully informed, but also to make evident this fullness to his readers; and moreover, the Peorians, among whom this Magazine has a great circulation, will feel flattered by the mention of their cherished home in its pages.

It was while he was at college that young Stoffle gave the first indications of genius. These preliminary sparks were drawn out by a young lady of the place, whom the boys used to call a flame of his. She was a pretty girl, Lucy Jones by name, who had been predestined by her parents to catch an undergraduate; and who made the best of her fate by wounding and capturing that one who seemed to her the finest fellow in the class, which was the Senior, when Cupid lent her his bow and arrows.

There were twenty-six Seniors to choose out of; and she chose Stoffle.

There were sixty-nine marriageable young ladies to choose from (leaving out of the account twenty-five who had already made up their minds, and one hundred and thirty-three who were yet in short dresses, and flirted with the Juniors, and made faces at the Sophomores). And Stoffle chose Lucy Jones.

Whose love was the greatest?

Young men dream dreams; and all the more and all the better when they have a young woman to help them. These two, you may be sure, went into the castle-building line very strongly.

They were poor. And surely there is no such architect as poverty.

They were deeply in love. And surely there is no such decorator as love.

They were young. And surely there is no such landscape gardener as youth.

What splendid castles they did build! What superb views! What magnificent distances! For in Spain, you must know, every castle is placed on top of a mountain; and though the view immediately below is somewhat obstructed by a kind of pleasant Indian-summery haze, if you look far enough away every thing at once becomes clear and bright, and as glorious—as glorious as you please to imagine it.

Meantime the Senior year was drawing to a close, and the question What to do? began to urge itself with an irritating pertinacity which interfered a good deal with the pleasures of architecture. When a young man has the world before him to choose from, and a pretty girl's happiness depending on his choice, it is not so easy to decide what is best. There were projects—and projects. Of course Stoffle was not going to be a shoemaker. They do not waste four years in college to fit themselves for shoemaking—I wish they did. And this being thus out of the question, there remained only the ministry—for which Stoffle did not feel a particular “call;” medicine—which involved three or four years farther study, and an indefinite postponement of connubial bliss; and the law: but think of the lawyers' shingles, thick as clap-boards in a Down-East village, which disfigure all our business streets! And then—

“Why then—of course! Why did not we think of it before? Was not Stoffle the best writer in his class? And was not there literature?”

To be sure—that was just it! It is such a comfort, just when you have stumbled upon a dreadful dilemma with three horns, each of which looks disagreeably sharp, to come suddenly upon a fourth horn which is two-pronged, and receives you in its soft arch without trouble or goring.

So there was literature—and Stoffle should be a literary man. That was settled at any rate. Then by-and-by he would write essays and books, which would give him reputation, and some day he would come back and lecture before the Lyceum in the old college-town—and would not that be fame? and would not that be happiness? thought dear Lucy Jones; who had a very beautiful castle built in a minute, on the very highest peak in all Spain, and standing on its roof looked all over the world at once, and saw only every where, covering the sky above and the trees below, large posters announcing in red letters that “Stoffle MacGurdigan, Esquire, the celebrated author and popular lecturer, would deliver the opening lecture of the course on” and so forth, and so forth.

Now there is a vagueness about this term “literary man,” which is exceedingly charming to almost every body. “What does so-and-so do?” “Oh, he is a literary man!” And then you have settled the matter. That includes fame, and money, and friends, and influence, and every other kind of happiness that the very robust imagination of full-blooded youth can think out.

As for bread and butter and new shoes for the baby—in Spain, it is well known, all the forests are full of bread-and-butter trees; and as for baby's shoes, why bless your dear soul, you must not look so very far ahead. Is it not known that every book makes the fortune of its author? Did not Cooper build a town? Did not Mrs. Stowe go to Europe in state? And are there not “Homes of American authors”? dear cozy places, with old-time traditions, and ivy, and flowers, and a lawn, and a carriage-house in the distance? And shall there be no more cottages on the Hudson?

Nevertheless, if you look into the matter a little, you will find that Professor Longfellow is a teacher; and Mr. Bryant is an editor; and

Mr. Hawthorne was very glad to exchange the “Old Manse” for Salem Custom-House, and that for the Liverpool Consulate; while I—if you must know it, Madame—I am a tailor. A fashionable tailor, of course; none of your vulgar snips. When you come down to Franklin Square, the Editor of this Magazine will be glad to hand you my business card; and if you meet him going to church on fine Sundays, you can see one of my most stylish coats—and please to call your husband's attention to the graceful swing of the tails. It is a new cut, invented for me by a poor devil in my establishment, and which I have patented.

So dear Stoffle should be a literary man. That was certainly best; and when it was settled a great weight of responsibility was taken off Lucy's mind. For, of course, she felt responsible for Stoffle's future; and this vexatious question of “What to do?” had given her some sleepless nights. And now it was settled so nicely!

For, after all, lawyers are notoriously selfish creatures, and often have to make wrong right, and right wrong; and physicians seem to grow callous to suffering, and besides never have a real spare hour, and may be called out at any time of night, which is not comfortable to look forward to. And as for preachers—to be sure that is to be great and good: but then preachers are a little stiff and all that; and society forbids them to dance and do other pleasant things which society does not deny itself. But a “literary man!” That was just the thing! There was leisure, and culture, and freedom. And what a noble field for doing good! thought dear sweet Lucy Jones.

(Of course the thing was out of the question, because I was only a beginner in business then, and had but a small shop in a poor street, and was not yet famous for my cut or for my occasional literary labors; and Lucy Jones and her people would have laughed in my face had they suspected it: but in those days, when Lucy's nice face went past my shop window, with a kind of sweet glory of humble happiness and sunny glad good-nature lining her bonnet, I used to wish that I too was a Senior in college; and my heart would go pitapat, and my needle would jag my fingers, in spite of myself. I was even ass enough once to trust her brother for a suit of my best broadcloth, and lost my bill, as I deserved. Of course I do not bear malice toward Lucy. But that is neither here nor there—as I tell Mrs. Betsey when she wants to interfere with the shop—as the best of women will sometimes.)

“What a noble field for doing good!” said she to Stoffle, as they talked over his future, which was now so pleasantly settled. So many wrongs in the world yet to put down with his brave and eloquent pen. So many brave thoughts, which should strengthen the weak and encourage the weary on the way of life. So wide a field! and then she felt, away down in her loving heart, a secret fear, by no means to be expressed lest it should discourage this puissant young knight—a secret fear lest all the wrongs should be righted ere he could fairly buckle on his armor and make ready to charge with his goose-quill—lest the devil should die before this, her saint, got one good blow at him.

A few weeks before Commencement they called together one evening at the house of the President, the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre; and how Lucy's heart beat when the kind old gentleman—whom every young man and maiden in the town loved as a father—said, "Well, Stoffle, pretty soon now you'll leave us. Have you determined what career to make for yourself, my dear boy?"

Stoffle hesitated a little, as was natural; but finally brought out his determination to take to literature.

The old gentleman's face shone with pleasure. "That is a noble thought," said he. "I wish more of our young men would turn their attention to letters. Business is very well, and for the majority commerce or a lucrative profession is best. But I sorrow to see the best minds I train up go out to seek gold, as though California were the nearest cut to heaven, and eagles the only birds to carry men to Paradise."

"And what branch of letters or study do you intend to pursue?" asked the old Doctor, presently.

"That is what I would be glad to have your advice on, Sir," said Stoffle, blushing.

There was a little pause, while the Doctor bent his head down and gently rubbed his eyebrows with his outstretched fingers—his way of exciting ideality and the other intellectual organs which phrenologists assure us lie near those parts.

"Well, my boy," was the reply after this little pause, "you have your living to make while you build up for yourself that edifice of fame from whose summit you will one day look down on us all. I think I should, if I were in your place, seek a connection with the daily press. It is not difficult, I believe, for educated young men, of good moral character, and who come well recommended (as it will be my care to see that you are), to obtain the place of reporter on a daily journal."

Stoffle looked down in silence and evident disappointment.

"A reporter!" exclaimed Lucy, who, though listening to Mrs. Wiseacre, had not lost a word of the other conversation. "Oh, Doctor! a reporter! why, Stoffle is going to be a poet!"

"All in good time, my dear," was the reply; "all in good time. We must not begin at the top of the ladder, you know—else the first step would be the last, and we should lose all the pleasure and advantage of the ascent."

"But a reporter!" reiterated Lucy, with a pretty pout; "why, any body can be a reporter!"

"My dear child," said the Doctor, "draw your stool up here. There, sit down just here; I want to tell you something." And looking kindly into the young girl's upturned face, and smoothing her fair hair, as she sat at his feet, the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre said:

"The daily newspaper of our day, my dear, is the Iliad of our age—only written up journal-wise, and by fifty Homers instead of one. Before you say 'only a Reporter,' think for a moment what is the work of which this lowly worker is to do his share. Consider the mighty influence of this Daily press—which has been called the Fourth Estate in England, where the London Times, by its Jove-like omnipotence of sway, has earned itself the name of Thunderer. Note how daily it brings all the affairs of all the world before that little world of highest intelligence which shapes the destinies of a century. See how its private enterprise shames the tardiness of government expresses, and corrects the blunders of official mismanagement. Read how daily it makes public what rogues and fools vainly strive to conceal; and giving honest news to all the world, thereby prevents those cheating combinations and wicked monopolies in politics and trade by which selfish men are ever ready to war against society for their own advantage. See this Times, or one of our own great dailies, marching on in its course, steadfast and calm, unmoved by the eager pressure of party interests, undismayed by the awful front of sudden and unlooked-for calamities; and in times of trouble, when events seem to have broken loose, and the majority of men are looking on with bewildered minds, incapable of right thought or judicious action, see this great guide and helmsman of the State moving unflinchingly in his course, never heeding the clamors of demagogues or the pulings of cowards; blown about by no stray winds of doctrine; holding ever his grand faith, that a principle is of more value and of greater power than any multitude of interests: possessing his iron soul in patience; willing to wait; believing in God; knowing that men strive vainly against His laws, and that only truth is simple, only truth is useful, only truth can conquer. Let us thank God that this daily paper is indeed not only the guide and helmsman of our civilization, but truly its ruler; the general who leads the front of battle—or, better (for this is but a sorry comparison), the architect who guides, according to the immutable principles of the universe, the innumerable army of workmen who are ever adding stone after stone to the great temple of our modern Christian Democratic Civilization.

"What are kings and councilors to this Times, which makes public their secrets before they have themselves guessed them? What are Presidents and would-be Presidents, eagerly seeking to mislead the public will to their own short-sighted and perverse theories—misstating facts and falsifying history—to this faithful monitor, who from his calm eminence speaks daily truth to waiting millions; with his little pellet of fact blows to the winds the fine-spun theories of scheming politicians; with his Drummond-light of common sense clears the horizon, however darkened by clouds of lies. How impotent the power of the mightiest self-seeking against this simple engine, whose daily breath is that never-perishing voice of the people, which is so truly the voice of God!

What Neapolitan dungeon of the Inquisition does not open to its talismanic touch? What secret of tyranny is safe from its searching gaze? What perfidious treason can gain head so long as this thousand-eyed watchman sits faithful at his post?

"The people which possesses but one such free press, honest, incorruptible, and sensible, is safe against all the mysteries of tyranny and all the wicked devices of misplaced ambition. One such free press may work a Revolution—one such free press may inaugurate a Reformation. As indeed, to my mind, old Luther was himself the father of daily journalism—the man who first proved to the world the vast power of an honest word, spoken in season and out of season, repeated to-day, reiterated to-morrow, spread every where, educating every man, even the lowest peasant, to think for himself. The constantly recurring numberless pamphlets of Luther were the germ of which our daily paper is the full-grown fruit; and Brother Martin was himself a model editor—scorning no topic, if only it illustrated a truth; thinking no game too small, nor too large; awed by no threats of consequences, to himself or to the world; puzzled by no sophistries; keeping fast hold of his torch of truth, brandishing it unceasingly in the faces of her opponents, and never swerving a hair's-breadth—in whatever hideous and devilish uproar—from that grand and simple faith in right, and in God, the father and defender of right, which alone upheld him, against Popes and Emperors and Kings, and all the forces which Satan anxiously brought forward to put down the terrible monk!

"Thus does the office of editor seem to me, my dear, the highest and noblest which a man may nowadays aspire to. He is the wise and brave general of an army in which the reporter is, to be sure, but a humble private—but remember that here, as in Napoleon's legions, every private (besides his rations of frugal but sufficient bread and cheese) carries in his knapsack a marshal's baton. 'Only a reporter,' my dear? Think again, if it is not an office worthy and ennobling in itself—even if it were not the first step on the way to the potent editorial chair; which I am sure no one will reach more speedily, or fill more worthily, than our Stoffle."

"Dearie me, what a lecture, Doctor!" exclaimed Mrs. Wiseacre. "I'm sure I thought you were scolding poor dear Lucy. Don't mind him, my dear. I don't believe you understood half he said."

But Lucy did comprehend and believe all she had just heard; and with a soft sigh of regret at the vanishing picture of Stoffle the poet, she turned with renewed hope to the just rising image of Stoffle the editor.

"I am content, dear Sir, if only Stoffle thinks it best," said she, in her sweet, humble way, asking nothing for herself, but only for her hero.

And he, now seeing for the first time a practical opening into that jealous oyster, the world, was no less content to be "only a reporter"—determining in his secret heart, however, to give still some spare hours to the Muse.

Thus was brought about Stoffle MacGurdigan's connection with the daily press—but for which I should have lacked a hero for this story; and thus we come to Part

III.—IN WHICH "SIMON SAYS UP."

I am not sure but the good old President made himself a little ridiculous to the well-informed reader (if I should chance to have such), when he expressed a belief that educated young men, of good moral character, and coming well recommended, were especially eligible to reportorial places on the Daily Press. The fact is, in the country a New York daily looks like a very tremendous affair, with a very tremendous purpose, and conducted with prodigious and never hesitating wisdom in all its branches; and simple country people, like our President, reasoning with too much literalness from apparent effects to quite impossible causes, easily persuade themselves that the Daily Golden Egg really contains a healthy embryo chick. In which belief they are confirmed by the persistent cackle of the editor, who, remembering that the voices of his family once saved Rome, magnanimously cackles away, for dear life, resolved that if Republics can be saved by so slight a means as this, ours shall at least last out his lifetime.

To prevent disappointment, and to keep away from the city the armies of well-educated young men with good moral characters, who so greatly abound in the rural districts, I think it proper to give notice that the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre was misinformed; and that no opening of the kind promises itself to the precise characters specified—who will find their best opportunities in the whaling service, where their work will be healthier and a trifle more dangerous, but no dirtier.

A good character is of very little importance in the city. And this not because we do not regard such things, dear friends, but because here, in the metropolis, every body—even the Mayor—is eminently respectable; and there is such an abundance of this moral gold that it has long ago ceased to be a medium of exchange, and is scarce thought now to have even a commercial value. I may add that brass, which much resembles it, passes current far more readily; but this is a hint which will perhaps be needless to the country reader.

Thus when Stoffle came to New York to try his fortune, it was not his sheep-skin certificate of scholarship, nor his very numerous vouchers of good moral character that gained him his first opportunity, but the discovery that he was an adept in the crooked mysteries of short-hand, and could follow a rapid speaker with tolerable accuracy. And thus he entered upon that strange, and to most young men very pleasing life of daily journalism.

Pleasing, because it sets at defiance all the carefully-instilled rules of commonplace life; because here the young man lives, so to speak, among his antipodes: sleeps when others wake, works when others rest, plays when others work; because his very labors have in them all the excitement and chance of a game; because his success, if he is successful, is at once declared—his failure quickly decided; because he makes his own opportunities, may give fullest rein to his enterprise, and has his ambition strung to its highest by the consciousness that each day will bring his reward for the shrewd and faithful service of yesterday. Better even than the sea is this life to an adventurous young man; for here is all the chance of the sailor's life, ten times its opportunities, and none of its monotony. He wakes, not knowing when or where he shall next sleep. He eats wherever hunger may seize him; smokes whenever the humor strikes; may go any where and every where; and has—last and best of all to the fresh tastes of youth—the delicious privilege of reversing that stupid proverb which speaks of “early to bed and early to rise:” for your reporter's maxim is, that nothing happens before half past eleven A.M., and he makes it a point to breakfast in bed at eleven.

To collect facts, in these days of Stoffle's novitiate, seemed to him the very noblest and most delightful employment for the human soul and body. It had all the odd charm of walking along the sea-beach finding shells; only here was not the tiresome uniformity of the shore. A reporter is a kind of roving detective on the search for stray information; a Bow Street officer in pursuit of runaway items; a flibustier diligently capturing the rich argosies of news which fall in his way. To gather facts: that is the great aim of his life. No matter what, no matter where, no matter how; for to a reporter a fact is a fact—and I am sorry to say that to some of the craft a fiction (if it only savor of blood and thunder) is also a fact. To him an Item is the one thing worth living for. He looks on the world only as a vast manufactory of Items; on men as the drudges who by painful labors produce Items for him; on the newspaper as the noble repository of the Items he collects. He regards events only from a historical point of view. A murder is an Item. A fire is an Item. A war is a vast and delicious collection of Items. Where the accident is there are the reporters; and when his train is smashed up, or his steamboat bursts her boiler, he emerges from the chaotic ruins pencil in hand, and hails the first passing wagon to bear an Item to “the office.”

It is not strange that a young man, fresh from a country college, with the constitution of a horse, the stomach of a jackass (quite capable of digesting the toughest thistles provided by dubious eating-houses), and a healthy love of adventure and variety, becomes an enthusiastic and therefore an expert reporter.

But there is a certain danger in this enthusiasm. A mere collector of facts is a melancholy object. For a fact is not only a stubborn thing; it is a stupid, dead, inanimate, worthless piece of carrion, which lies there, supine, till some one comes and breathes a soul of meaning into it. Thus I might call a reporter a resurrectionist, prowling about for such corpse-like facts; and the danger is, that this enthusiastic body-snatcher shall by-and-by become a mere ghoul, subsisting contentedly on the dead carrion he resurrects. God does not permit men (nor nations) to stand still; and this man whom I have called detective, flibustier, resurrectionist, must either become an intelligent being, appreciating the value and significance of his facts, and thus prepared to infuse into them the breath of life and reason, or else he becomes a mere vampire, fattening on the gross carrion which he daily disentombs from the grave of events.

If we were all sensible men, with abundant leisure, we might perhaps dispense with the editor, and ourselves digest the crude food of news which makes up the staple of a daily paper. But life is short and dollars are scarce; and as we necessarily take our facts at second-hand from the reporter, so we are obliged, in most cases, to take their interpretation at second-hand also. For you and I, dear reader—I, who am puzzling my brains all day over my shears and my accounts, and you who perhaps have no brains to puzzle—have not time (not to speak of ability) to work out the problem which the news columns present to us every morning.

Here comes in the editor—the interpreter.

The reporter may be a Gradgrind, but the editor must be a prophet. The reporter need only be an intelligent machine; the editor must be an intelligent man. In fact, he ought to be the most able and the most honest man in the community. Perhaps he is.

Who reads the tedious columns of twaddle headed “Proceedings in Congress?” Surely no sensible man voluntarily stupefies himself with such stuff, which is not ordinarily fit even to put a man pleasantly to sleep. I know it is a great and glorious piece of enterprise to give three columns of it every morning; but I gladly pay two cents for the Daily Golden Egg because I know that my friend Goose will in three lines give me a full and correct summary of the three columns, while in a quarter of an hour I can know, from his editorial report, what is the sum and sense of all that has happened in the world for the last twenty-four hours—and am thus able to go to my daily duties in the shop, not only stuffed with news, but bristling with opinions.

This is the use of an editor; and as Stoffle is now to be advanced to this important post of manufacturer of opinions—of judge, in fact, of “what is best”—we come to the fourth division of this biography.

IV.—IN WHICH “SIMON SAYS WIGGLE-WAGGLE.”

Before a man can manufacture opinions he must have a few of his own; just as when my wife wants her hens to lay, she carefully supplies a few nest eggs of finest white chalk. Now whatever our young men get at college, they seldom get opinions. It might be thought that institutions for the training of youth would naturally communicate something of this kind; but opinions, unfortunately, are thought mischievous, and "eminently to be avoided;" and by the time a man gets thoroughly imbued with the great truth that twice two makes four, he is commonly turned out on the world, labeled "graduate." You get (and forget) Latin, and Greek, and mathematics; and when you are done with that you get a sheep-skin; and being thrust out into the world, find that the only really useful part of your training is some such stray accomplishment as short-hand, which you have trifled with in your uncertain hours of ease.

Stoffle was some three years an enthusiastic collector of facts before he had a passable knowledge of their value. But when this came about he found himself one day disgusted with his profession.

Most men take to letters from a desire to make a figure in the world; and though the result is, in the majority of cases, only a conspicuous 0, out of every thousand who use the pen one or two also use their brains; and of these a few become able editors. Now when Stoffle's enthusiasm began to cool off—when the Item was beheld in its natural state, and ceased to be in apotheosis—he began to fear that his figure also was to be a small one; and therefore to bestir himself with a healthy discontent. Three years pass very quickly, especially to a man who works hard and likes his work. But at twenty-five the world looks differently than at twenty-two; and at twenty-five Stoffle, who had come to town a simple-hearted country-youth, with no particular hopes, except for a speedy wedding and a plain cottage in the country, beheld himself a man with a career before him—a man with possibilities. Now a dinner of herbs, with love, is very good; but a stalled ox has its temptations also, to people who are not confirmed vegetarians. And in that middle passage in life, when young men are vibrating between love and ambition, it occurs, not unreasonably, to many a one, why not "better a stalled ox with love?" And if not both, then which?

As Stoffle, now rid of reportorial cares, and writing himself Editor, began to see more and more of those splendid possibilities which men call a career, I am sorry to say the fervor of his affection for poor Lucy Jones declined. At first it was of course impossible to marry; and by the time it became barely possible, it was also become barely possible to Stoffle to put it off. As his life grew larger, and its scope broader, the passion which had absorbed him while at college, and which, like most other young men, he had regarded not only as the noblest, but as the only noble one, began to be overshadowed by others. Love and ambition are to each other as heat and cold.

When Stoffle's fairly roused ambition had once clearly opened his eyes, he saw that the world is only a foolish world, anxious to be ruled; and that it requires no vast wisdom or goodness to rule it, but only a certain strength of will, a certain thickness of skin, a certain readiness of speech. For this foolish world, like children frightened in the dark, insists on being talked to, and is greatly more particular about the sound than the sense. It is not absolutely necessary that you see the road, to guide your fellows—if only you boldly say that you see it; and if you want to be a very great statesman or a very able editor, the most useful quality is the unscrupulous shrewdness of a special pleader. Now when Stoffle perceived all the splendid possibilities in the life of a man who has gained such an insight as this at twenty-five, I do not wonder that the stalled ox quite concealed from his view that dinner of herbs which is the ideal of undergraduate philosophers.

Meantime Lucy, who had unluckily no career open to her, sat at home, like a good, affectionate creature, glorying in the success of her lover, and prizing him the more highly as she became aware that he was like to prove himself a man among men. She, too, was content to wait—almost as content as Stoffle; for she, too, had her ambition—what right-minded woman has not? Only a woman's ambition contains in solution so very little of the acid of selfishness that it does not corrode her love.

The difference between reporter and editor is quite as great as that between a pickpocket and a highwayman, or between a resurrectionist and a professor of anatomy. The reporter is a Bohemian, a loungeur, a rough stick—tolerated but not recognized by society; admitted officially to write the bulletins of fashion, but ignored personally, or at best consigned to the doubtful company of the awkward squad. But the editor is a man of social and political standing. Lord Palmerston says he is glad to invite him to his house—not as editor, but as gentleman—the dear, blarneying old joker! and the Fifth Avenue, and every other avenue (if there are any others), is open to him, with us. With such a new life necessarily come in new wants, new hopes, new desires, new aims. A caterpillar feeds contentedly on its cabbage-leaf, happy if it has secured the sunny side of its limited world. But a butterfly! Think of a Prometheus glued to a cabbage-leaf!

It is not wonderful, then, that in this new sphere to which Stoffle was now translated he should desire to shape his life according to the new lights in which he walked; and that, among other changes, the thought of poor country-bred Lucy became presently somewhat distasteful to this enlightened young fellow. Why should a man marry? Was it necessary? Was it best? Especially a young man with a career opening to him? Not only this, but how would the world, his new world, look upon this country-girl? How fatally ill-matched would this rising young man of society be with a girl who probably could not cross a floor! This already-admired wit, with a wife who had no more conception of a sarcasm than a post! What would his friends say? Should he throw his best chances away? Single-handed, he felt it in him to conquer this, his new world. Should he clog his arms and disable himself for a contest in which his whole soul was enlisted?

Oh weary questions, which men ask themselves when they have already decided! Oh foolish words, with which men seek to hide what they dare not face!

And yet, plead as you may, face it you must. And after all it is a question not so easy to decide—this one. What shall a man do, finding himself so placed, bound with such bonds, and hoping such hopes? Men grow; hopes, fears, and loves do change. As we advance the horizon widens, and that which but yesterday we thought the utmost boundary and very gate of heaven, seems now but a poor fleeting cloud; and beyond another heaven opens to our longing eyes.

And the cloud?

If you are a determined man, like Stoffle, you sail through it, looking neither to right nor left, but only straight forward. It was wisely written that once in every man's life he is taken into a high mountain, and there tempted. It was not altogether inexcusable in Stoffle, perhaps, if on this occasion he mistook his conscience to be the Devil, and looking the awful shape resolutely in the face, wrote to Miss Jones that "he could not reconcile it to his sense of right to marry without love; and therefore felt it a duty, no less to her than to himself, to own that his feelings toward her had for some time undergone a serious change. While the esteem he had for her character and her virtues was in nowise diminished, he was constrained to confess that his affections were no longer enlisted. He found himself so entirely swallowed up in his business life, and so constrained by its necessities, that involuntarily he had ceased to look forward to marriage with that happy anticipation and content which, in his opinion, every one should bring to this, the most important step in life. In fact, it seemed to him that men of his profession should, if possible, avoid marriage. In such a case he felt it would be doing Miss Jones the saddest wrong to ask her to become his wife; and though he felt bound to her by his plighted word, and held himself in readiness to fulfill that word, yet a desire for her happiness, much more than his own, convinced him of the propriety of dissolving those promises to the fulfillment of which he had once looked forward with such true pleasure. If Miss Jones should agree with his views he begged that she would signify it by returning him his letters; and he remained ever her most obedient servant."

And receiving his letters by return of mail, with only "Good-by" written on the little slip of white paper which wrapped them, Stoffle, feeling less elated than he had anticipated, shook himself, and was free.

Of course the angry reader will say he was a rascal. I do not intend to argue the point—though I have heard a good deal said on both sides. It is one of those disputed questions in which it is not easy to decide what is best, and which therefore no Family Magazine ought to discuss.

Nevertheless, have patience, O angry reader! Do not judge too harshly. It is not given to every man to believe in God.

And then, consider: is it exactly fair for the young ladies of a college-town to take snap-judgment on the susceptible hearts of the collegians? what right have they to let themselves be courted and won by men who only think love the best thing because they have as yet no knowledge of any thing but love and Latin, between which 'tis easy enough to choose; who are ambitious to win love, because they know of nothing else they can win? How evidently unfair to take advantage of these inexperienced youth!

And again: The desire of reward is one of the noblest and most useful of human instincts. "What shall we do to be saved?" is the question of most import in the world; and even here the thought of reward vastly overshadows and almost annihilates any consideration of pleasure in the service. The laborer is worthy of his hire; and when a man, be he editor or stone-breaker, does a fair day's work, it is because he wants a fair day's wages. To be sure, the old Divines insisted that we should "cultivate a willingness to be damned." But the world has changed since then; and even the good Samaritan nowadays has a price for his oil, and slips his business card into the vest-pocket of the wounded traveler. Callow youth prates loudly of "disinterestedness" in public men; but I dare say his Excellency the President could tell another story—and, indeed, when you look into the Decalogue, surely the most charming commandments are those "with promise." If you say this is wrong, you make a serious blunder, for even God holds out every where a hope of reward, as where it is written "Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land." To be sure He did not add, be an able editor or ardent politician that thy fame may fill the land, and thy pockets empty the treasury. But yet, the greater the wages the better the service; and when you call a man rascal, because he hesitates to give up the only wages he values, and tie down his life to a narrow round of virtuous but prosaic duties, it only shows that you have not yourself had the option. It is only smart fishermen who are tempted to fish on Sundays. Your blockhead, who catches no fish at any time, does not grudge the tedious day which sees his craft anchored in Sabbath rest.

The question which presented itself to Stoffle in this crisis of his life, was whether, for a mere point of honor, he should spoil his career. Floating on that "tide, which taken at the flood leads on to fortune," whether he should run into an obscure wayside bay and permanently beach his vessel. Peering into that future, which has such a glorious brightness at twenty-five, Stoffle saw—or thought he saw—himself standing at the junction of two roads—one leading to marriage, obscurity, and a life-long struggle for bread and butter; the other leading to fame, power, position, and wealth. On one side was only a weary, never-ceasing strife between duty and inclination, in which duty must ever have the upper hand; on the other, the best opportunity for the fullest development of his noblest intellectual powers, and an adequate reward for labors which were a delight in themselves. What is best in such a case as this every man must settle for himself. Being the man he was, Stoffle decided that a scruple should not stand between him and his brightest future. Let him that is without sin cast the first stone.

It is not given to every man to believe in God. It is not in vain that so many commandments are with promise; and perhaps he is wisest who takes God at his word. There is a divinely instituted "division of labor" which far-sighted people are apt to overlook. "Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but God giveth the increase."

Now Stoffle intended to fulfill all these offices himself.

A man's career is like a ship under full sail: the wind drives her unceasingly, and it remains only for the helmsman to elect his course and trim his sails. When once Stoffle saw himself clear of that lee-shore on which he had feared to strand his dearest hopes, and with fair winds sailing on the broad sea of editorial life, he did not fail to carry on sail. He was willing to "pay labor" for power, as Dr. Johnson says of Sir Thomas Browne. Day and night he toiled to fit himself more and more for that position of able editor which seemed to him—as it seemed to the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre—the very highest to which a man might in these days aspire. An editor should be the most intelligent man in the community—and he would be that. And the most honest? Well—yes—but what is honesty? You say what you believe. But suppose you do not believe in any thing? The able editor should be the chiefest statesman of the State. But even statesmen are mortal. And when the question has once occurred to a mortal man, whether it is best to do right, something depends on the answer he gives it. One thing is certain—this question must be categorically answered. Simon may say wiggle waggle, but Fate says, in her sternest tones, "Yes or no, and stick to it." Now, when this able editor had said "No" to poor Lucy, whom he regarded just then as the inscrutable Fate, there was no return. He had burned his ships, and henceforth his course was onward.

It is a question which embarrasses men more the higher they stand, this one whether it is best to do right. There seems to me very little doubt that honesty is the best policy for my porter and clerks. But for me? Think of a tailor without cabbage! And a fashionable tailor too—that unfortunate who has to lose many a heavy bill to gain the countenance of the fine world; and who must somehow make it up, you know—for even a tailor must live (and if he is given to scribbling, as I am, so much the worse the chance).

Stoffle was no fool; but a man of large intellect, of broad views, and growing culture. What knowledge bore on his part in life he diligently acquired. History, politics, finance, geography, commerce, were things so faithfully studied that no event could turn up but he had a precedent at his pen's point; no strange complication but he found its solution in a stranger of other days. But what avails all history, all knowledge, if it yet remains an open question, "What is best?" The life of an able editor is surely the greatest that is lived in these days. Queens, Emperors, and Presidents affect the destinies of nations; but this editor has his voice in every struggle that goes on in the world, and sets his pen to every question that agitates our planet. And must he, too, ask "What is best?" And vainly ask? That question which his traditional million of readers put to him every morning over their coffee, how has he struggled with it by gas-light in his dingy editorial box ten hours ago?

Of course the right is best, the simple-hearted Doctor Wiseacre would say. But the one lesson which Stoffle's life had hitherto taught him, was that in certain cases the right is not best.

And what then? Why, then comes in statesmanship. Given, that there is no God—given, that this "right" is an orphan going about the world tolerably helpless, and then you have a logical necessity for Statesmen, Diplomats, Napoleons, and Editors.

And every body knows that the right is not always best.

Whereby men have gained to themselves immortal fame as skillful tinkers, and being lucky, have died on some such lonely shelf as St. Helena, muttering querulous complaints about Grouchy, who did not come up in time.

As though Grouchy ever came up in time.

It is a secret which shrewd men soon learn in our metropolis, that the difference between prosperity and poverty is just the difference between employing and being employed. There came a day when Stoffle, being now an able editor, might exchange his liberal but stated salary, and become proprietor as well as editor. But to do this money was necessary; and for the present he had much fame, but little money. In this crisis of his affairs, when, for a second time, there appeared a serious obstacle in the way to his advancement on that career he had chosen for himself, there came to his aid one of the best and most ingenious inventions of a commercial age. Some enthusiastic writers have labored to prove that women rule in every society; but I aver on the contrary that they have been the sport of every stage of human progress, from barbarism to civilization. In Africa you buy your wife; in Middle-aged Europe you had to fight for her—whereby the number of bachelors was greatly increased; and now Stoffle bartered his reputation and social position for a certain fortune, and was lucky enough to get into the bargain a very pretty wife, whom, if the exigencies of his career had permitted it, he might in a short time have grown to love sincerely and perhaps devotedly.

And now, Stoffle being fortunately married, which every one must acknowledge to be the best thing he could do under the circumstances, we come to another part of this history.

V.—IN WHICH "SIMON SAYS DOWN."

When a man has written about Europe and its affairs for some years, it is surely best that he should see with his own eyes some of the people and countries he has so long exercised his pen about. It might be best even, to see Europe before you begin to write about it; but the best thing is not always practicable, as every body knows; and one thing is certain—that if Stoffle had foolishly kept his faith with Lucy he might have deluded a credulous public with opinions about European affairs for half a century, and even then not seen with his eyes the nations he had judged. Thus it appears that Lucy was in reality sacrificed for the public benefit, which, if duly explained to her, would doubtless have greatly assuaged her grief. But Lucy was a sensible girl, who did not need this satisfaction to dry up her tears. I am afraid the angry reader will be angrier still when I tell him that while Stoffle MacGurdigan, Esquire, was traveling over Europe, getting new and improved views of "what is best," Lucy was being courted by a worthy professor of the college whence her former lover had set out on his career; and when Stoffle and his bride were on their homeward passage Lucy became the happy and honored wife of Professor White. It is a disagreeable thing to state, and calculated to destroy all one's preconceived and beautiful ideas of female fidelity and the power of true love, and all that—this marriage of Lucy's; but it is a fact which could not well be concealed by a faithful historian, and after all, I have known a number of other young ladies do just as Lucy did, and with—I must own—the happiest consequences. Men, of course, never do so; and if Mrs. Betsey had jilted me—a very unlikely thing, as I was thought a very good match even before I knew her—I am sure I should have been a happy bachelor to this day. But that is neither here nor there.

Stoffle came home from Europe—as most of us do—with a batch of new and improved ideas of "what is best." It is a curious fact that the only Americans who are troubled with serious doubts about the success of our great and glorious experiment of a government, are those who have "run through" Europe. These experienced men of the world, who set out on their travels with a large spread-eagle next to their hearts, almost invariably return with a poor opinion of Democratic Institutions, and tell you, confidentially, with a French shrug, and a countenance of dolorous certainty, that "it's of no use, you know; Republics may last for a generation or two—but your only steady wear is a good monarchy." And if you could see a little farther into this Jeremiah's thought, you would find behind the "good monarchy" a comfortable aristoocracy, to divide among them the large slices of fat which prosperous monarchies so abound in. You must not blame these drivellers and doubters too much. A run through Europe is not calculated to sharpen the intelligence of every man; and really, to men who live in a chronic hurry, the speedy ways of an Imperial Dictator can not fail to recommend themselves; while it is difficult to imagine a more disheartening spectacle to an ambitious man of intellect, who feels that his knowledge ought to be both power and wealth, than the shabby Swiss confederacy, surrounded as it is by such splendid kingdoms and empires. Stoffle had an uneasy feeling that such laborers as he were worthy of a greater hire than is provided for with us; and I admit freely that to a laborer who looks only to his hire our greatest prizes even must seem not only very little, but very hard to get at—which is precisely what the fox, had he been honest, would have said of the grapes.

Stoffle came back from Europe, convinced that there are many animals in the world more splendid to look upon, more useful, and perhaps longer lived, than that spread-eagle of which he had in his grass-days been a rather blind worshiper. Till you have seen a king or an emperor, it is not unnatural to think highly of the President. But when you have once been permitted to look at the ways, and thoughts, and means of European statesmen, our own politics look so petty, our best men seem so ridiculously—what shall I say, virtuous?—that a man who has the soul of a statesman and whose mind can comprehend and delight in the task of keeping the world balanced, can not help a little regret that he was born to no greater work than voting for (or being voted) Member of Congress—and being opposed perhaps by a hotel keeper, or a corner grocery man. Did you ever hear one of these returned Americans utter the word canaille? It is true, they do not often pronounce it any thing else than canael—but the air with which they mispronounce it is absolutely perfect. It shows that the heart is all right, though the tongue may halt.

Stoffle—who had as contemptuous an opinion of the American eagle as an enlightened traveler need have—was not, however, the man to quarrel with that beloved and somewhat vindictive bird. Like a wise man he made the best of his fate. He was now in the prime and strength of his powers. Long practice had given him a splendid facility in writing, by which his stores of facts were brought to bear upon the various questions of the day with an ability which was undeniable. He had wit; he had logic; he had knowledge; he had experience; he had tact. He was untiring, energetic, pertinacious, and ready. And he had one vast advantage over other men—his readers—that he did not believe in any thing but his career. Thus it is not matter for surprise that he was successful. When an able man sets all his powers to one object, he is not likely to be foiled—much less if that object is his own advancement.

Thus Stoffle was at last the ideal of able editors; and now honors crowded upon him, and riches; he was not only a public writer but also a public speaker; and at last the final tribute which Yankee curiosity pays to Yankee notoriety or fame, was rendered also to him: he was invited to lecture. Among other invitations came one from the students of his college, who, remembering that this eminent man had once studied within their walls, asked him to speak to them also the words of wisdom with which he was surcharged.

Great as Stoffle had come to be, you are to understand that he had yet a heart in his bosom; and the perusal of this note of invitation, "written by permission of the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre," and signed by the Faculty as well as the committee of students, drew his thoughts back to the dear simple old school-days which he had not very often remembered in these busy later years. For a little while he lived the old life over again, with all its hopes, and fears, and loves; which, looking back upon them now, from his proud eminence, seemed to him so curiously trivial. "Poor Lucy!" he sighed, as her soft voice resounded dimly over that dead past; and then remembered with a smile which was nearly a laugh, that amusing lecture on the Daily Press, which the old Doctor had delivered to Lucy and himself one evening—so many centuries ago.

"What a singular fossil a College President gets to be!" he smiled to himself, knocking the white ash from the end of a mild Cabaña. "He was right in his advice to me—by good luck—but how odd! How it would astonish the old cock to show him the reality of which he sees only the beautiful but impossible shadow! But he wouldn't believe me."

He prepared himself carefully for his appearance before the College audience. They had no votes for him, to be sure; but he felt more solicitous to gain honor here than almost aught elsewhere—here, where something told him he deserved it less. The lecture had for its subject the glories of free government; and in it he took occasion to speak gratefully of their venerable and honored President, to whose sound instruction and sage advice he owed it, he was pleased to say, that he, starting in life as a poor friendless youth, without any advantages which might not be obtained by any poor man's son, now stood before them what he was. Nothing touches an American audience so sensibly as this now tolerably stale twaddle about self-made men. They do not see that, in this country, to be born poor is to enter the race unencumbered, and that in truth it is far more difficult for a rich man's son to acquire useful knowledge, energy, and tact, than to crawl through the eye of a needle. Let us hope that some day this humbug of struggling poverty and work ending triumphantly in a brown-stone front on the Fifth Avenue will also be exploded; and that we will cease to count our victories by the dollar's worth.

Lucy was among the audience you may be sure. She could not but remember, and with a slight pang from a wound long ago healed over, that this was an occasion to which she had once looked as one of especial pride to herself. And now—

The lecture being done, and properly applauded, the lecturer approached Mrs. Professor White, and congratulating her on her good looks, begged to be introduced to her husband.

Lucy was rather glad when Doctor Wiseacre bore her old-time lover off to his house. It was no small treat for the worthy President, living all his life in retirement, to meet a man fresh from the outer world, and living, so to speak, in the face of affairs. To rub himself against such a brilliant man of the world, was a cheering thing for the dear old foggy, who, though he thought Stoffle as a public man by no means in the right, and sometimes shuddered at what seemed to him very unscrupulous conduct, could not deny him splendid talents—nor himself the credit of having drawn them out.

Sitting cozily by the blazing fire, they rambled back to old times, and at last the President said: "Well, Stoffle, I scarce thought my prophecy about your career would have had so great a fulfilling. I suppose you would not exchange your present honors for the poet's wreath you once longed for?"

"No, indeed," replied Stoffle, emphatically; "that was one of the silly vagaries of my youth, of which I was soon cured when once I came in contact with practical life. Our time has not come yet for poetry, and I hope it never will. There never was a practical poet."

"Perhaps not; and, after all, the greatest poets could not do more than you gentlemen of the press are doing. I don't agree with your views altogether, you know—"

"Why, no; but I think that is because you mistake the whole scope of journalism," interrupted Stoffle, determined now to give this old foggy a shot. "You are not practical. I remember, as though it were yesterday, that fine speech of yours about the daily paper. But I assure you you are very much mistaken. It is an error to suppose that a daily journal has a mission any more than any other commercial enterprise. One man sells cotton, and another man sells papers, and it is the business of each to be successful—that is to say, to gain the best profit he can from his investment. Each alike brings to his undertaking a certain capital, and a certain amount of business talent, experience, and shrewdness. Every merchant has his public, whom he is obliged to please, or fail. A sensible merchant, who desires to keep out of the bankruptcy court, will, of course, strive to make his public as numerous as possible. At the same time no merchant's public is so exacting and capricious as ours, because none needs to be so large; and therefore to carry on a newspaper successfully requires perhaps—though I say it—more talent and tact and energy and shrewdness than any other business in the world.

"The first business of a daily journal is to give news—all the news—more news, if possible, than any other paper gives, and of a more attractive kind. This is the prime necessity, before which every thing else pales. Of course it must happen occasionally that I am forced to publish something which, could I afford it, I would not print; and, more frequently, I am obliged to magnify rumors to-day only to contradict them to-morrow; and these things are not pleasant to an editor who desires also to be a gentleman. But what is an unfortunate man to do? There must be newspapers, because the public needs them; and if I do not publish a certain statement some one else will, and my readers go off to another paper. Our public gives us no choice. It is our master. If I do not please it I lose it; if I do not keep up my circulation my advertising fails, and then I sink money, and presently come to a wind up—just as a dry-goods man would who should fail to keep such goods as his lady customers wish. You look sober, Sir; but are we to be less wise than A. T. Stewart?

“Then you spoke of shaping public opinion. You never were more mistaken. An able daily appears to shape public opinion, but it only leads it. The man who has the loudest lungs in a crowd can lead it if he will. But he can not lead it away from its purpose. He can only place himself skillfully at its head, and, knowing its aims, submit to be pushed on in advance. Now a party in the State is only a larger mob. There are always at least two parties; and it is the able editor's first business to ascertain which of the two is the most likely to win, and to lead that. For the biggest crowd is the majority, and the majority rules, and it the able daily is therefore bound to lead. How about principle, do you say? Don't you see that there is no principle involved in party warfare? Certain men want power—are ambitious to rule the nation. They set the people by the ears about an abstraction—persuade the nation that all depends upon the success of this or that man; and thus play the game of politics. Show me one man of them that has any real principle of action other than that very important one of you tickle me and I'll tickle you. There is no right or principle involved, and if there was it wouldn't matter; for, after all our squabbles, God overrules it all for the best.

“It is an editor's business to know what his public likes, and to give them that. It is a shrewd editor's business to foresee in what direction public opinion is next to turn, and to be the first to sound the advance in this new direction. And it is his first duty, when he has by unwise haste taken a wrong step, to take it back. Ignorant people cry down the London Times because, having yesterday blown hot, to-day it blows cold on the same subject. But therein lies the secret of its immense success. Yesterday it made a mistake. Before night that mistake was seen. This morning it comes out with an able article which appears, but only appears, to shape the public opinion. In fact, it only gives it voice; and this, so far as the editorial department is concerned, is the true course of the daily—to furnish words for the ideas which rest dormant and inarticulate in the minds of its public.

“Conscience, do you say? But, my dear Sir, conscience has nothing to do with it. Don't you see that plainly enough? Of course we all want to do what is right. But a newspaper is not a moral agent. It is a commercial speculation, whose only duty is success. A dry-goods man would be thought insane who should insist on selling goods which only a few of the community want. And just in the same way a newspaper aims to get as large a public as possible. If that public is vacillating, if its moral sense is low, if it cares little for principle, and much for interest—that is a misfortune, to be sure; but the newspaper is not responsible for it. It has only to follow. It is useless to set yourself to impracticable things. In this world twice two makes four, and that is a principle we can't change. I do not say that an editor is not to have opinions of his own. God forbid! He can not help having them; and the abler he is the more unpractical and impracticable his private opinions are likely to be. Now it is his first duty to be practical. And if an editor is not successful, what is the use of him? can you tell me that, Sir? He had much better saw wood.

“You think the public sensible, and in the main right. The public is an ass, and can kick. You, simple-hearted and right-minded country gentleman, think I do not know what the public wants. But is not my paper successful? and is not that the only criterion? You object to scandal; but I—who do not like it either—know that the paper which gives the most will sell best. You think an editor should be governed by high moral principle. He ought not to be such an ass as to let any body else use him—that I grant you. But the public does not care for principle. It is a pig—and likes to have its ribs tickled. Let the news be exciting, and it cares not if it be also true. Let the article be slashing, and it matters little whom it slashes. Let the story be strong enough, and you will see that every man has read it, by the fierceness with which every man abuses the paper that gives it.”

There was a long silence when Stoffle was done. Each sat gazing into the fire, and busy with his own thoughts. The old president looked grieved and a good deal surprised at the doctrine which his scholar had just laid down to him. Stoffle was so plausible that even a president and doctor of divinity may be excused for asking himself if this was indeed the truth of the matter.

At last the Reverend Doctor Wiseacre looked up into Stoffle's flushed face, and said, “I am sorry I advised you to go to New York.”

“And I,” said the editor, bowing gracefully, “shall never cease to be grateful for your sound counsel.”

“Some day you will think differently. Aaron was not the last high-priest who set up a golden calf for his people to worship, crying, 'These be your gods, O Israel!' But Aaron repented—and so I trust will you. 'Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is in vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep.'"

"That is all very true," replied Stoffle; "but don't you see you are not practical, my dear Sir; you are not practical."

Saying which he rose to retire; and here I propose to leave him. The historian should be judge and not advocate. It is his to state the case fairly and trust the verdict to the jury of readers, each of whom must at last settle this question for himself, of "What is best?"

A CLERGYMAN'S ADVENTURE.

I HAD not been long settled over my first charge, when one Tuesday afternoon a stranger was ushered into my study. He entered with a low bow, shook me long and cordially by the hand, placed his bran-new hat upon the sofa, took his seat beside it, and proceeded to explain the object of his visit. He was a very tall man—so tall that I at once set him down as a Pole. His face was so slashed and scarred, that I was at once reminded of Smolensko and Borodino. He wore a suit of fresh black cloth, with a shiny satin vest, with an alarming display of breast-pins, chains, and rings. His dress was altogether out of keeping with his face, hands, and figure, all of which told of hard daily toil.

To this day I am ignorant of the nation to which my visitor belonged. But of one thing I am sure: it was to a nation whose language is peculiarly complicated. He talked with the utmost volubility; but I could not understand a word. I only wondered how it was possible that any meaning at all could be conveyed by a torrent of sounds that seemed to me as senseless as the noise of a stream of gravel pouring down a cliff. I would no more try to master that language than I would attempt to learn the language of birds or insects. I was unwilling to hurt his feelings, and for a while suffered him to talk on, without intimating that I did understand him in the least.

At last it occurred to me that there might be something important for me to know in what he was saying; and so at, or rather before the first pause, I told him politely that I could not understand. He only seemed to take it as confirmation of the fact that I did understand, and went on all the more confidently.

"There may be some person sick," I said to myself, and shook my head in token of not understanding. To my dismay he only seemed to take it as a negation to some request he was making. Looking at me a moment with surprise, not to say virtuous indignation, he resumed his line of remark, increased, as I could now fancy, into argument. I became really uneasy.

"He may be a father wishing me to bury his dead child," I said to myself. "Perhaps a husband who has hurried from the side of a dying wife!"

I rose on the instant, assured him with deepest emphasis that I had not the faintest idea of his meaning, and closed by shaking my head in violent negative. He gazed upon me in painful astonishment. I read his thoughts in his eyes.

"And can it be possible," he thought, as he stood before me, "that here, in this Christian land, there can be a man calling himself a Christian minister who deliberately refuses such a request as this I have now made!"

I fairly perspired. How could I understand him or get him to understand me! Here were we two in arm's-length of each other, and yet leagues apart. And so we stood looking at each other over the gulf that yawned impassable between. Suddenly an idea smote me.

"It is impossible," I reasoned with myself, "that he can be upon an errand which evidently interests him so, and a woman not be in some way involved therein. Men never are very deeply interested in any thing, unless it involves a woman in some way." Now "Frau" I regarded as a Slavonic, a sort of root-word of all languages, to signify woman.

"Frau?" I tried, interrogatively.

He clutched this rope's end I had thrown him convulsively, and resumed his torrent of explanation. I only waited calmly until the gust had blown itself out.

"Frau!" I said, as a point of departure, and then placed my hand in a feeble manner upon head and side, and with a suffering countenance and groans of deep distress endeavored to convey to him my idea of the precarious state of his wife's health. At the same time I took up my hat and cane, and made motions toward the door as if to accompany him.

That he perfectly understood me I saw plainly; but instead of starting to go with me to his afflicted wife he shook his head in violent refusal, took up his own hat to put it down carefully, and then took a seat on the sofa again, crossed his leg over his knee, keeping his eye in mine all the time, to let me gather the direct reverse.

I saw it all at once! Poor man, his wife had been sick, but it was too late for me to accompany him to his home now. It was desolated, she was dead; he was alone in the world. He wished me to attend, at the proper hour, her funeral. How stupid in me not to see it all before! how greatly I must have lacerated his bleeding bosom! Yes, I understood now. And I hastened to let him know it. Still standing before him I began again—certain this time.

"Frau?" I asked. He eagerly assented.

Immediately I assumed a mournful aspect as befits one beside the dead. With pantomimic motions of my hands I described—while he watched me with quick and even painful attention—his beloved wife lying before me shrouded for the grave. I went so far as to place her in the coffin, to gaze upon her face with a last look, to screw down the lid, to accompany her cold remains, with slow and dejected gait, to the grave. To avoid any possibility of mistake this time, I even lowered the coffined body of her he loved most on earth into its grave, held Burial Service over her with book in hand, filled up the grave, heaped up the earth thereupon, and turned sadly away. I even had some thought of erecting a monument before I had done, when I was arrested in my pantomime by my friend, the afflicted husband. He understood me perfectly. In fact, it would have been impossible for him not to have understood my meaning unless he had been stone-blind. I saw, soon after the funeral of his beloved wife began, that some emotion was kindled in his soul. "Very natural," I thought, "under the circumstances of his melancholy case; only, let me go on so that there can be no longer any possible lack of understanding between us."

When I had completed my delineation he slowly rose from the sofa and stood up before me, very tall, immensely broad-chested, exceedingly angry! In the pallor of his countenance the scars thereupon were very distinct. Yes, his eyes told me, without any need of words, that he was exasperated to the last degree. I thought of Smolensko and Borodino, and trembled in my boots. But I was unconscious of any intention of offending, and looked at him fearlessly and innocently as a child. For a moment he stood looking at me with steady, fiery eye, working at his bristling mustache with a nervous hand, as if on the point of striking me. I never faced a man so terribly angry as he was in my life; it was like having the hot breath of a lion on one's very cheek! When I came to understand matters afterward, my only wonder was that he had not actually struck me. My being a minister, probably, went far to shield me.

When the certainty that I could mean nothing offensive to him slowly broke upon him, the muscles of his set lips relaxed, his eye softened, he sank back upon the sofa, first with a smile, then began laughing, then fairly rolled and rocked with purple laughter until the sofa creaked under him. Now his booted feet would fly up into the air as he fell back almost fainting with laughter, and then they would come down again with a stamp on the floor as he rose to the surface again almost suffocated. Then he would stamp yet again on the floor, and shake himself, and draw his face together and attempt an explanation, but again the ludicrous idea would come upon him, and over he would roll again in agonies of laughter.

It was now my turn to be offended. After gazing upon him for a while I quietly turned away, sat down at my desk, drew my paper and ink toward me, and composed myself to write. This served to sober his amusement somewhat. At last he arose, and in a very respectful manner began an elaborate apology in his unknown tongue, but suddenly checked himself.

"Frau?" he asked.

I nodded my head, and waited his success at pantomime. But at the word the ludicrous idea, whatever it was, came upon him afresh, and over he went again on the sofa in convulsions of mirth, which were probably only aggravated by my dignified solemnity. With what vivid freshness the whole scene comes to my mind as I now write! It is as if it had occurred only an hour ago. Things make a deeper impression occurring early in life, I suppose.

My friend obtained enough mastery of himself at last to get up from the sofa and stand somewhat composed beside me. The afternoon sun was shining full into my study through a western window. He pointed to it, and looked at me interrogatively. I nodded in assent. He then slowly traced with his extended finger its downward course. When he had got it below the horizon, he again asked me with his eyes if I understood? Certainly. He wished me to go somewhere, or do something, when the sun was down. Yes, I understood that! He then, with my pen—which he most politely borrowed—wrote an address on the back of my next Sabbath's sermon. Calling my earnest attention to it, he found I understood from my repeated nods, took up his hat, began another apology in his unknown tongue, but checked himself, shook me cordially by the hand, and left. I heard a kind of strangled cough from him as he descended my steps, and looking out of the window I saw him walking away, bowed with laughter as he went.

Young ministers are specially jealous of their dignity. I felt that mine had been seriously compromised. At one time I had determined not to notice the matter any more, tear up the address, and forget all about it. But no. I had given a kind of dumb promise. Besides, I was really curious to know what my cabalistic visitor wanted with me.

There was no one at home but myself. So, after a solitary cup of tea that night, I sallied out to keep my appointment. It was a clear, moonlight night. I remember it well, for when I had arrived on the street indicated in the address, I stopped and read that address again by the moonlight with ease. Yes, there I was, obedient to the direction, as far as I could make it out. What next? I walked up the street on one side, and down on the other, in vain. I had almost determined to abandon the whole matter in disgust, and return home. At this instant I observed a group of persons enjoying the beautiful night upon their front piazza near by. Crossing over, it occurred to me, as I went, that this might be the very house I was in search of, and these individuals were now watching for my arrival. And so, arrived at the gate and attracting the attention of the party, I said,

"I believe I am expected here—am I not?"

I remember as distinctly as if it occurred this morning the profound silence in which my question was received. There were several young ladies on the piazza, and therefore the silence soon broke into a general titter by way of reply. Being young, I was greatly embarrassed. If I only knew any clew by which to indicate the person or the house of which I was in search, I could have asked and received assistance.

"Pardon me, I have got lost," I explained. "Do you know of any one in this neighborhood who is very ill, or who is to be buried?"—although that was preposterous at such an hour.

No, they knew of none such. I remember there was a young lady with particularly merry black eyes, in a pert little apron trimmed with red, who acted as spokeswoman for the party. They all caught the spirit of my situation—seemed deeply interested.

"Do you know, then," I asked as a desperate chance, "of any one to be married here or any where in this neighborhood to-night?"

My question was received with shouts of laughter—they were just in that temper. As to the black-eyed miss in the coquettish apron, she assured me, with tears of fun in her eyes, that she was sure no one was to be married in their house that night; she "only wished there was!" I thought it was due them—I certainly had nothing else to do, for I did not know where to go—so I leaned upon the gate and recounted in brief the visit I had received, the quandary I was now in. It is always the best plan to be perfectly straightforward and frank in all of one's dealings. It is by far the most direct as well as surest and smoothest road through any difficulty however brambly. I found it so in this case. And I will only say that, from this singular beginning, an acquaintance sprang up between myself and this family on their piazza which by no means ceased that night. Becoming acquainted with me in this odd manner, the entire family came to my church on the ensuing Sabbath for the first time in their lives. And so matters went on until they became first habitual attendants, and finally substantial and working members. By the blessing of God, human nature has a thousand various handles if we are only gentle enough and expert enough to grasp them.

I had hardly finished my narration to the party on the piazza, when I observed a tall gentleman hurrying up the street on the other side. The same person had hurried down it a few moments before, and it occurred to me it might be my friend in search of me. With a hurried adieu I hastened across and found it even so. He seemed greatly pleased to see me. Greatly relieved in mind myself, I willingly accompanied him. Conversation we did not attempt; we knew it to be but a mockery.

A few hundred yards and we reached a neat residence. I have learned since how to detect the residence of a foreigner to a certainty by what I saw in this and other like cases. It would seem that foreigners of the poorer class have, in their own country, no homes of their own. They reside rather in rented buildings—mere tenants. As soon as arrived in this country, such a foreigner becomes possessed of a home of his own, and for the first time in his life. It is to him his own!—a kind of pet, a large toy, a joy and a pride. He is apt to put on altogether too much piazza, and balcony, and cornice, and balustrade. He is too prone to clap a gilt weather-cock, perhaps a small cupola, on top of it. He paints it in hues too many and too warm. He fills his yard energetically with enormous pigeon-houses and hen-coops. There is so much winding gravel walk no grass is left. The garden is taken up with arbors and summer-houses, dials and vases. It is all innocent, laudable—yet one can not help smiling as one rides by. It is like playing baby-house.

But my business lay inside my friend's residence. It was filled with guests—every man, woman, and child evidently a foreigner. After a little silence at my entrance all resumed their conversation, and not a syllable could I catch. I even attempted an easy conversation with a prim lady of about fifty, dressed in a black silk, with a wreath of artificial flowers in her hair, by whose side I was placed; but it was in vain; she only seemed terrified that the attention of the company should be drawn to her, and shook her head in token of being unable to understand; and nothing was left but to look around and wait. There was an excess of paintings upon the wall and ornaments upon the mantle—an overcrowding of musical instruments and furniture generally about the room.

But what was I there to do? There was the company to be sure—but for what purpose? There was a long array of drinking-glasses upon the side-board, but each held a little stack of cigars. Extending along one side of the room was a long table, but whatever was on it was carefully covered with a snowy table-cloth. My friends around me were all waiting painfully for something. The lady in the flowers by my side was in nervous suspense. I noticed her thin, long hands actually tremble as they lay in strong contrast upon the lap of her black silk. My only acquaintance present was my visitor. He sat a short distance from me, awkward and uneasy in his fine clothes, anxious for something to begin. He looked at me wistfully. I returned his gaze with the serene calmness of profound ignorance. He looked at me imploringly as the moments rolled by. I became intent in my gaze upon a battle-scene—a vast amount of cannon-smoke, bayonets, and butchery compassed in a little frame upon the wall opposite. I knew nothing on earth to do but wait—and I waited heroically.

Suddenly my host arose. Not in vain had he been at Smolensko and Borodino. A deed was to be done. No man there besides would lead the van. He would. At one stride he stood before me, drawing up the lady in the black silk and artificial wreath to his side as he did so. As they stood before me, side by side, with waiting eyes, it all flashed upon me. The instant before I was absolutely ignorant what I was wanted for—I was so young, I suppose. The next instant I was on my feet, not in the least degree surprised, taking it all as exactly what I had expected and was waiting for.

It is a matter I flatter myself upon. I dare say it is the culmination of all culture never to be surprised under any possible circumstances. It is an evil, a defect, a weakness to be surprised. It throws you off your balance—it exposes you to blunder and mortification—it gives your foe an advantage over you. No possible good ever results from being taken by surprise. What is the use, then, of being surprised? Next to escaping altogether from the emotion itself, is the power of entirely concealing that emotion when it does arise. A distinguished clergyman once told me he had as completely lost the faculty of being surprised or astonished as one loses a pocket handkerchief. At least, never let it be seen that you are painfully taken unaware.

Without more than a decent pause, allowing all the rest of the company to rise, I proceeded to marry the couple before me. I was perfectly aware that not an individual in the house understood a syllable I said. I was perfectly aware that neither of the two before me understood a syllable of what I said. I hesitated not for that. Gravely and seriously I proceeded—what else could I do?—precisely as if they did understand. True, when I asked the groom if he knew any reason why he should not then be married to that woman, he recognized it as some question, and replied, with emphasis, in the affirmative. She in her turn did the same. I had no disposition even to smile. Did I not know their real meaning? The attention they gave my every word was gratifying. It seems absurd now, but there was a ceremony to be gone through with. I went through with it. I exhorted him upon the duties of his new life; I warned him of its perils. And she had her important obligations. I detailed them to her. My remarks were impressive in tone at least. They seemed deeply impressed. And so I closed the ceremony with a benediction, which they received with bowed heads.

It was an immense relief to all of us. Cheerfulness resumed its sway. Rosy and bustling females removed the cloth from the table, and displayed it literally crowded and loaded with all delicacies. The bridegroom was an old soldier; he had faced a difficulty, he had stormed a position, he was hilarious with victory. In a few moments I was placed at the head of the table, the bride on one side, the groom on the other; half the company seated up and down the table, the other half eager and active to wait upon them. I, too, felt reassured, elate. I was master of the event. No sooner was the company settled at the table than I rapped smartly upon it with the handle of my knife, and proceeded to ask a blessing. What person there but thoroughly understood all I meant thereby?

I wondered now that I had found my ignorance of the language spoken in the house an obstacle. Every body was talking and laughing, and I enjoyed it all as much as any. I had no need to ask for any thing. Before I could ask every thing on the table in turn was handed to me. In the course of the feast there was but one skeleton there, and this was a particularly thin-bodied, long-necked bottle placed before my plate, clustered about with wine-glasses. I had a vague idea that it was my duty—an official duty—to pledge the married couple from this special wine, which I presumed to be of some rare vintage. But there were difficulties in my way. I did not know when to do it. I did not know how to do it. I had joined a dozen Temperance societies up to that date—was a high officer of three at that instant—solemnly pledged to taste nothing that could intoxicate.

In this dilemma I only followed the masterly policy I had so far—I simply waited. And the bridegroom was true to his policy. In the middle of the meal he waited for me no longer. He seized the bottle, smote off its neck like a soldier, filled his bride's glass, mine, his own. His bride and himself arose—I also. As the glasses of the twain clinked against each other across the board my glass made a third thereto. I too bowed to her, to him, wished them long life and every blessing, not the less sincerely because only with my eyes, held the foaming glass to my lips, not a drop passing in, however, and with them sat down. I had violated two-thirds of my pledge—“Touch not, taste not, handle not”—but had held the other and most important third unscathed.

One last difficulty lay in my path. I was very thirsty when I first arrived after my walk. As the feast progressed I naturally grew even thirstier. Latin, Greek, French, Spanish, Italian, Hebrew, I was acquainted with. Most gladly would I now have given up my knowledge of any fifty words of either of these languages to know, for the instant, the word for water in the tongue which all around me were so copiously wasting. At last I must have water—there is a point beyond which one can not do without it. I caught the eye of the happy groom, flying hither and thither in repelling the incessant musketry of jokes from his jovial guests. I laid my finger upon my wine-glass and shook my head with a smile. He became instantly serious, deeply interested. I repeated the sign. He rose with alacrity, hastened to the side-board, returned with a bottle of another wine, and placed it before me. What could I do but shake my head? He paused, reflectively; he rubbed his forehead with his finger—not in vain; the fact struck him! Gone but for a moment, he returned, placed a huge goblet beside my plate with one hand, while with his other he filled it to the brim with brandy from a stone jug!

I arose. It was time. A profound bow to the company, which they all arose to receive, a cordial shake of the hand with the bridegroom, and I had left them to the full enjoyment of their own language. When out in the night-air I found it to be a good deal colder than I had imagined when within the heated room. My wife has charged me a hundred times to tie my handkerchief around my throat on such occasions. It is to prevent bronchitis—a disease which no minister can legitimately have unless recently wedded to an heiress or the legatee of a fortune.

So I stopped under the half-raised windows, searched one pocket, then another, then my bosom for my handkerchief. As I did so I could hear the bridegroom narrating something within in a commanding voice. As I searched he proceeded. I heeded it not until suddenly I heard him say, in his recital, in a tone of sharp inquiry, "Frau?" I listened with an intuition. There came a peal of laughter which drowned his narration. Again I heard him exclaim, in tones of mimic inquiry, "Frau?" then a few more rapid words of narration, and the shouts of laughter and the stamping actually shook the house. If they had not made such a noise they might have heard me also. I understood the joke. But my throat was now enveloped, and I walked rapidly away. Yet squares off I could hear the prolonged laughter. He being a bridegroom, and they being guests, doubtless he enjoyed the joke when he was at my study; and they, when at his table, better than would otherwise have been the case.

But it was not all against me—the joke—at least, as I afterward learned. It was to his sixth wife I had that night married him. Had it been his thirty-sixth wife instead, I know of no statute against it, or of any excuse I could have plead, had I known it, for not performing my office in the case. No wonder, however, that he had looked with suspicious eye upon my pantomimic attendance at the bedside of his dying companion. No wonder his suspicions had risen almost to exasperated certainty when I performed before him, in dumb show, the familiar spectacle of a wife's funeral. I am glad it all passed off as smoothly as it did! Why he should have got me to perform the ceremony I never learned. Perhaps the minister of his own language was sick or absent, or had become worn out in the duty of marrying him to his previous wives. I am sure I do not know.

"I am certain I would not wish a fee under such circumstances as these!" I said, a little indignantly, to the prompt question of my wife that night. After asking me whether I had duly tied up my throat or not, it was the first thing she had inquired about. "Minister as I am, just between us, you know, my dear, the fun of the thing was fee enough."

It was while I was absent next day that a youth of a foreign tongue rang at my front door. He evidently was a peddler. The huge pasteboard box he carried was proof of that. The servant who answered the bell repelled him with scorn. He would not be repelled, and rang again, continued to ring until my wife herself laid aside her sewing and went to the door. During her earnest and repeated declarations to him that she was not in want of any of his wares, he coolly laid the box at her feet and walked off. There was nothing to do but to open it. My wife showed me the contents before I had laid aside my cane on my return home. There was a handsomely worked smoking-cap, several beautiful pipes, which, to this hour, adorn my mantle—I have no other use for them, and a quantity of cigars in gilt papers. My clerk smokes—I gave them to him—he says he never before knew such exquisite tobacco could be grown. But the gem of the box was a cake. I fear to say how large that cake was—twice the size of any I had ever before seen; richly frosted, heavily freighted with fruit. Upon the top was a circle of raised letters. They could not have been made more distinct; yet what they meant we never knew. The cake itself we understood and appreciated perfectly. Nor had we any doubt as to the source and cause of the gift. Upon the cake lay two cards, linked together with white satin ribbon. On one of these was written "Herr," on the other the word "Frau!" and strongly italicized!

If my friend proceeds in the same course as before, I do not see why he may not call upon me at any hour to marry him yet again. The next time I will understand better how to proceed.

MY WHISTLING NEIGHBOR.

WE had moved into a new house, situated about the centre in a row of ten, all run up together in hurried, mushroom fashion, and divided from each other by partitions of brick so thin that sound was only a little deadened in passing through. For the first three or four nights I was unable to sleep, except in snatches, for so many noises came to my ears, originating, apparently, in my own domicile, that anxiety in regard to burglars was constantly excited. Both on the first and second nights I made a journey through the house in the small hours, but found no intruders on my premises. The sounds that disturbed me came from some of my neighbors, who kept later vigils than suited my habits.

"There it is again!" said I, looking up from my paper, as I sat reading on the second day after taking possession of my new home. "That fellow is a nuisance."

"What fellow?" asked my wife, whose countenance showed surprise at the remark. She was either unconscious or unaffected by the circumstance that annoyed my sensitive ears.

"Don't you hear it?" said I.

"Hear what?"

"That everlasting whistle."

"Oh!" A smile played over my wife's face. "Does it annoy you?"

"I can't say that I am particularly annoyed by it yet; but I shall be if it's to go on incessantly. A man whistles for want of thought, and this very fact will—"

"I'm not so sure of that," remarked my wife, interrupting me, "the poet notwithstanding. I would say that he whistles from exuberant feelings. Our neighbor has a sunny temper, no doubt; what, I am afraid, can not be said of our neighbor on the other side. I've never heard him whistle; but his scolding abilities are good, and, judging from two days' observation, he is not likely to permit them to grow feeble for want of use."

I did not answer, but went on with my reading, silenced, if not reconciled to my whistling neighbor.

Business matters annoyed me through the day, and I felt moody and depressed as I took my course homeward at nightfall. I was not leaving my cares behind me. Before shutting my account-books, and locking my fire-proof, I had made up a bundle of troubles to carry away with me, and my shoulders stooped beneath the burden.

I did not bring sunlight into my dwelling as I crossed, with dull, deliberate steps, its threshold. The flying feet that sprung along the hall, and the eager voices that filled, suddenly, the air in a sweet tumult of sound as I entered, were quiet and hushed in a little while. I did not repel my precious ones, for they were very dear to my heart; but birds do not sing joyously except in the sunshine, and my presence had cast a shadow. The songs of my home birds died into fitful chirpings—they sat quiet among the branches. I saw this, and understood the reason. I condemned myself; I reasoned against the folly of bringing worldly cares into the home sanctuary; I endeavored to rise out of my gloomy state. But neither philosophy nor a self-compelling effort was of any avail.

I was sitting, with my hand partly shading my face from the light, still in conflict with myself, when I became conscious of a lifting of the shadows that were around me, and of a freer respiration. The change was slight, but still very perceptible. I was beginning to question as to its cause, when my thought recognized an agency which had been operative through the sense of hearing, though not before externally perceived in consequence of my abstracted state. My neighbor was whistling "Begone, Dull Care!"

Now, in my younger days, I had whistled and sung the air and words of this cheerful old song hundreds of times, and every line was familiar to memory. I listened, with pleased interest, for a little while, and then, as my changing state gave power to resolutions quick born of better reason, I said, in my thought, emphatically, as if remanding an evil spirit,

"Begone, dull care!" And the fiend left me.

Then I spoke cheerfully, and in a tone of interest to quiet little May, who had walked round me three or four times, wondering in her little heart, no doubt, what held her at a distance from her papa, and who was now seated by her mother, leaning her flaxen head, fluted all over with glossy curls, against her knee. She sprung at my voice, and was in my lap at a bound. What a thrill of pleasure the tight clasp of her arms sent to my heart! Oh love, thou art full of blessing!

From that moment I felt kinder toward my neighbor. He had done me good—had played before me as David played before Saul, exorcising the evil spirit of discontent. There was no longer a repellent sphere, and soon all my little ones were close around me, and happy as in other times with their father.

After they were all in bed, and I sat alone with my wife, the cares that "infest the day" made a new assault upon me, and vigorously strove to regain their lost empire in my mind. I felt their approaches, and the gradual receding of cheerful thoughts with every advancing step they made. In my struggle to maintain that tranquillity which so strengthens the soul for work and duty I arose and walked the floor. My wife looked up to me with inquiry on her face. Then she let her eyes fall upon her needlework, and as I glanced toward her at every turn in my walk, I saw an expression of tender concern on her lips. She understood that I was not at ease in my mind, and the knowledge troubled her.

"How wrong in me," I said, in self-rebuke, "thus to let idle brooding over mere outside things, which such brooding can in no way effect, trouble the peace of home;" and I made a new effort to rise again into a sunnier region. But the fiend had me in his clutches again, and I could not release myself. Now it was that my David came anew to my relief. Suddenly his clear notes rang out in the air, "Away with Melancholy."

I can not tell which worked the instant revolution of feeling that came—the cheerful air, the words of the song which were called to remembrance by the air, or the associations of by-gone years that were revived. But the spell was potent and complete. I was myself again.

During the evening the voice of my wife broke out several times into snatches of song—a thing quite unusual of late, for life's sober realities had taken the music from her as well as from her husband. We were growing graver every day. It was pleasant to hear her flute-tones again, very pleasant, and my ear hearkened lovingly. The cause of this fitful warbling I recognized each time as the notes died away. They were responsive to our neighbor.

I did not then remark upon the circumstance. One reason of this lay in the fact that I had spoken lightly of our neighbor's whistling propensity, which struck me in the beginning as vulgar; and I did not care to acknowledge myself so largely his debtor as I really was.

We were in our bedroom, and about retiring for the night, when loud voices, as if in strife, came discordantly through the thin party walls, from our neighbors on the other side. Something had gone wrong there, and angry passions were in the ascendant.

"How very disagreeable!" I remarked.

"The man's a brute!" said my wife, emphatically. "He does nothing, it seems to me, but wrangle in his family. Pity that he hadn't something of the pleasant temper of our neighbor on the other side."

"That is a more agreeable sound, I must confess," was my answer as the notes of "What Fairy like Music steals over the Sea" rose sweetly on the air.

"Far more agreeable," returned my wife.

"He plays well on his instrument," I said, smiling. My ear was following the notes in pleased recognition. We stood listening until our neighbor passed to another air, set to Mrs. Hemans's beautiful words "Come to the Sunset Tree." To a slow, soft, tender measure the notes fell, yet still we heard them with singular distinctness through the intervening wall, just a little muffled, but sweeter for the obstruction.

"The Day is past and gone,
The woodman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done."

My wife recalled these lines from her memory, repeating them in a subdued, tranquilizing tone. The air was still sounding in our ears, but we no longer recognized its impression on the external senses. It had done its work of recalling the beautiful Evening Hymn of the Switzer, and we repeated to each other verse after verse.

"Sweet is the hour of rest,
Pleasant the wood's low sigh,
And the gleaming of the west,
And the turf whereon we lie.
When the burden and the heat
Of labor's task are o'er,
And kindly voices greet
The loved one at the door."

To which I added:

"But rest, more sweet and still
Than ever nightfall gave,
Our longing hearts shall fill
In the world beyond the grave.
There shall no tempest blow,
No scorching noontide heat;
There shall be no more snow,
No weary, wandering feet;
And we lift our trusting eyes
From the hills our fathers trod,
To the quiet of the skies—
To the Sabbath of our God."

All was now still on both sides. The harsh discord of our scolding neighbor had ceased, and our whistling neighbor had warbled his good-night melody, which, like a pleasant flower growing near an unsightly object, and interposing a veil of beauty, had removed it from our consciousness.

It was a long time since I had felt so peaceful on retiring as when my head went down upon its pillow—thanks to my light-hearted neighbor, at whose whistling propensities I was inclined in the beginning to be annoyed. But for him I should have gone to rest with the harsh discord of my scolding neighbor's voice in my ears, and been ill at ease with myself and the world. On what seeming trifles hang our states of mind! A word, a look, a tone of music, a discordant jar, will bring light or shadow, smiles or tears.

On the next morning, while dressing myself, thought reached forward over the day's anxieties, and care began drawing her sombre curtains around me. My neighbor was stirring also, and, like the awaking bird, tuneful in sweet matins. "Day on the Mountains" rang out cheerily, followed by "Dear Summer Morn;" winding off with "Begone, Dull Care!" and the merry laughter of a happy child which had sprung into his arms, and was being smothered with kisses.

The cloud that was gathering on my brow passed away, and I met my wife and children at the breakfast-table with pleasant smiles.

In a few days I ceased to notice the whistling of my neighbor. It continued as usual; but had grown to be such a thing of course as not to be an object of thought. But the effect remained, showing itself in a gradual restoration of that cheerfulness which care, and work, and brooding anxiety about worldly things are so apt to produce. The "voice of music," which had been almost dumb in my wife for a long period, was gradually restored. Old familiar ditties would break suddenly from her throat as she sat sewing, and I would often hear her singing again, from room to room, as in the sunnier days of our spring-time. As for myself, scarcely an evening passed in which I was not betrayed into beating time with my foot to "Auld Lang Syne," "Happy Land," "Comin' through the Rye," or "Hail Columbia," in response to my neighbor's cheery whistle. Our children also caught the infection, and would commence singing on the instant our neighbor tuned his pipes. Verily he was our benefactor—the harping David to our Saul!

"You live at Number 510, I think," said a gentleman whose face was familiar, though I was not able to call his name. We were sitting side by side in the cars.

I answered in the affirmative:

"So I thought," he replied. "I live at 514—second door east."

"Mr. Gordon."

"Yes, Sir; that is my name. Pleasant houses, but mere shells," said he. Then, with a look of disgust on his face, "Doesn't that whistling fellow between us annoy you terribly? I've got so out of all patience that I shall either move or silence him. Whistle, whistle, whistle, from morning till night. Pah! I always detested whistling. It's a sign of no brains. I've written him a note twice, but failed to send either time; it isn't well to quarrel with a neighbor if you can help it."

"It doesn't annoy me at all," I answered. "Indeed, I rather like it."

"You do? Well, that is singular! Just what my wife says."

"First-rate for the blue devils, I find. I'm indebted to our whistling friend for sundry favors in this direction."

My new acquaintance looked at me curiously.

"You're not in earnest," said he, a half-amused smile breaking through the unamiable expression which his face had assumed.

"Altogether in earnest; and I beg of you not to send him that note. So your wife is not annoyed?"

"Not she."

"Is she musical?" I inquired.

"She was; but of late years life has been rather a serious matter with us, and her singing birds have died, or lost the heart for music."

"The history of many other lives," said I.

The man sighed faintly.

"Has there been any recent change?" I ventured to inquire.

"In what respect?" he asked.

"Has there been no voice from the singing birds?"

A new expression came suddenly into the man's face.

"Why, yes," he answered, "now that I think of it. There has been some low, fitful warblings. Only last evening the voice of my wife stole out, as if half afraid, and trembled a little while on the words of an old song."

"The air of which our neighbor was whistling at the time," said I.

"Right, as I live!" was my companion's exclamation, after a pause, slapping his hand on his knee. I could hardly help smiling at the look of wonder, amusement, and conviction that blended on his face.

"I wouldn't send that note," said I, meaningly.

"No, hang me if I do! I must study this case. I'm something of a philosopher, you must know. If our neighbor can awaken the singing birds in the heart of my wife, he may whistle till the crack of doom without hinderance from me. I'm obliged to you for the suggestion."

A week afterward I met him again.

"What about the singing birds?" I asked, smiling.

"All alive again, thank God!" He answered with a heartiness of manner that caused me to look narrowly into his face. It wore a better expression than when I observed it last.

"Then you didn't send that note?"

"No, Sir. Why, since I saw you I've actually taken to whistling and humming old tunes again, and you can't tell how much better it makes me feel. And the children are becoming as merry and musical as crickets. Our friend's whistle sets them all agoing, like the first signal-warble of a bird at day-dawn that awakens the woods to melody."

We were on our way homeward, and parted at my own door. As I entered "Home, Sweet Home" was pulsing in tender harmonies on the air. I stood still and listened until tears fell over my cheeks. The singing birds were alive again in the heart of my wife also, and I said "Thank God!" as warmly as my neighbor had uttered the words a little while before.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XI.

IN WHICH PHILIP IS VERY ILL-TEMPERED.

PHILIP had long divined a part of his dear little friend's history. An uneducated young girl had been found, cajoled, deserted by a gentleman of the world. And poor Caroline was the victim, and Philip's own father the seducer! He easily guessed as much as this of the sad little story. Dr. Firmin's part in it was enough to shock his son with a thrill of disgust, and to increase the mistrust, doubt, alienation with which the father had long inspired the son. What would Philip feel when all the pages of that dark book were opened to him, and he came to hear of a false marriage, and a ruined and out-cast woman, deserted for years by the man to whom he himself was most bound? In a word, Philip had considered this as a mere case of early libertinism, and no more; and it was as such, in the very few words which he may have uttered to me respecting this matter, that he had chosen to regard it. I knew no more than my friend had told me of the story as yet; it was only by degrees that I learned it, and as events, now subsequent, served to develop and explain it.

The elder Firmin, when questioned by his old acquaintance, and, as it appeared, accomplice of former days, regarding the end of a certain intrigue at Margate, which had occurred some four or five and twenty years back, and when Firmin, having reason to avoid his college creditors, chose to live away and bear a false name, had told the clergyman a number of falsehoods, which appeared to satisfy him. What had become of that poor little thing about whom he had made such a fool of himself? Oh, she was dead, dead ever so many years before. He had pensioned her off. She had married, and died in Canada—yes, in Canada. Poor little thing! Yes she was a good little thing, and, at one time, he had been very soft about her. I am sorry to have to state of a respectable gentleman that he told lies, and told lies habitually and easily. But, you see, if you commit a crime, and break a seventh commandment let us say, or an eighth, or choose any number you will—you will probably have to back the lie of action by the lie of the tongue, and so you are fairly warned, and I have no help for you. If I murder a man, and the policeman inquires, “Pray, Sir, did you cut this here gentleman’s throat?” I must bear false witness, you see, out of self-defense, though I may be naturally a most reliable truth-telling man. And so with regard to many crimes which gentlemen commit—it is painful to have to say respecting gentlemen, but they become neither more nor less than habitual liars, and have to go lying on through life to you, to me, to the servants, to their wives, to their children, to — O awful name! I bow and humble myself. May we kneel, may we kneel, nor strive to speak our falsehoods before Thee!

And so, my dear Sir, seeing that after committing any infraction of the moral laws, you must tell lies in order to back yourself out of your scrape, let me ask you, as a man of honor and a gentleman, whether you had not better forego the crime, so as to avoid the unavoidable, and unpleasant, and daily recurring necessity of the subsequent perjury? A poor young girl of the lower orders, cajoled, or ruined, more or less, is of course no great matter. The little baggage is turned out of doors—worse luck for her—or she gets a place, or she marries one of her own class, who has not the exquisite delicacy belonging to “gentle blood”—and there is an end of her. But if you marry her privately and irregularly yourself, and then throw her off, and then marry somebody else, you are brought to book in all sorts of unpleasant ways. I am writing of quite an old story, be pleased to remember. The first part of the history I myself printed some twenty years ago; and if you fancy I allude to any more modern period, Madam, you are entirely out in your conjecture.

It must have been a most unpleasant duty for a man of fashion, honor, and good family, to lie to a poor tipsy, disreputable bankrupt merchant’s daughter, such as Caroline Gann; but George Brand Firmin, Esq., M.D., had no other choice: and when he lied—as in severe cases, when he administered calomel—he thought it best to give the drug freely. Thus he lied to Hunt, saying that Mrs. Brandon was long since dead in Canada; and he lied to Caroline, prescribing for her the very same pill, as it were, and saying that Hunt was long since dead in Canada too. And I can fancy few more painful and humiliating positions for a man of rank, and fashion, and reputation, than to have to demean himself so far as to tell lies to a little low-bred person, who gets her bread as a nurse of the sick, and has not the proper use of her h’s.

“Oh yes, Hunt!” Firmin had said to the Little Sister, in one of those sad little colloquies which sometimes took place between him and his victim, his wife of old days; a wild, bad man, Hunt was—in days when I own I was little better! I have deeply repented since, Caroline; of nothing more than of my conduct to you; for you were worthy of a better fate, and you loved me truly—madly.”

“Yes,” says Caroline.

“I was wild, then! I was desperate! I had ruined my fortunes, estranged my father from me, was hiding from my creditors under an assumed name—that under which I saw you. Ah, why did I ever come to your house, my poor child? The mark of the demon was upon me. I did not dare to speak of marriage before my father. You have yours, and tend him with your ever constant goodness. Do you know that my father would not see me when he died? Oh, it’s a cruel thing to think of!” And the suffering creature slaps his tall forehead with his trembling hand; and some of his grief about his own father, I dare say, is sincere, for he feels the shame and remorse of being alienated from his own son.

As for the marriage—that it was a most wicked and unjustifiable deceit, he owned; but he was wild when it took place, wild with debt and with despair at his father’s estrangement from him—but the fact was it was no marriage.

“Why?” asked the other, eagerly. His love was dead, but his vanity was still hale and well. “Did you care for somebody else, Caroline? Did you forget your George, whom you used to—”

“No!” said the little woman, bravely. “But I couldn’t live with a man who behaved to any woman so dishonest as you behaved to me. I liked you because I thought you was a gentleman. My poor painter was, whom you used to despise and trample to hearth—and my dear, dear Philip is, Mr. Firmin. But gentlemen tell the truth! Gentlemen don’t deceive poor innocent girls, and desert ’em without a penny!”

“Caroline! I was driven by my creditors. I—”

“Never mind. It’s over now. I bear you no malice, Mr. Firmin, but I wouldn’t marry you, no, not to be doctor’s wife to the queen!”

This had been the Little Sister’s language when there was no thought of the existence of Hunt, the clergyman who had celebrated their marriage; and I don’t know whether Firmin was most piqued or pleased at the divorce which the little woman pronounced of her own decree. But when the ill-omened Hunt made his appearance, doubts and terrors filled the physician’s mind. Hunt was needy, greedy, treacherous, unscrupulous, desperate. He could hold this marriage over the doctor. He could threaten, extort, expose, perhaps invalidate Philip’s legitimacy. The first marriage, almost certainly, was null, but the scandal would be fatal to Firmin's reputation and practice. And the quarrel with his son entailed consequences not pleasant to think of. You see George Firmin, Esq., M.D., was a man with a great development of the back head; when he willed a thing, he willed it so fiercely that he must have it, never mind the consequences. And so he had willed to make himself master of poor little Caroline: and so he had willed, as a young man, to have horses, splendid entertainments, roulette, and écarté, and so forth; and the bill came at its natural season, and George Firmin, Esq., did not always like to pay. But for a grand, prosperous, highly-bred gentleman in the best society—with a polished forehead and manners, and universally looked up to—to have to tell lies to a poor, little, timid, uncomplaining, sick-room nurse, it was humiliating, wasn't it? And I can feel for Firmin.

To have to lie to Hunt was disgusting; but somehow not so exquisitely mean and degrading as to have to cheat a little, trusting, humble, houseless creature, over the bloom of whose gentle, young life his accursed foot had already trampled. But then this Hunt was such a cad and ruffian that there need be no scruple about humbugging him; and if Firmin had had any humor he might have had a grim sort of pleasure in leading the dirty clergyman a dance thoro' bush thoro' brier. So, perhaps (of course I have no means of ascertaining the fact), the doctor did not altogether dislike the duty which now devolved on him of hood-winking his old acquaintance and accomplice. I don't like to use such a vulgar phrase regarding a man in Doctor Firmin's high social position, as to say of him and the jail-chaplain that it was "Thief catch thief;" but at any rate Hunt is such a low, graceless, friendless vagabond, that if he comes in for a few kicks, or is mystified, we need not be very sorry. When Mr. Thurtell is hung we don't put on mourning. His is a painful position for the moment; but, after all, he has murdered Mr. William Weare.

Firmin was a bold and courageous man, hot in pursuit, fierce in desire, but cool in danger, and rapid in action. Some of his great successes as a physician arose from his daring and successful practice in sudden emergency. While Hunt was only lurching about the town an aimless miscreant, living from dirty hand to dirty mouth, and as long as he could get drink, cards, and shelter, tolerably content, or at least pretty easily appeased by a guinea-dose or two—Firmin could adopt the palliative system; soothe his patient with an occasional bounty; set him to sleep with a composing draught of claret or brandy; and let the day take care of itself. He might die; he might have a fancy to go abroad again; he might be transported for forgery or some other rascaldom, Dr. Firmin would console himself; and he trusted to the chapter of accidents to get rid of his friend. But Hunt, aware that the woman was alive whom he had actually, though unlawfully married to Firmin, became an enemy when it was necessary to subdue, to cajole, or to bribe, and the sooner the doctor put himself on his defense the better. What should the defense be? Perhaps the most effectual was a fierce attack on the enemy; perhaps it would be better to bribe him. The course to be taken would be best ascertained after a little previous reconnoitring.

"He will try and inflame Caroline," the doctor thought, "by representing her wrongs and her rights to her. He will show her that, as my wife, she has a right to my name and a share of my income. A less mercenary woman never lived than this poor little creature. She disdains money, and, except for her father's sake, would have taken none of mine. But to punish me for certainly rather shabby behavior; to claim and take her own right and position in the world as an honest woman, may she not be induced to declare war against me, and stand by her marriage? After she left home, her two Irish half-sisters deserted her and spat upon her; and when she would have returned, the heartless women drove her from the door. Oh, the vixens! And now to drive by them in her carriage, to claim a maintenance from me, and to have a right to my honorable name, would she not have her dearest revenge over her sisters by so declaring her marriage?"

Firmin's noble mind misgave him very considerably on this point. He knew women, and how those had treated their Little Sister. Was it in human nature not to be revenged? These thoughts rose straightway in Firmin's mind, when he heard that the much-dreaded meeting between Caroline and the chaplain had come to pass.

As he ate his dinner with his guest, his enemy, opposite to him, he was determining on his plan of action. The screen was up, and he was laying his guns behind it, so to speak. Of course he was as civil to Hunt as the tenant to his landlord when he comes with no rent. So the doctor laughed, joked, bragged, talked his best, and was thinking the while what was to be done against the danger.

He had a plan which might succeed. He must see Caroline immediately. He knew the weak point of her heart, and where she was most likely to be vulnerable. And he would act against her as barbarians of old acted against their enemies when they brought the captive wives and children in front of the battle, and bade the foe strike through them. He knew how Caroline loved his boy. It was through that love he would work upon her. As he washes his pretty hands for dinner, and bathes his noble brow, he arranges his little plan. He orders himself to be sent for soon after the second bottle of claret—and it appears the doctor's servants were accustomed to the delivery of these messages from their master to himself. The plan arranged, now let us take our dinner and our wine, and make ourselves comfortable until the moment of action. In his wild-oats days, when traveling abroad with wild and noble companions, Firmin had fought a duel or two, and was always remarkable for his gayety of conversation and the fine appetite which he showed at breakfast before going on to the field. So, perhaps, Hunt, had he not been stupefied by previous drink, might have taken the alarm by remarking Firmin's extra courtesy and gayety as they dined together. It was nunc vinum, cras æquor.

When the second bottle of claret was engaged Dr. Firmin starts. He has an advance of half an hour at least on his adversary, or on the man who may be his adversary. If the Little Sister is at home, he will see her—he will lay bare his candid heart to her, and make a clean breast of it. The Little Sister was at home.

"I want to speak to you very particularly about that case of poor Lady Humandhaw," says he, dropping his voice.

"I will step out, my dear, and take a little fresh air," says Captain Gann: meaning that he will be off to the "Admiral Byng;" and the two are together.

"I have had something on my conscience. I have deceived you, Caroline," says the doctor, with the beautiful shining forehead and hat.

"Ah, Mr. Firmin," says she, bending over her work, "you've used me to that."

"A man whom you knew once, and who tempted me for his own selfish ends to do a very wrong thing by you—a man whom I thought dead is alive. Tufton Hunt, who performed that—that illegal ceremony at Margate, of which so often and often on my knees I have repented, Caroline!"

The beautiful hands are clasped; the beautiful, deep voice thrills lowly through the room; and if a tear or two can be squeezed out of the beautiful eyes, I dare say the doctor will not be sorry.

"He has been here to-day. Him and Mr. Philip was here and quarreled. Philip has told you, I suppose, Sir?"

"Before Heaven, 'on the word of a gentleman,' when I said he was dead, Caroline, I thought he was dead! Yes, I declare, at our college, Maxwell—Dr. Maxwell—who had been at Cambridge with us, told me that our old friend Hunt had died in Canada." (This, my beloved friends and readers, may not have been the precise long bow which George Firmin, Esq., M.D., pulled; but that he twanged a famous lie out, whenever there was occasion for the weapon, I assure you is an undoubted fact.) "Yes, Dr. Maxwell told me our old friend was dead—our old friend? My worst enemy and yours! But let that pass. It was he, Caroline, who led me into crimes which I have never ceased to deplore."

"Ah, Mr. Firmin," sighs the Little Sister, "since I've known you, you was big enough to take care of yourself in that way."

"I have not come to excuse myself, Caroline," says the deep sweet voice. "I have done you enough wrong, and I feel it here—at this heart. I have not come to speak about myself, but of some one I love the best of all the world—the only being I do love—some one you love, you good and generous soul—about Philip."

"What is it about Philip?" asks Mrs. Brandon, very quickly.

"Do you want harm to happen to him?"

"Oh, my darling boy, no!" cries the Little Sister, clasping her little hands.

"Would you keep him from harm?"

"Ah, Sir, you know I would. When he had the scarlet fever didn't I pour the drink down his poor throat, and nurse him, and tend him, as if, as if—as a mother would her own child?"

"You did, you did, you noble, noble woman; and Heaven bless you for it! A father does. I am not all heartless, Caroline, as you deem me, perhaps."

"I don't think it's much merit your loving him," says Caroline, resuming her sewing. And perhaps she thinks within herself, "What is he a coming to?" You see she was a shrewd little person, when her passions and partialities did not overcome her reason; and she had come to the conclusion that this elegant Dr. Firmin, whom she had admired so once, was a—not altogether veracious gentleman. In fact, I heard her myself say afterward, "La! he used to talk so fine, and slap his hand on his heart, you know; but I usedn't to believe him, no more than a man in a play." "It's not much merit your loving that boy," says Caroline, then. "But what about him, Sir?"

Then Firmin explained. This man Hunt was capable of any crime for money or revenge. Seeing Caroline was alive.....

"I s'pose you told him I was dead too, Sir," says she, looking up from the work.

"Spare me, spare me! Years ago, perhaps, when I had lost sight of you, I may, perhaps, have thought—"

"And it's not to you, George Brandon—it's not to you," cries Caroline, starting up, and speaking with her sweet, innocent, ringing voice; "it's to kind, dear friends—it's to my good God that I owe my life, which you had flung it away. And I paid you back by guarding your boy's dear life, I did, under—under Him who giveth and taketh. And bless His name!" And she clasps her hands, and thanks.

"You are a good woman, and I am a bad, sinful man, Caroline," says the other. "You saved my Philip's—our Philip's life, at the risk of your own. Now I tell you that another immense danger menaces him, and may come upon him any day as long as yonder scoundrel is alive. Suppose his character is assailed; suppose, thinking you dead, I married another."

"Ah, George, you never thought me dead; though, perhaps, you wished it, Sir. And many would have died," added the poor Little Sister.

"Look, Caroline! If I was married to you, my wife—Philip's mother—was not my wife, and he is her natural son. The property he inherits does not belong to him. The children of his grandfather's other daughter claim it, and Philip is a beggar. Philip, bred as he has been—Philip, the heir to a mother's large fortune."

"And—and his father's, too?" asks Caroline, anxiously.

"I daren't tell you—though, no, by Heavens! I can trust you with every thing. My own great gains have been swallowed up in speculations which have been almost all fatal. There has been a fate hanging over me, Caroline—a righteous punishment for having deserted you. I sleep with a sword over my head, which may fall and destroy me. I walk with a volcano under my feet, which may burst any day and annihilate me. And people speak of the famous Dr. Firmin, the rich Dr. Firmin, the prosperous Dr. Firmin! I shall have a title soon, I believe. I am believed to be happy, and I am alone, and the wretchedest man alive."

"Alone, are you?" said Caroline. "There was a woman once would have kept by you, only you—you flung her away. Look here, George Brandon. It's over with us. Years and years ago it lies where a little cherub was buried. But I love my Philip; and I won't hurt him—no, never, never, never!"

And as the doctor turned to go away, Caroline followed him wistfully into the hall, and it was there that Philip found them.

Caroline's tender "never, never," rang in Philip's memory as he sat at Ridley's party, amidst the artists and authors there assembled. Phil was thoughtful and silent. He did not laugh very loud. He did not praise or abuse any body outrageously, as was the wont of that most emphatic young gentleman. He scarcely contradicted a single person; and perhaps, when Larkins said Scumble's last picture was beautiful, or Bunch, the critic of the Connoisseur, praised Bowman's last novel, contented himself with a scornful "Ho!" and a pull at his whiskers, by way of protest and denial. Had he been in his usual fine spirits, and enjoying his ordinary flow of talk, he would have informed Larkins and the assembled company not only that Scumble was an impostor, but that he, Larkins, was an idiot for admiring him. He would have informed Bunch that he was infatuated about that jackass Bowman, that cockney, that wretched ignoramus, who didn't know his own or any other language. He would have taken down one of Bowman's stories from the shelf, and proved the folly, imbecility, and crass ignorance of that author. (Ridley has a simple little stock of novels and poems in an old cabinet in his studio, and reads them still with much artless wonder and respect.) Or, to be sure, Phil would have asserted propositions the exact contrary of those here maintained, and declared that Bowman was a genius, and Scumble a most accomplished artist. But then, you know, somebody else must have commenced by taking the other side. Certainly a more paradoxical, and provoking, and obstinate, and contradictory disputant than Mr. Phil I never knew. I never met Dr. Johnson, who died before I came up to town; but I do believe Phil Firmin would have stood up and argued even with him.

At these Thursday divans the host provided the modest and kindly refreshment, and Betsy the maid, or Virgilio the model, traveled to and fro with glasses and water. Each guest brought his own smoke, and I promise you there were such liberal contributions of the article that the studio was full of it; and new-comers used to be saluted by a roar of laughter as you heard, rather than saw, them entering, and choking in the fog. It was, "Holloa, Prodgers! is that you, old boy?" and the beard of Prodgers (that famous sculptor) would presently loom through the cloud. It was, "Newcome, how goes?" and Mr. Clive Newcome (a mediocre artist, I must own, but a famous good fellow, with an uncommonly pretty villa and pretty and rich wife at Wimbledon) would make his appearance, and be warmly greeted by our little host. It was, "Is that you, F. B.? would you like a link, old boy, to see you through the fog?" And the deep voice of Frederick Bayham, Esquire (the eminent critic on Art), would boom out of the tobacco-mist, and would exclaim, "A link? I would like a drink." Ah, ghosts of youth, again ye draw near! Old figures glimmer through the cloud. Old songs echo out of the distance. What were you saying anon about Dr. Johnson, boys? I am sure some of us must remember him. As for me, I am so old that I might have been at Edial school—the other pupil along with little Davy Garrick and his brother.

We had a bachelor's supper in the Temple so lately that I think we must pay but a very brief visit to a smoking party in Thornhaugh Street, or the ladies will say that we are too fond of bachelor habits, and keep our friends away from their charming and amiable society. A novel must not smell of cigars much, nor should its refined and genteel page be stained with too frequent brandy-and-water. Please to imagine, then, the prattle of the artists, authors, and amateurs assembled at Ridley's divan. Fancy Jarman, the miniature painter, drinking more liquor than any man present, asking his neighbor (sub voce) why Ridley does not give his father (the old butler) five shillings to wait; suggesting that perhaps the old man is gone out, and is getting seven-and-sixpence elsewhere; praising Ridley's picture aloud, and sneering at it in an undertone; and when a man of rank happens to enter the room, shambling up to him, and fawning on him, and cringing to him with fulsome praise and flattery. When the gentleman's back is turned, Jarman can spit epigrams at it. I hope he will never forgive Ridley, and always continue to hate him: for hate him Jarman will, as long as he is prosperous, and curse him as long as the world esteems him. Look at Pym, the incumbent of Saint Bronze hard by, coming in to join the literary and artistic assembly, and choking in his white neckcloth to the diversion of all the company who can see him! Sixteen, eighteen, twenty men are assembled. Open the windows, or sure they will all be stifled with the smoke! Why, it fills the whole house so that the Little Sister has to open her parlor window on the ground-floor, and gasp for fresh air.

Phil's head and cigar are thrust out from a window above, and he lolls there, musing about his own affairs, as his smoke ascends to the skies. Young Mr. Philip Firmin is known to be wealthy, and his father gives very good parties in Old Parr Street, so Jarman sidles up to Phil and wants a little fresh air too. He enters into conversation by abusing Ridley's picture that is on the easel.

"Every body is praising it; what do you think of it, Mr. Firmin? Very queer drawing about those eyes, isn't there?"

"Is there?" growls Phil.

"Very loud color."

"Oh!" says Phil.

"The composition is so clearly priggish from Raphael."

"Indeed!"

"I beg your pardon. I don't think you know who I am," continues the other, with a simper.

"Yes, I do," says Phil, glaring at him. "You're a painter, and your name is Mr. Envy."

"Sir!" shrieks the painter; but he is addressing himself to the tails of Phil's coat, the superior half of Mr. Firmin's body is stretching out of the window. Now, you may speak of a man behind his back, but not to him. So Mr. Jarman withdraws, and addresses himself, face to face, to somebody else in the company. I dare say he abuses that upstart, impudent, bumptious young doctor's son. Have I not owned that Philip was often very rude? and to-night he is in a specially bad humor.

As he continues to stare into the street, who is that who has just reeled up to the railings below, and is talking in at Mrs. Brandon's window? Whose blackguard voice and laugh are those which Phil recognizes with a shudder? It is the voice and laugh of our friend Mr. Hunt, whom Philip left, not very long since, near his father's house in Old Parr Street; and both of those familiar sounds are more vinous, more odious, more impudent than they were even two hours ago.

"Holloa! I say!" he calls out with a laugh and a curse. "Pst! Mrs. Whatdyoucallem! Hang it! don't shut the window. Let a fellow in!" and as he looks toward the upper window, where Philip's head and bust appear dark before the light, Hunt cries out, "Holloa! what game's up now, I wonder? Supper and ball. Shouldn't be surprised." And he hiccups a waltz tune, and clatters time to it with his dirty boots.

"Mrs. Whatdyoucall! Mrs. B—!" the sot then recommences to shriek out. "Must see you—most particular business. Private and confidential. Hear of something to your advantage." And rap, rap, rap, he is now thundering at the door. In the clatter of twenty voices few hear Hunt's noise except Philip; or, if they do, only imagine that another of Ridley's guests is arriving.

At the hall door there is talk and altercation, and the high shriek of a well-known odious voice. Philip moves quickly from his window, shoulders friend Jarman at the studio door, and hustling past him obtains, no doubt, more good wishes from that ingenious artist. Philip is so rude and overbearing that I really have a mind to depose him from his place of hero—only, you see, we are committed. His name is on the page overhead, and we can't take it down and put up another. The Little Sister is standing in her hall by the just opened door, and remonstrating with Mr. Hunt, who appears to wish to force his way in.

"Pooh! shtuff, my dear! If he's here I musht see him—particular business—get out of that!" and he reels forward and against little Caroline's shoulder.

"Get away, you brute, you!" cries the little lady. "Go home, Mr. Hunt; you are worse than you were this morning." She is a resolute little woman, and puts out a firm little arm against this odious invader. She has seen patients in hospital raging in fever: she is not frightened by a tipsy man. "La! is it you, Mr. Philip? Who ever will take this horrid man? He ain't fit to go up stairs among the gentlemen; indeed he ain't."

"You said Firmin was here—and it isn't the father. It's the cub! I want the doctor. Where's the doctor?" hiccups the chaplain, lurching against the wall; and then he looks at Philip with bloodshot eyes, that twinkle hate. "Who wantsh you, I shlike to know? Had enough of you already to-day. Conceited brute. Don't look at me in that sortaway! I ain't afraid of you—ain't afraid any body. Time was when I was a young man fight you as soon as look at you. I say, Philip!"

"Go home, now. Do go home, there's a good man," says the landlady.

"I say! Look here—hic—hi! Philip! On your word as a gentleman, your father's not here? He's a sly old boots, Brummeli Firmin is—Trinity man—I'm not a Trinity man—Corpus man. I say, Philip, give us your hand. Bear no malice. Look here—something very particular. After dinner—went into Air Street—you know—rouge gagne, et couleur—cleaned out. Cleaned out, on the honor of a gentleman and master of arts of the University of Cambridge. So was your father—no, he went out in medicine. I say, Philip, hand us out five sovereigns, and let's try the luck again! What, you won't? It's mean, I say. Don't be mean."

"Oh, here's five shillings! Go and have a cab. Fetch a cab for him, Virgilio, do!" cries the mistress of the house.

"That's not enough, my dear!" cries the chaplain, advancing toward Mrs. Brandon with such a leer and air that Philip, half choked with passion, runs forward, grips Hunt by the collar, and crying out, "You filthy scoundrel! as this is not my house, I may kick you out of it!"—in another instant has run Hunt through the passage, hurled him down the steps, and sent him sprawling into the kennel.

"Row down below," says Rosebury, placidly, looking from above. "Personal conflict. Intoxicated individual—in gutter. Our impetuous friend has floored him."

Hunt, after a moment, sits up and glares at Philip. He is not hurt. Perhaps the shock has sobered him. He thinks, perhaps, Philip is going to strike again. "Hands off, BASTARD!" shrieks out the prostrate wretch.

"Oh, Philip, Philip! He's mad, he's tipsy!" cries out the Little Sister, running into the street. She puts her arms round Philip. "Don't mind him, dear—he's mad! Policeman! The gentleman has had too much. Come in, Philip; come in!"

She took him into her little room. She was pleased with the gallantry of the boy. She liked to see him just now, standing over her enemy, courageous, victorious, her champion. "La! how savage he did look; and how brave and strong you are! But the little wretch ain't fit to stand before such as you!" And she passed her little hand down his arm, of which the muscles were all in a quiver from the recent skirmish.

"What did the scoundrel mean by calling me bastard?" said Philip, the wild blue eyes glaring round about with more than ordinary fierceness.

"Nonsense, dear! Who minds any thing he says, that beast? His language is always horrid; he's not a gentleman. He had had too much this morning when he was here. What matters what he says? He won't know any thing about it to-morrow. But it was kind of my Philip to rescue his poor little nurse, wasn't it? Like a novel. Come in, and let me make you some tea. Don't go to no more smoking: you have had enough. Come in and talk to me."

And as a mother, with sweet, pious face, yearns to her little children from her seat, she fondles him, she watches him; she fills her teapot from her singing kettle. She talks—talks in her homely way, and on this subject and that. It is a wonder how she prattles on, who is generally rather silent. She won't see Phil's eyes, which are following her about very strangely and fiercely. And when again he mutters, "What did he mean by....." "La, my dear, how cross you are!" she breaks out. "It's always so; you won't be happy without your cigar. Here's a cheroot, a beauty! Pa brought it home from the club. A China captain gave him some. You must light it at the little end. There!" And if I could draw the picture which my mind sees of her lighting Phil's cheroot for him, and smiling the while, the little innocent Delilah coaxing and wheedling this young Samson, I know it would be a pretty picture. I wish Ridley would sketch it for me.

CHAPTER XII.

DAMOCLES.

ON the next morning, at an hour so early that Old Parr Street was scarce awake, and even the maids who wash the broad steps of the houses of the tailors and medical gentlemen who inhabit that region had not yet gone down on their knees before their respective doors, a ring was heard at Dr. Firmin's night bell, and when the door was opened by the yawning attendant, a little person in a gray gown and a black bonnet made her appearance, handed a note to the servant, and said the case was most urgent and the doctor must come at once. Was not Lady Humandhaw the noble person whom we last mentioned, as the invalid about whom the doctor and the nurse had spoken a few words on the previous evening? The Little Sister, for it was she, used the very same name to the servant, who retired grumbling to waken up his master and deliver the note.

Nurse Brandon sate a while in the great gaunt dining-room where hung the portrait of the doctor in his splendid black collar and cuffs, and contemplated this master-piece until an invasion of housemaids drove her from the apartment, when she took refuge in that other little room to which Mrs. Firmin's portrait had been consigned.

"That's like him ever so many years and years ago," she thinks. "It is a little handsomer; but it has his wicked look that I used to think so killing, and so did my sisters both of them—they were ready to tear out each other's eyes for jealousy. And that's Mrs. Firmin's! Well, I suppose the painter haven't flattered her. If he have she could have been no great things, Mrs. F. couldn't." And the doctor, entering softly by the opened door and over the thick Turkey carpet, comes up to her noiseless, and finds the Little Sister gazing at the portrait of the departed lady.

"Oh! it's you, is it? I wonder whether you treated her no better than you treated me, Dr. F. I've a notion she's not the only one. She don't look happy, poor thing!" says the little lady.

"What is it, Caroline?" asks the deep-voiced doctor; "and what brings you so early?"

The Little Sister then explains to him. "Last night after he went away Hunt came sure enough. He had been drinking. He was very rude, and Philip wouldn't bear it. Philip had a good courage of his own and a hot blood. And Philip thought Hunt was insulting her, the Little Sister. So he up with his hand and down goes Mr. Hunt on the pavement. Well, when he was down he was in a dreadful way, and he called Philip a dreadful name."

"A name? what name?" Then Caroline told the doctor the name Mr. Hunt had used; and if Firmin's face usually looked wicked, I dare say it did not seem very angelical when he heard how this odious name had been applied to his son. "Can he do Philip a mischief?" Caroline continued. "I thought I was bound to tell his father. Look here, Dr. F., I don't want to do my dear boy a harm. But suppose what you told me last night isn't true—as I don't think you much mind—mind—saying things as are incorrect, you know, when us women are in the case. But suppose when you played the villian, thinking only to take in a poor innocent girl of sixteen, it was you who were took in, and that I was your real wife after all? There would be a punishment!"

"I should have an honest and good wife, Caroline," said the doctor, with a groan.

"This would be a punishment, not for you, but for my poor Philip," the woman goes on. "What has he done that his honest name should be took from him—and his fortune perhaps? I have been lying broad awake all night thinking of him. Ah, George Brandon! Why, why did you come to my poor old father's house, and bring this misery down on me, and on your child unborn?"

"On myself the worst of all," says the doctor.

"You deserve it. But it's us innocent that has had, or will have, to suffer most. Oh, George Brandon! Think of a poor child, flung away, and left to starve and die, without even so much as knowing your real name! Think of your boy, perhaps brought to shame and poverty through your fault!"

"Do you suppose I don't often think of my wrong?" says the doctor. "That it does not cause me sleepless nights, and hours of anguish? Ah! Caroline!" and he looks in the glass; "I am not shaved, and it's very unbecoming," he thinks; that is, if I may dare to read his thoughts, as I do to report his unheard words.

"You think of your wrong now it may be found out, I dare say!" says Caroline. "Suppose this Hunt turns against you? He is desperate; mad for drink and money; has been in jail—as he said this very night to me and my papa. He'll do or say anything. If you treat him hard, and Philip have treated him hard—not harder than served him right though—he'll pull the house down and himself under it; but he'll be revenged. Perhaps he drank so much last night that he may have forgot. But I fear he means mischief, and I came here to say so, and hoping that you might be kep on your guard, Doctor F., and if you have to quarrel with him, I don't know what you ever will do, I am sure—no more than if you had to fight a chimney-sweep in the street. I have been awake all night thinking, and as soon as ever as I saw the daylight I determined I would run and tell you."

"When he called Philip that name did the boy seem much disturbed?" asked the doctor.

"Yes; he referred to it again and again—though I tried to coax him out of it. But it was on his mind last night, and I am sure he will think of it the first thing this morning. Ah yes, doctor! conscience will sometimes let a gentleman doze; but after discovery has come, and opened your curtains, and said, 'You desired to be called early!' there's little use in trying to sleep much. You look very much frightened, Doctor F.," the nurse continues. "You haven't such a courage as Philip has; or as you had when you were a young man, and came a leading poor girls astray. You used to be afraid of nothing then. Do you remember that fellow on board the steamboat in Scotland in our wedding-trip, and, la, I thought you was going to kill him. That poor little Lord Cinqbars told me ever so many stories then about your courage and shooting people. It wasn't very courageous, leaving a poor girl without even a name, and scarce a guinea, was it? But I ain't come to call up old stories—only to warn you. Even in old times, when he married us, and I thought he was doing a kindness, I never could abide this horrible man. In Scotland, when you was away shooting with your poor little lord, the things Hunt used to say and look was dreadful. I wonder how ever you, who were gentlemen, could put up with such a fellow! Ah, that was a sad honey-moon of ours! I wonder why I'm a thinking of it now? I suppose it's from having seen the picture of the other one—poor lady!"

"I have told you, Caroline, that I was so wild and desperate at that unhappy time, I was scarcely accountable for my actions. If I left you, it was because I had no other resource but flight. I was a ruined, penniless man but for my marriage with Ellen Ringwood. You don't suppose the marriage was happy? Happy! when have I ever been happy? My lot is to be wretched, and bring wretchedness down on those I love! On you, on my father, on my wife, on my boy—I am a doomed man. Ah that the innocent should suffer for me!" And our friend looks askance in the glass at the blue chin and hollow eyes which make his guilt look the more haggard.

"I never had my lines," the Little Sister continued, "I never knew there were papers, or writings, or any thing but a ring and a clergyman, when you married me. But I've heard tell that people in Scotland don't want a clergyman at all; and if they call themselves man and wife, they are man and wife. Now, Sir, Mr. and Mrs. Brandon certainly did travel together in Scotland—witness that man whom you were going to throw into the lake for being rude to your wife—and.....La! Don't fly out so! It wasn't me, a poor girl of sixteen, who did wrong. It was you, a man of the world, who was years and years older."

When Brandon carried off his poor little victim and wife, there had been a journey to Scotland, where Lord Cinqbars, then alive, had sporting quarters. His lordship's chaplain, Mr. Hunt, had been of the party, which fate very soon afterward separated. Death seized on Cinqbars at Naples. Debt caused Firmin—Brandon, as he called himself then—to fly the country. The chaplain wandered from jail to jail. And as for poor little Caroline Brandon, I suppose the husband who had married her under a false name thought that to escape her, leave her, and disown her altogether was an easier and less dangerous plan than to continue relations with her. So one day, four months after their marriage, the young couple being then at Dover, Caroline's husband happened to go out for a walk. But he sent away a portmanteau by the back door when he went out for the walk, and as Caroline was waiting for her little dinner some hours after, the porter who carried the luggage came with a little note from her dearest G. B.; and it was full of little fond expressions of regard and affection, such as gentlemen put into little notes; but dearest G. B. said the bailiffs were upon him, and one of them had arrived that morning, and he must fly: and he took half the money he had, and left half for his little Carry. And he would be back soon and arrange matters, or tell her where to write and follow him. And she was to take care of her little health, and to write a great deal to her Georgy. And she did not know how to write very well then; but she did her best, and improved a great deal; for, indeed, she wrote a great deal, poor thing. Sheets and sheets of paper she blotted with ink and tears. And then the money was spent; and the next money; and no more came, and no more letters. And she was alone at sea, sinking, sinking, when it pleased Heaven to send that friend who rescued her. It is such a sad, sad, little story, that in fact I don't like dwelling on it; not caring to look upon poor, innocent, trusting creatures in pain.

.....Well, then, when Caroline exclaimed, "La! don't fly out so, Dr. Firmin!" I suppose the doctor had been crying out, and swearing fiercely, at the recollections of his friend Mr. Brandon, and at the danger which possibly hung over that gentleman. Marriage ceremonies are dangerous risks in jest or in earnest. You can't pretend to marry even a poor old bankrupt lodging-house keeper's daughter without some risk of being brought subsequently to book. If you have a vulgar wife alive, and afterward choose to leave her and marry an earl's niece, you will come to trouble, however well connected you are and highly placed in society. If you have had thirty thousand pounds with wife No. 2, and have to pay it back on a sudden, the payment may be inconvenient. You may be tried for bigamy, and sentenced, goodness knows to what punishment. At any rate, if the matter is made public, and you are a most respectable man, moving in the highest scientific and social circles, those circles may be disposed to request you to walk out of their circumference. A novelist, I know, ought to have no likes, dislikes, pity, partiality for his characters; but I declare I can not help feeling a respectful compassion for a gentleman, who, in consequence of a youthful, and, I am sure, sincerely regretted folly, may be liable to lose his fortune, his place in society, and his considerable practice. Punishment hasn't a right to come with such a pede claudo. There ought to be limitations, and it is shabby and revengeful of Justice to present her little bill when it has been more than twenty years owing..... Having had his talk out with the Little Sister, having a long past crime suddenly taken down from the shelf; having a remorse, long since supposed to be dead and buried, suddenly starting up in the most blustering, boisterous, inconvenient manner; having a rage and terror tearing him within; I can fancy this most respectable physician going about his day's work, and most sincerely sympathize with him. Who is to heal the physician? Is he not more sick at heart than most of his patients that day? He has to listen to Lady Megrim cackling for half an hour at least, and describing her little ailments. He has to listen, and never once to dare to say, "Confound you, old chatter-box! What are you prating about your ailments to me, who am suffering real torture while I am smirking in your face?" He has to wear the inspiriting smile, to breathe the gentle joke, to console, to whisper hope, to administer remedy; and all day, perhaps, he sees no one so utterly sick, so sad, so despairing, as himself.

The first person on whom he had to practice hypocrisy that day was his own son, who chose to come to breakfast—a meal of which son and father seldom now partook in company. "What does he know, and what does he suspect?" are the father's thoughts; but a lowering gloom is on Philip's face, and the father's eyes look into the son's, but can not penetrate their darkness.

"Did you stay late last night, Philip?" says papa.

"Yes, Sir, rather late," answers the son.

"Pleasant party?"

"No, Sir, stupid. Your friend Mr. Hunt wanted to come in. He was drunk, and rude to Mrs. Brandon, and I was obliged to put him out of the door. He was dreadfully violent and abusive."

"Swore a good deal, I suppose?"

"Fiercely, Sir, and called names."

I dare say Philip's heart beat so when he said these last words that they were inaudible: at all events, Philip's father did not appear to pay much attention to the words, for he was busy reading the Morning Post, and behind that sheet of fashionable news hid whatever expression of agony there might be on his face. Philip afterward told his present biographer of this breakfast meeting and dreary tête-à-tête. "I burned to ask what was the meaning of that scoundrel's words of the past night," Philip said to his biographer; "but I did not dare, somehow. You see, Pendennis, it is not pleasant to say point-blank to your father, 'Sir, are you a confirmed scoundrel, or are you not? Is it possible that you have made a double marriage, as yonder other rascal hinted; and that my own legitimacy and my mother's fair fame, as well as poor, harmless Caroline's honor and happiness have been destroyed by your crime?' But I had lain awake all night thinking about that scoundrel Hunt's words, and whether there was any meaning beyond drunken malice in what he said." So we find that three people had passed a bad night in consequence of Mr. Firmin's evil behavior of five-and-twenty years back, which surely was a most unreasonable punishment for a sin of such old date. I wish, dearly beloved brother sinners, we could take all the punishment for our individual crimes on our individual shoulders: but we drag them all down with us—that is the fact; and when Macheath is condemned to hang, it is Polly and Lucy who have to weep and suffer and wear piteous mourning in their hearts long after the dare-devil rogue has jumped off the Tyburn ladder.

"Well, Sir, he did not say a word," said Philip, recounting the meeting to his friend; "not a word, at least, regarding the matter both of us had on our hearts. But about fashion, parties, politics, he discoursed much more freely than was usual with him. He said I might have had Lord Ringwood's seat for Whipham but for my unfortunate politics. What made a Radical of me, he asked, who was naturally one of the most haughty of men (and that, I think, perhaps I am, says Phil, and a good many liberal fellows are)? I should calm down, he was sure—I should calm down, and be of the politics des hommes du monde."

Philip could not say to his father, "Sir, it is seeing you cringe before great ones that has set my own back up." There were countless points about which father and son could not speak; and an invisible, unexpressed, perfectly unintelligible mistrust, always was present when those two were tête-à-tête.

Their meal was scarce ended when entered to them Mr. Hunt, with his hat on. I was not present at the time, and can not speak as a certainty; but I should think at his ominous appearance Philip may have turned red and his father pale. "Now is the time," both, I dare say, thought; and the doctor remembered his stormy young days of foreign gambling, intrigue, and duel, when he was put on his ground before his adversary, and bidden, at a given signal, to fire. One, two, three! Each man's hand was armed with malice and murder. Philip had plenty of pluck for his part, but I should think on such an occasion might be a little nervous and fluttered, whereas his father's eye was keen, and his aim rapid and steady.

"You and Philip had a difference last night, Philip tells me," said the doctor.

"Yes, and I promised he should pay me," said the clergyman.

"And I said I should desire no better," says Mr. Phil.

"He struck his senior, his father's friend—a sick man, a clergyman," gasped Hunt.

"Were you to repeat what you did last night, I should repeat what I did," said Phil. "You insulted a good woman."

"It's a lie, Sir!" cries the other.

"You insulted a good woman, a lady in her own house, and I turned you out of it," said Phil.

"I say, again, it is a lie, Sir!" screams Hunt, with a stamp on the table.

"That you should give me the lie, or otherwise, is perfectly immaterial to me. But whenever you insult Mrs. Brandon, or any harmless woman in my presence, I shall do my best to chastise you," cries Philip of the red mustaches, curling them with much dignity.

"You hear him, Firmin?" says the parson.

"Faith, I do, Hunt!" says the physician; "and I think he means what he says, too."

"Oh! you take that line, do you?" cries Hunt of the dirty hands, the dirty teeth, the dirty neckcloth.

"I take what you call that line; and whenever a rudeness is offered to that admirable woman in my son's hearing, I shall be astonished if he does not resent it," says the doctor. "Thank you, Philip!"

The father's resolute speech and behavior gave Philip great momentary comfort. Hunt's words of the night before had been occupying the young man's thoughts. Had Firmin been criminal he could not be so bold.

"You talk this way in presence of your son? You have been talking over the matter together before?" asks Hunt.

"We have been talking over the matter before—yes. We were engaged on it when you came into breakfast," said the doctor. "Shall we go on with the conversation where we left it off?"

"Well, do—that is, if you dare," said the clergyman, somewhat astonished.

"Philip, my dear, it is ill for a man to hide his head before his own son; but if I am to speak—and speak I must one day or the other—why not now?"

"Why at all, Firmin?" asks the clergyman, astonished at the other's rather sudden resolve.

"Why? Because I am sick and tired of you, Mr. Tufton Hunt," cries the physician, in his most lofty manner, "of you and your presence in my house; your blackguard behavior and your rascal extortions—because you will force me to speak one day or the other—and now, Philip, if you like, shall be the day."

"Hang it, I say! Stop a bit!" cries the clergyman.

"I understand you want some more money from me."

"I did promise Jacobs I would pay him to-day, and that was what made me so sulky last night; and perhaps I took a little too much. You see my mind was out of order; and what's the use of telling a story that is no good to any one, Firmin—least of all to you?" cries the parson, darkly.

"Because, you ruffian, I'll bear with you no more," cries the doctor, the veins of his forehead swelling as he looks fiercely at his dirty adversary. "In the last nine months, Philip, this man has had nine hundred pounds from me."

"The luck has been so very bad, so bad, upon my honor, now," grumbles the parson.

"To-morrow he will want more; and the next day more; and the next day more; and, in fine, I won't live with this accursed Man of the Sea round my neck. You shall have the story; and Mr. Hunt shall sit by and witness against his own crime and mine. I had been very wild at Cambridge when I was a young man. I had quarreled with my father, lived with a dissipated set, and beyond my means; and had had my debts paid so often by your grandfather that I was afraid to ask for more. He was stern to me; I was not dutiful to him. I own my fault. Mr. Hunt can bear witness to what I say."

"I was in hiding at Margate, under a false name. You know the name."

"Yes, Sir, I think I know the name," Philip said, thinking he liked his father better now than he had ever liked him in his life, and sighing, "Ah, if he had always been frank and true with me!"

"I took humble lodgings with an obscure family. [If Dr. Firmin had a prodigious idea of his own grandeur and importance, you see I can not help it—and he was long held to be such a respectable man.] And there I found a young girl—one of the most innocent beings that ever a man played with and betrayed. Betrayed, I own it, Heaven forgive me! The crime has been the shame of my life, and darkened my whole career with misery. I got a man worse than myself, if that could be. I got Hunt for a few pounds, which he owed me, to make a sham marriage between me and poor Caroline. My money was soon gone. My creditors were after me. I fled the country, and I left her."

"A sham marriage! a sham marriage!" cries the clergyman. "Didn't you make me perform it by holding a pistol to my throat? A fellow won't risk transportation for nothing. But I owed him money for cards, and he had my bill, and he said he would let me off, and that's why I helped him. Never mind. I am out of the business now, Mr. Brummell Firmin, and you are in it. I have read the Act, Sir. The clergyman who performs the marriage is liable to punishment, if informed against within three years, and it's twenty years or more. But you, Mr. Brummell Firmin—your case is different, and you, my young gentleman, with the fiery whiskers, who strike down old men of a night—you may find some of us know how to revenge ourselves, though we are down." And with this, Hunt rushed to his greasy hat, and quitted the house, discharging imprecations at his hosts as he passed through the hall.

Son and father sate a while silent after the departure of their common enemy. At last the father spoke.

"This is the sword that has always been hanging over my head, and is now falling, Philip."

"What can the man do? Is the first marriage a good marriage?" asked Philip, with alarmed face.

"It is no marriage. It is void to all intents and purposes. You may suppose I have taken care to learn the law about that. Your legitimacy is safe, sure enough. But that man can ruin me, or nearly so. He will try to-morrow, if not to-day. As long as you or I can give him a guinea he will take it to the gambling-house. I had the mania on me myself once. My poor father quarreled with me in consequence, and died without seeing me. I married your mother—Heaven help her, poor soul! and forgive me for being but a harsh husband to her—with a view of mending my shattered fortunes. I wished she had been more happy, poor thing. But do not blame me utterly, Philip. I was desperate, and she wished for the marriage so much! I had good looks and high spirits in those days. People said so. [And here he glances obliquely at his own handsome portrait.] Now I am a wreck, a wreck!"

"I conceive, Sir, that this will annoy you; but how can it ruin you?" asked Philip.

"What becomes of my practice as a family physician? The practice is not now what it was, between ourselves, Philip, and the expenses greater than you imagine. I have made unlucky speculations. If you count upon much increase of wealth from me, my boy, you will be disappointed; though you were never mercenary, no, never. But the story bruited about by this rascal, of a physician of eminence engaged in two marriages, do you suppose my rivals won't hear it, and take advantage of it—my patients hear it, and avoid me?"

"Make terms with the man at once, then, Sir, and silence him."

"To make terms with a gambler is impossible. My purse is always there open for him to thrust his hand into when he loses. No man can withstand such a temptation. I am glad you have never fallen into it. I have quarreled with you sometimes for living with people below your rank: perhaps you were right, and I was wrong. I have liked, always did, I don't disguise it, to live with persons of station. And these, when I was at the University, taught me play and extravagance; and in the world haven't helped me much. Who would? Who would?" and the doctor relapsed into meditation.

A little catastrophe presently occurred, after which Mr. Philip Firmin told me the substance of this story. He described his father's long acquiescence in Hunt's demands, and sudden resistance to them, and was at a loss to account for the change. I did not tell my friend in express terms, but I fancied I could account for the change of behavior. Dr. Firmin, in his interviews with Caroline, had had his mind set at rest about one part of his danger. The doctor need no longer fear the charge of a double marriage. The Little Sister resigned her claims past, present, future.

If a gentleman is sentenced to be hung, I wonder is it a matter of comfort to him or not to know beforehand the day of the operation? Hunt would take his revenge. When and how?

Dr. Firmin asked himself. Nay, possibly, you will have to learn that this eminent practitioner walked about with more than danger hanging imminent over him. Perhaps it was a rope: perhaps it was a sword: some weapon of execution, at any rate, as we frequently may see. A day passes: no assassin darts at the doctor as he threads the dim opera-colonnade passage on his way to his club. A week goes by: no stiletto is plunged into his well-wadded breast as he steps from his carriage at some noble patient's door. Philip says he never knew his father more pleasant, easy, good-humored, and affable than during this period, when he must have felt that a danger was hanging over him of which his son at this time had no idea. I dined in Old Parr Street once in this memorable period (memorable it seemed to me from immediately subsequent events). Never was the dinner better served: the wine more excellent: the guests and conversation more gravely respectable than at this entertainment: and my neighbor remarked with pleasure how the father and son seemed to be on much better terms than ordinary. The doctor addressed Philip pointedly once or twice; alluded to his foreign travels; spoke of his mother's family—it was most gratifying to see the pair together. Day after day passes so. The enemy has disappeared. At least, the lining of his dirty hat is no longer visible on the broad marble table of Dr. Firmin's hall.

But one day—it may be ten days after the quarrel—a little messenger comes to Philip, and says, "Philip, dear, I am sure there is something wrong; that horrible Hunt has been here with a very quiet, soft-spoken old gentleman, and they have been going on with my poor pa about my wrongs and his—his, indeed!—and they have worked him up to believe that somebody has cheated his daughter out of a great fortune; and who can that somebody be but your father? And whenever they see me coming, papa and that horrid Hunt go off to the 'Admiral Byng:' and one night when pa came home he said, 'Bless you, bless you, my poor, innocent, injured child; and blessed you will be: mark a fond father's words!' They are scheming something against Philip and Philip's father. Mr. Bond the soft-spoken old gentleman's name is: and twice there has been a Mr. Walls to inquire if Mr. Hunt was at our house."

"Mr. Bond?—Mr. Walls?—A gentleman of the name of Bond was Uncle Twysden's attorney. An old gentleman, with a bald head, and one eye bigger than the other?"

"Well, this old man has one smaller than the other, I do think," says Caroline. "First man who came was Mr. Walls—a rattling young fashionable chap, always laughing, talking about theatres, operas, every thing—came home from the 'Byng' along with pa and his new friend—oh! I do hate him, that man, that Hunt!—then he brought the old man, this Mr. Bond. What are they scheming against you, Philip? I tell you this matter is all about you and your father."

Years and years ago, in the poor mother's lifetime, Philip remembered an outbreak of wrath on his father's part, who called Uncle Twysden a swindling miser, and this very Mr. Bond a scoundrel who deserved to be hung, for interfering in some way in the management of a part of the property which Mrs. Twysden and her sister inherited from their own mother. That quarrel had been made up, as such quarrels are. The brothers-in-law had continued to mistrust each other; but there was no reason why the feud should descend to the children; and Philip and his aunt, and one of her daughters at least, were on good terms together. Philip's uncle's lawyers engaged with his father's debtor and enemy against Dr. Firmin: the alliance boded no good.

"I won't tell you what I think, Philip," said the father. "You are fond of your cousin?"

"Oh! for ev—"

"Forever, of course! At least until we change our mind, or one of us grows tired, or finds a better mate."

"Ah, Sir!" cries Philip, but suddenly stops in his remonstrance.

"What were you going to say, Philip, and why do you pause?"

"I was going to say, father, if I might without offending, that I think you judge hardly of women. I know two who have been very faithful to you."

"And I a traitor to both of them. Yes; and my remorse, Philip, my remorse!" says his father, in his deepest tragedy voice, clutching his hand over a heart that I believed beat very coolly. But, pshaw! why am I, Philip's biographer, going out of the way to abuse Philip's papa? Is not the threat of bigamy and exposure enough to disturb any man's equanimity? I say again, suppose there is another sword—a rope if you will so call it—hanging over the head of our Damocles of Old Parr Street?..... Howbeit, the father and the son met and parted in these days with unusual gentleness and cordiality. And these were the last days in which they were to meet together. Nor could Philip recall without satisfaction, afterward, that the hand which he took was pressed and given with a real kindness and cordiality.

Why were these the last days son and father were to pass together? Dr. Firmin is still alive. Philip is a very tolerably prosperous gentleman. He and his father parted good friends, and it is the biographer's business to narrate how and wherefore. When Philip told his father that Messrs. Bond and Walls, his uncle Twysden's attorneys, were suddenly interested about Mr. Brandon and his affairs, the father instantly guessed, though the son was too simple as yet to understand how it was that these gentlemen interfered. If Mr. Brandon-Firmin's marriage with Miss Ringwood was null, her son was illegitimate, and her fortune went to her sister. Painful as such a duty might be to such tender-hearted people as our Twysden acquaintances to deprive a dear nephew of his fortune, yet, after all, duty is duty, and a parent must sacrifice every thing for justice and his own children. "Had I been in such a case," Talbot Twysden subsequently and repeatedly declared, "I should never have been easy a moment if I thought I possessed wrongfully a beloved nephew's property. I could not have slept in peace; I could not have shown my face at my own club, or to my own conscience, had I the weight of such an injustice on my mind." In a word, when he found that there was a chance of annexing Philip's share of the property to his own, Twysden saw clearly that his duty was to stand by his own wife and children.

The information upon which Talbot Twysden, Esq., acted was brought to him at his office by a gentleman in dingy black, who, after a long interview with him, accompanied him to his lawyer, Mr. Bond, before mentioned. Here, in South Square, Gray's Inn, the three gentlemen held a consultation, of which the results began quickly to show themselves. Messrs. Bond and Selby had an exceedingly lively, cheerful, jovial, and intelligent confidential clerk, who combined business and pleasure with the utmost affability, and was acquainted with a thousand queer things, and queer histories about queer people in this town; who lent money; who wanted money; who was in debt; and who was outrunning the constable; whose diamonds were in pawn; whose estates were over-mortgaged; who was over-building himself; who was casting eyes of longing at what pretty opera dancer—about races, fights, bill-brokers, quicquid agunt homines. This Tom Walls had a deal of information, and imparted it so as to make you die of laughing.

The Reverend Tufton Hunt brought this jolly fellow first to the "Admiral Byng," where his amiability won all hearts at the club. At the Byngs it was not very difficult to gain Captain Gann's easy confidence. And this old man was in the course of a very trifling consumption of rum and water, brought to see that his daughter had been the object of a wicked conspiracy, and was the rightful and most injured wife of a man who ought to declare her fair fame before the world and put her in possession of a portion of his great fortune.

A great fortune? How great a fortune? Was it three hundred thousand, say? Those doctors, many of them, had fifteen thousand a year. Mr. Walls (who perhaps knew better) was not at liberty to say what the fortune was: but it was a shame that Mrs. Brandon was kept out of her rights, that was clear.

Old Gann's excitement, when this matter was first broached to him (under vows of profound secrecy), was so intense that his old reason tottered on its rickety old throne. He well-nigh burst with longing to speak upon this mystery. Mr. and Mrs. Oves, the esteemed landlord and lady of the "Byng," never saw him so excited. He had a great opinion of the judgment of his friend, Mr. Ridley; in fact, he must have gone to Bedlam unless he had talked to somebody on this most nefarious transaction, which might make the blood of every Briton curdle with horror—as he was free to say.

Old Mr. Ridley was of a much cooler temperament, and altogether a more cautious person. The doctor rich? He wished to tell no secrets, nor to meddle in no gentleman's affairs: but he have heard very different statements regarding Dr. Firmin's affairs.

When dark hints about treason, wicked desertion, rights denied, "and a great fortune which you are kep out of, my poor Caroline, by a rascally wolf in sheep's clothing, you are; and I always mistrusted him, from the moment I saw him, and said to your mother, 'Emily, that Brandon is a bad fellow, Brandon is; and bitterly, bitterly I've rued ever receiving him under my roof.'" When speeches of this nature were made to Mrs. Caroline, strange to say, the little lady made light of them. "Oh, nonsense, pa! Don't be bringing that sad, old story up again. I have suffered enough from it already. If Mr. F. left me, he wasn't the only one who flung me away; and I have been able to live, thank mercy, through it all."

This was a hard hit, and not to be parried. The truth is, that when poor Caroline, deserted by her husband, had come back, in wretchedness, to her father's door, the man, and the wife who then ruled him, had thought fit to thrust her away. And she had forgiven them: and had been enabled to heap a rare quantity of coals on that old gentleman's head.

When the captain remarked his daughter's indifference and unwillingness to reopen this painful question of her sham marriage with Firmin, his wrath was moved, and his suspicion excited. "Ha!" says he, "have this man been a tampering with you again?"

"Nonsense, pa!" once more says Caroline. "I tell you it is this fine-talking lawyer's clerk has been tampering with you. You're made a tool of, pa! and you've been made a tool of all your life!"

"Well, now, upon my honor, my good Madam!" interposes Mr. Walls.

"Don't talk to me, Sir! I don't want any lawyers' clerks to meddle in my business!" cries Mrs. Brandon, very briskly. "I don't know what you're come about. I don't want to know, and I'm most certain it is for no good."

I suppose it was the ill success of his ambassador that brought Mr. Bond himself to Thornhaugh Street; and a more kind, fatherly little man never looked than Mr. Bond, although he may have had one eye smaller than the other. "What is this, my dear Madam, I hear from my confidential clerk, Mr. Walls?" he asked of the Little Sister. "You refuse to give him your confidence because he is only a clerk? I wonder whether you will accord it to me, as a principal?"

"She may, Sir, she may—every confidence!" says the captain, laying his hand on that snuffy satin waistcoat which all his friends so long admired on him. "She might have spoken to Mr. Walls."

"Mr. Walls is not a family man. I am. I have children at home, Mrs. Brandon, as old as you are," says the benevolent Bond. "I would have justice done them, and for you too."

"You're very good to take so much trouble about me all of a sudden, to be sure," says Mrs. Brandon, demurely. "I suppose you don't do it for nothing."

"I should not require much fee to help a good woman to her rights; and a lady I don't think needs much persuasion to be helped to her advantage," remarks Mr. Bond.

"That depends who the helper is."

"Well, if I can do you no harm, and help you possibly to a name, to a fortune, to a high place in the world, I don't think you need be frightened. I don't look very wicked or very artful, do I?"

"Many is that don't look so. I've learned as much as that about you gentlemen," remarks Mrs. Brandon.

"You have been wronged by one man, and doubt all."

"Not all. Some, Sir!"

"Doubt about me if I can by any possibility injure you. But how and why should I? Your good father knows what has brought me here. I have no secret from him. Have I, Mr. Gann, or Captain Gann, as I have heard you addressed?"

"Mr., Sir—plain Mr.—No, Sir; your conduct have been most open, honorable, and like a gentleman. Neither would you, Sir, do aught to disparage Mrs. Brandon; neither would I, her father. No ways, I think, would a parent do harm to his own child. May I offer you any refreshment, Sir?" and a shaky, a dingy, but a hospitable hand, is laid upon the glossy cupboard, in which Mrs. Brandon keeps her modest little store of strong waters.

"Not one drop, thank you! You trust me I think more than Mrs. Firm—I beg your pardon—Mrs. Brandon is disposed to do."

At the utterance of that monosyllable Firm Caroline became so white, and trembled so, that her interlocutor stopped, rather alarmed at the effect of his word—his word!—his syllable of a word.

The old lawyer recovered himself with much grace.

"Pardon me, Madam," he said; "I know your wrongs; I know your most melancholy history; I know your name, and was going to use it, but it seemed to renew painful recollections to you, which I would not needlessly recall.

Captain Gann took out a snuffy pocket-handkerchief, wiped two red eyes and a shirt-front, and winked at the attorney, and gasped in a pathetic manner.

"You know my story and name, Sir, who are a stranger to me. Have you told this old gentleman all about me and my affairs, pa?" asks Caroline, with some asperity. "Have you told him that my ma never gave me a word of kindness—that I toiled for you and her like a servant—and when I came back to you, after being deceived and deserted, that you and ma shut the door in my face? You did! you did! I forgive you; but a hundred thousand billion years can't mend that injury, father, while you broke a poor child's heart with it that day! My pa has told you all this, Mr. What's-your-name? I'm s'prised he didn't find something pleasanter to talk about, I'm sure!"

"My love!" interposed the captain.

"Pretty love! to go and tell a stranger in a public house, and ever so many there besides, I suppose, your daughter's misfortunes, pa. Pretty love! That's what I've had from you!"

"Not a soul, on the honor of a gentleman, except me and Mr. Walls."

"Then what do you come to talk about me at all for? and what scheme on hearth are you driving at? and what brings this old man here?" cries the landlady of Thornhaugh Street, stamping her foot.

"Shall I tell you frankly, my good lady? I called you Mrs. Firmin now because, on my honor and word, I believe such to be your rightful name—because you are the lawful wife of George Brand Firmin. If such be your lawful name, others bear it who have no right to bear it—and inherit property to which they can lay no just claim. In the year 1827 you, Caroline Gann, a child of sixteen, were married by a clergyman whom you know, to George Brand Firmin, calling himself George Brandon. He was guilty of deceiving you; but you were guilty of no deceit. He was a hardened and wily man; but you were an innocent child out of a school-room. And though he thought the marriage was not binding upon him, binding it is by Act of Parliament and judges' decision; and you are as assuredly George Firmin's wife, Madam, as Mrs. Bond is mine!"

"You have been cruelly injured, Caroline," says the captain, wagging his old nose over his handkerchief.

Caroline seemed to be very well versed in the law of the transaction. "You mean, Sir," she said, slowly, "that if me and Mr. Brandon was married to each other, he knowing that he was only playing at marriage, and me believing that it was all for good, we are really married?"

"Undoubtedly you are, Madam—my client has—that is, I have had advice on the point."

"But if we both knew that it was—was only a sort of a marriage—an irregular marriage, you know?"

"Then the Act says that to all intents and purposes the marriage is null and void."

"But you didn't know, my poor innocent child!" cries Mr. Gann. "How should you? How old was you? She was a child in the nursery, Mr. Bond, when the villain inveigled her away from her poor old father. She knew nothing of irregular marriages."

"Of course she didn't, the poor creature!" cries the old gentleman, rubbing his hands together with perfect good-humor. "Poor young thing, poor young thing!"

As he was speaking, Caroline, very pale and still, was sitting looking at Ridley's sketch of Philip, which hung in her little room. Presently she turned round on the attorney, folding her little hands over her work.

"Mr. Bond," she said, "girls, though they may be ever so young, know more than some folks fancy. I was more than sixteen when that—that business happened. I wasn't happy at home, and eager to get away. I knew that a gentleman of his rank wouldn't be likely really to marry a poor Cinderella out of a lodging-house, like me. If the truth must be told, I—I knew it was no marriage—never thought it was a marriage—not for good, you know."

And she folds her little hands together as she utters the words, and I dare say once more looks at Philip's portrait.

"Gracious goodness, Madam, you must be under some error!" cries the attorney. "How should a child like you know that the marriage was irregular?"

"Because I had no lines!" cries Caroline, quickly. "Never asked for none! And our maid we had then said to me, 'Miss Carry, where's your lines?' And it's no good without. And I knew it wasn't! And I'm ready to go before the Lord Chancellor to-morrow and say so!" cries Caroline, to the bewilderment of her father and her cross-examinant.

"Pause, pause! my good Madam!" exclaims the meek old gentleman, rising from his chair.

"Go and tell this to them as sent you, Sir!" cries Caroline, very imperiously, leaving the lawyer amazed, and her father's face in a bewilderment, over which he will fling his snuffy old pocket-handkerchief.

"If such is unfortunately the case—if you actually mean to abide by this astonishing confession, which deprives you of a high place in society—and—and casts down the hope we had formed of redressing your injured reputation—I have nothing for it! I take my leave, Madam. Good-morning, Mr. Hum—Mr. Gann!" And the old lawyer walks out of the Little Sister's room.

"She won't own to the marriage! She is fond of some one else—the little suicide!" thinks the old lawyer, as he clatters down the street to a neighboring house, where his anxious principal was in waiting. "She's fond of some one else!"

Yes. But the some one else whom Caroline loved was Brand Firmin's son; and it was to save Philip from ruin that the poor Little Sister chose to forget her marriage to his father.

CAPTAIN ALICANT.

ONE of the habitués of the Hominy House in the village of Hopskotch, New Jersey, was a short, thick-set, nubbly old gentleman, who had once followed the sea, and was in consequence called Captain Alicant. He inhabited a snug little cottage in the environs of Hopskotch, and spent a portion of each day in the bar-room of the Hominy House. I have described the Hominy and its landlord ere this in Harper's Monthly.

VOL. XXIII.—No. 133.—H

That majestic General Dubbley, with the green hair and the painfully imposing manner; that melancholy establishment, with an old revolutionary matron in a back-room always making tea, and who might on occasion be caught smoking a clay pipe.

There was nothing very prepossessing in either Hopskotch or its hotel to draw me there so often, but the scenery in the neighborhood was fresh and pleasant. Not far from the village the Passaic, as yet a tiny stream, wandered through wooded valleys and formed large calm pools, where the laughing country boys bathed in the hot summer days. The land was broken into green swelling slopes which were crowned by rich crests of wood, where one might hear high up amidst the trees the whirr of the wood-pigeons' wings as they fled before intrusion. A few stray woodcocks were to be found in the summer, feeding on the succulent margins of the little river; and there was a tradition of rattlesnakes having an abiding place on a certain stony hill not far from the village. So you see Hopskotch was not without its attractions. I liked the place well enough. It was calm and stolid, and old General Dubbley did not talk enough to bore one. But if I was tired of the General's description of the way in which he received Lafayette, or the reminiscences of the revolutionary matron in the back parlor, who was continually recording the fact of her having put a gun into the hand of her youngest son to go to Lexington with, I wandered off among the peach orchards with which the neighborhood abounded, and watched the orioles and the blackbirds, or superintended the drunken revels of large blue-bottles as they boozed upon the juice of the fallen and fermenting fruit.

Captain Alicant, as I said before, was a regular visitor at the Hominy House. He was a hard, weather-beaten old fellow, with such bad sight that he had to be led to the house by a boy and led back home again. But he never would acknowledge that he was blind. He used to sit in the window and gravely comment on the aspect of the outer landscape which he never saw, and criticise the appearance of neighbors of whose presence he was aware only by their voices.

The Captain was always accompanied by Punch. Not that I mean he carried a supply of the seductive but stimulating beverage of that name continually about with him, but his invariable companion was a Skye terrier similarly christened; a sort of animated muff on legs; a quaint bundle of hair with large pleading eyes, affectionate heart, and a tendency to get continually into disgrace. Punch, I regret to say, got into more disgrace on my account than on any other. I think I must have been his first love, for the day he met me he formed an attachment for me that was a source of unceasing annoyance to the Captain. He from that moment forward became a vagabond dog. He would not sleep home of nights, but would trot down at unearthly hours to the hotel, and sit whining and scratching at the door until I got up and let him in, when he would creep guiltily under my bed and sleep happy and contented until morning. The Captain was wounded at this display of affection for a stranger; and although he was too polite a man to mention the matter to me, his vows of vengeance on poor Punch for his derelictions were frightful. He had been, when at sea, seized off Tangier, and sold into slavery once himself; and I could gather from hints he let drop that he often meditated inflicting some such punishment on the traitor terrier; discovering some cruel and piratical dog-merchant, and consigning the unhappy Punch to all the horrors of servitude and starvation.

The ostensible object of Captain Alicant's daily visits to the Hominy House was the purchase of a certain piece of land which the General was very anxious to dispose of, and on the verge of which purpose the Captain had hovered for the last ten years. Every day the General, in a magnificently indifferent manner, brought the matter up, and every day the Captain graciously entertained the scheme and indicated a final answer on the morrow. Then followed a scheme for a villa to be built—for Alicant was rich, and old Dubbley was in consequence deferential to him—improvements to be made, drains to be cut, vistas to be opened, shrubs to be planted: all of which visionary schemes were gravely discussed and the pair parted. One satisfied that the land was as good as sold, and the other that he had bought it.

There was one other subject on which the Captain invariably entered—always abusing himself for his weakness while he did so, but dwelling upon it in so fond and prolonged a manner that I could see his heart was in it.

Captain Alicant had an only son, who, at the age of nineteen, had committed a grave error; and, to avoid facing the ill-nature and scandal-mongering of that wretched village, he ran away from home, and had never been heard from since. I had never seen him, but report described him as a tall, rosy-cheeked, lithe-limbed young fellow, full of spirits and good-nature, and a general favorite with all the girls of the neighborhood. After he had slipped up, a number of persons were to be found who had always thought that there was something bad in his eye. His mouth and its expression were discovered to be indicative of criminality; and what had long passed for a fresh, attractive joyousness of manner, was now proven to be the first symptoms of the showy recklessness of bearing which invariably accompanies abandoned criminality.

To all appearance, Arthur Alicant had no more deadly enemy than his father. The old gentleman was furious that his honest name, preserved as it had been by the salt of every sea on the globe, should be given as a sport to the world.

"The scoundrel!" he would say, savagely, when talking about it at the Hominy House, "I hope he's dead. As long as he lives I'm not safe. He'll turn up in some place or other as a thief or a murderer, and then we'll have an Ali-cant hung. That will be a pretty morsel for the papers, won't it? The son of Captain Alicant, with a full genealogy of the family, and the victim's dying speech, in which he alludes to his father—curse him!"

"There was no excuse for him, Captain—none whatever," solemnly exclaims General Dubbley, the brute, who would have burned his mother alive, I verily believe, to serve his own interests. "If a young man can't see his own interests, why, let him go—that's what I say. Honesty is the best policy, Captain, in the long-run; and you remember what I say."

And the General concluded with a puff, as if an abscess of original thought had just then burst in his brain, and he felt all the better for having it off of his mind.

"Give me another glass of that apple-jack, General," continues old Alicant, oblivious of the other's obsequious morality, "and don't put much water in it. I can't think what spell that villain can have thrown over Rose that she thinks so much of him. She always defends him. In my very teeth, Sir! She says that his fault was only a piece of youthful folly; that I ought to search for him, and bring him back. What do you think of that, Dubbley?"

"Miss Rose is a foolish young girl, Captain. She don't know what she's after."

"She's not foolish, Sir!" cries the Captain, instantly firing up. "She's one of the cleverest girls, Sir, that I ever cast eyes on. There's not her match in the parish, Sir. But," he continues, moderating his tone, for he occasionally perceives his inconsistencies, "she's in love with him, General. That's it. There's no accounting for women. But I'd rather see her dead and buried than married to such a scamp as that."

"He mayn't be alive, Captain. You ha'n't heard from him for four years," says the old heartless humbug, who is so blind as not to know that a father's heart is never dead to hope.

"That's true, Dubbley, that's true," answers Alicant, in a queer throaty kind of voice. "He's dead mayhap. Well, with all his faults he was a handsome fellow, wasn't he, Dubbley? Damn that dog! where is he? Punch, here, Punch! I'll hang him when I catch him; if I don't may I be ——! Dubbley, give me another glass of that apple-jack; and mind, don't put much water in it."

The Captain drinks his toddy in a stormy manner; but I, who am standing close to him, can swear that I see tears falling into the tumbler.

The following winter I had occasion to go to Hopskotch on business. It was one of the hardest seasons that we had had for many years. All landmarks were blotted out. Little more could be seen of the smaller farm-houses than their chimneys. Boys and girls rode in their rough sleighs across country, merrily dashing over the buried fences and fields. Apple-trees in the orchards were just able to thrust a few bare struggling top branches over the great white sea in which they were submerged, like a drowning swimmer who, in his last agony, throws up his hands before he goes down. Snow-birds were flittering along the edges of the barn-yards, pursued by boys with inefficient guns, which it required ten minutes to load, five minutes to cock, one minute to pull, and half a minute to go off—which, as you may imagine, was all the better for the snow-birds.

At his usual hour, of course, I beheld Captain Alicant drive up in his sleigh to the door of the Hominy House, in order, doubtless, to complete the purchase of the land for which he had been in negotiation so long. I should, perhaps, have said that the Captain was driven, because the reins of the sleigh were held by a pair of tiny hands nestled into large fur driving-gloves, like birds creeping into moss warmed by the sun; and the hands belonged to a sweet, innocent face, with merry blue eyes, to which long black eyelashes just gave a dash of sadness; and face and hands and eyes, to say nothing of a little mouth that was absurdly small and beautiful, all belonged to Miss Rose Alicant, the grand-niece of the old rover of the seas, who would not buy Dubbley's land, and who would drink his apple-jack.

I had heard of Rose before. She was a sort of good fairy to the neighborhood. She used to drive about to poor people's houses, and always had something in her pony-wagon to give them that made them feel better. A piece of beef for Christmas, or a turkey that she had raised herself. I don't mean that these things were given as charities. Oh no! She gave them as delicately as you, reader, would send a specimen pair of capons from your farm to a friend. To be sure she might have got a greater reputation if she had gone about giving tracts instead of turkeys; but, somehow, she did not run to tracts—and yet she taught Sunday-school assiduously, and was the pet of the clergyman.

As soon as her grandfather was safely housed under the protecting roof of the gorgeous Dubbley, Miss Rose gave a flourish of her whip over the black pony, and off she glided on some one of her good-natured missions, with Punch seated on the cushion, barking recklessly, and entering into the rollicksomeness of sleighing with an almost human enjoyment.

The sky all day was dull and lowering. As it wore on those thick, heavy, determined flakes of snow began to fall that are so eloquent of a coming storm. The wind rose too, and drove them before it like so many white pigeons blown through the sky in time of Equinox; and by the time that Miss Rose again appeared in her sleigh to drive the old Captain home—the very moment, too, when he thought that he was just about completing his purchase—the air was thick with snow, and the wind howled and tore round corners, and rooted up every thing in its way, as if the demoniac swine of the Bible had been again let loose and were galloping about the world.

The night came on, and it was awful! The weird noises of limbs cracking from the trees filled the air with terror. The snow was driven here and there and every where by the storm, and was so buffeted that it oozed in through the cracks in the window-sashes, and when once inside melted and died. It seemed as if there came down the hills of heaven innumerable and gigantic coursers, wild as the horses of Scythia, with a mad rush, and tramping, and snorting, and shrieks that split the night. I think old Dubbley was frightened; for I heard him get out of bed and go down to the bar-room, and I feel positive that his mission was to get some apple-jack to keep his courage up. But down at the old Captain's another scene was acting. I heard all about it a few days after.

He and Rose had gone to bed. The storm still howled, and they could not sleep. Their rooms adjoined, and presently the Captain heard Rose's voice calling at his bedroom door.

"Well, child!" growled out the old Triton, "you're frightened, are you? Oh, go to bed; there's no fear!"

"No, grandpa, I'm not frightened; only poor Punch is howling outside the hall-door, and you have the key, and I want to let him in."

"Let him stay there, hang him, and freeze!" swore the Captain. "He's always going down to the Hominy House after that New Yorker there—that Massy. Let him stay where he is. I won't let him in!"

"Oh, grandpa, you will! The poor doggy! so affectionate, so fond of you and me! And he was so fond of poor Arthur! Oh, do give me the key, grandpa!"

"What's Arthur got to do with it? You're always talking about that scamp and bringing him in on every occasion. If Arthur himself was there I wouldn't open the door."

"But, grandpa, you must!" She knew her influence, and used it when necessary. "If you don't, I'll—I'll—" Here Rose did not exactly see any alternative; but before she could hit upon one the Captain, who always kept the house-key under his pillow, threw it toward the door, saying,

"There!—you always have your way. Let the varmint in; but mind, don't let him come, all wet and draggled, into my room. If you do, I'll hang him in the morning."

Rose vanished with the key. In less than a minute she was back breathless, panting, almost convulsed in her eagerness to speak.

"Grandpa, grandpa! For God's sake get up. There's a man lost in the snow. Oh! do get up."

"Why, child, you are going crazy. What man? What's it all about?"

"Look, grandpa, look at this! Punch brought this neckhandkerchief in his mouth to the door, and he won't come in, but keeps running backward and forward and moaning like any thing, and I know that there's some one lost in the snow."

"By Jove, it looks like it!" cried the Captain, now thoroughly aroused. "Rose, call the boy, and tell him to get a lantern. I'll go and look myself."

"Oh! don't pa; you know your sight isn't good, and—"

"My sight not good. Bosh! It's as good as it ever was. I tell you I'll go myself with Tom."

"And me also, dear grandpa."

In a few minutes all was ready. Tom, the stable-servant, appeared with his lantern, and the Captain, when he descended, found Punch at the door in a state of frenzied delight at seeing the preparations for departure. He barked, and jumped, and ran a little way into the snow, and then returned, looking like a combination of bear-skin and ermine, he was so snowy and so shaggy; and when at last the exploration party set out he sobered down somewhat, and ran a few paces ahead, looking back now and again to see that he was followed. It was hard walking that night, I tell you; but, fortunately, Punch's field of discovery was not far distant. Not a hundred yards from the cottage the light of the lantern fell on a black object lying in the snow, and Punch barking round it like mad.

It was a young man, ragged and pale and quite insensible. Rose, thoughtful as women always are, had brought along some of the Captain's choice old Jamaica, and poured it down the poor fellow's throat. By this means they managed to revive and stagger him along to the cottage. A fire was lit in the parlor. Plenty of hot bottles, and hot toddies, and all sort of hot things were provided by the cook and Rose, and at last the poor frozen wretch opened his eyes and gasped some inarticulate syllables. Rose, in order to hear what he said, stooped down with the candle in her hand, and put her ear close to his lips. Then she turned and looked at him for a moment. Then gave a wild shriek and fainted.

Here was a mess. The poor old Captain was bewildered. The cook and Tom ran and came and brought salad-oil for smelling salts, and generally misconducted themselves. The Captain, distracted with two patients, knelt down by Rose and chafed her temples. While doing so he felt a touch on his shoulder. A tall, gaunt, white-faced young man was standing over him. His voice was feeble and broken, but still the Captain heard him say,

"Father, let me try and revive her. I know she will come to if I touch her hand."

"Arthur!"

"It is I, father; will you—will—you—?"

There was no answer to the timid question, but with one long sob of joy the father clasped the son in his arms, and in that moment all was forgiven.

The ensuing summer I went down again to Hopskotch with a valise containing my nobbiest dress suit. I was to wear it on the occasion of Arthur's wedding with Rose, to which I had a special invitation. The bridegroom, in spite of his many hardships and pilgrimages—and he had suffered to starvation—was looking as joyous as a bobolink; and as to Rose, she was maddeningly bewitching. After the wedding I created a great sensation by solemnly decorating Punch with a collar made specially for the purpose, and bearing—as an allusion to his intelligence and affection in discovering the poor vagrant in the snow—the inscription, "Il attend toujours."

General Dubbley was highly indignant at not being asked to the wedding; but I confess I never thought so much of Captain Alicant's sense as on that occasion.

AUDIENCE OF THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

IN the month of December, 1854, I was sent from Paris to Madrid to deliver to Mr. Soulé a copy of Mr. Marcy's reply to the celebrated Ostend dispatch.

The journey so far as Bayonne is a very easy one, being at present performed entirely by rail. At that time there was a short interruption toward its southern extremity, where you were compelled to take the diligence for a few hours. From Bayonne to the Spanish capital I traveled by the Malle Poste—a miserable, dilapidated, rickety carriage, with accommodations for only two passengers. We were some seventy-six hours on the road, and esteemed ourselves fortunate that we reached our destination at all without serious accident. We were not robbed, nor even attacked, although we met at Vittoria the passengers of a diligence who had had a serious encounter with banditti. It is true that we upset twice, both times at night; but as no one suffered any thing more than slight contusions, we felt that, considering the condition of the road, we had every reason to be thankful. The cold was intense, and we had the full benefit of it, as there was not a window in our crazy vehicle which could be securely closed. I had a good provision of shawls and wrappers, which proved, however, so insufficient that one evening, while we stopped at a post-house to change horses, I ran into a small posada attached to it and bought the blankets off one of the beds.

I found Mr. Soulé quite alone at Madrid, all his family being absent in the south of France. My original intention was to limit my stay to three days; circumstances prolonged it to as many weeks. At the end of that time I returned with Mr. Soulé's resignation of his mission in my pocket.

I can never sufficiently acknowledge the cordiality and kindness with which I was received by that accomplished gentleman. It would be out of place here to enter into any discussion of his political principles or his diplomatic career. But I can not refrain from saying, that a more delightful companion, or a more thorough-bred man of the world, it has never been my fortune to meet. I was always made welcome as a guest at his table, and his carriage was at my disposal all the time of my stay. The life he led at that time was a singularly quiet and domestic one; he seldom left his house unless called out by public business. His relations with the Court were, as they always had been, most friendly and intimate; and if he was not liked by the aristocracy and the press, at all events they respected his courage. While he was away from Spain the previous summer the newspapers assailed him, day after day, with the bitterest abuse and with the most violent threats, in case he should ever dare show himself again in Madrid. As soon as he returned they became as silent as the grave, and up to the time of his final departure he was never again annoyed one instant, either by word or act.

One afternoon I drove with him over the Toledo Bridge to the ground of his famous duel with M. Turgot, the particulars of which he explained to me upon the spot. A perfect reconciliation never took place between the combatants. It will be recollected that M. Turgot was severely wounded in the thigh, and rendered a cripple for life. For a long time he was confined to his bed, and when I saw him he moved about painfully on crutches. Many months after the occurrence Mr. Soulé had occasion to call upon Señor Luzuriaga, the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Minister happened to be occupied at the moment, and Mr. Soulé was conducted to the ante-chamber to wait until he should be disengaged. There he found, in solitary possession, his old adversary, M. Turgot, whom he had not met since they left the battle-field. No recognition took place between them, and the meeting must have been awkward and embarrassing to both parties.

A very intelligent American gentleman, who has resided a number of years in Madrid, explained to me his theory of the origin of the difficulty, which struck me as extremely plausible. It was as follows: That considerable unpopularity had preceded Mr. Soulé to Spain in consequence of his supposed views in reference to the island of Cuba. That he came there a Frenchman of humble birth, who had left his country at an early age on account of his extreme political opinions, to represent a republic of which he had become an adopted citizen. That he found there, as ambassador from Imperial France, a nobleman of ancient lineage, whose family had for centuries been identified with the elder Bourbons, and who had himself but recently left the legitimist ranks. The result was what perhaps might have been naturally expected. From the moment that they came together M. Turgot exhibited a prejudice which he seemed to be unable to control or conceal. If Mr. Soulé had been an American instead of a Frenchman, this prejudice would probably not have existed at all, or if it had it would have been very much less decided. As it was, it manifested itself in a continuous series of petty slights, each too insignificant to be formally taken notice of, but in the aggregate galling in the extreme. Nor did the annoyance stop here. Others took their cue from the ambassador of France, so that the American Minister's social position soon became a very uncomfortable one. Mr. Soulé was not the man to brook this sort of thing long. And when he fought M. Turgot, his object was probably as much to right himself generally with society, and earn its respect and fear, if not its love, as to resent the particular insult which brought about the issue. I do not state the above to be positively the case, but it is the surmise of a keen observer of the circumstances at the time.

Some ten days after my arrival Mr. Soulé had occasion to request an audience of the Queen for the purpose of presenting an autograph letter from the President of the United States condoling with her Majesty upon the loss of some relative. He was good enough to say that he desired me to accompany him upon the occasion. I objected that I had no uniform, which I presumed to be an insuperable difficulty in the way of my admission to the royal presence. But he assured me that I need not concern myself on that account; that he would undertake to overcome all such impediments.

It happened that some time intervened before an official note of reply fixing an appointment came from the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The excuse was, that the Queen had been indisposed for some days. On calling at Mr. Soulé's residence one morning he informed me that he was to go to the Palace that evening at seven o'clock, and notified me to be in readiness half an hour previously. I accordingly returned to my hotel, and at the proper hour equipped myself in evening costume, white cravat and black gloves, the Court being still in mourning. Mr. Soulé had an engagement to dine that evening with Lord Howden, the British Ambassador. He wrote a note of excuse, stating that he had received her Majesty's commands to present himself at the Palace. His lordship replied that he should not excuse him, but wait dinner until midnight if he did not come sooner.

At a quarter before seven o'clock we entered the carriage and drove to the Palace, which, as is generally known, is situated at one extremity of the city, and directly over the Manzanares. Mr. Soulé wore the costume which has been so frequently described, and which became him exceedingly well. The Madrid palace is a very elegant structure, but only one-eighth of the size of the plan originally projected. I have seen most of the royal residences of Europe, and I do not think that any of them contain a finer apartment than the throne-room at Madrid.

On arriving at the Palace we entered a large vestibule paved with marble, flush with the carriage-way in front. Here we found an imposing array of military on guard—there seemed to be at least half a regiment. I never saw any thing like the numbers at any other Court. As we passed them we uncovered, and they saluted us with a clang of their muskets, which might have been heard a quarter of a mile off. Turning to the right we commenced ascending, hat in hand, a noble staircase. When we reached the first landing a body of halberdiers stationed there rang their halberds upon the stone tiles with deafening emphasis. Bowing slightly, we proceeded up the return flight. Here we found more halberdiers, who did precisely as their companions had done below. We then entered a door on the left hand, and found ourselves in a spacious ante-chamber filled with officials in uniform, but without side-arms, thereby indicating the inferiority of their rank. These personages bowed to us in the most deferential manner; but I could not avoid observing that my plain black coat was attracting attention, and I began to feel decidedly uncomfortable. Maintaining our dignity by rather haughty and condescending salutations, we moved on into another room, very like the previous one, except that it was crowded with officers of superior rank with side-arms. It was evident that matters were arranged upon the principle of a theatrical climax. Hence we emerged into the so-called "Embassador's Waiting Room," which far excelled in size all the apartments through which we had reached it. It is here that the corps diplomatique are summoned when a royal heir or heiress is expected to make its appearance. Tedious hours are sometimes spent there on such occasions. As soon as the baby is born it is brought in and exhibited to the assembled Ministers, who thereupon give their attestation to the birth with due formality.

We moved up slowly to the farther extremity of the room, and stationed ourselves to the right of a closed door. Opposite to us stood about a dozen of the highest grandes of Spain, headed by the diminutive Duke of Medina Celi, all in gorgeous array, blazing with stars and orders. They had just come from an audience with the Queen. A moment afterward the little nobleman above named crossed over with solemn deliberation, and facing Mr. Soulé, bowed to the very ground with a gravity I never saw equaled even on the stage. He then turned to me, and saluted me with considerable less formality. All the others in turn went through the same performance one at a time. I would have given any thing to be able to give vent to the laughter which was convulsing me internally. Presently there advanced toward us a brisk, fidgety personage with gray hairs. He proved to be the "Introducer of Embassadors," or, as he would be elsewhere called, the Chambellan. Tapping a gold snuff-box, he opened the lid and presented a pinch to my chief, behind whom I was standing at the distance of a step or two. "I am glad to see you well, Mr. Soulé," he commenced, presenting his hand. "Your audience is, I think, at seven o'clock, and I believe her Majesty is ready to receive you."

During these remarks his eyes kept wandering upon me and scanning me from head to foot.

"But, Mr. Soulé," he resumed with a little hesitation, "you assuredly do not expect this gentleman to accompany you."

"I beg your pardon, I certainly do," interrupted Mr. Soulé; "this gentleman is Secretary of Legation at Paris [I was so ad interim]; he has come to me with very important dispatches, and for the present is attached to my Legation. There are very peculiar reasons why I am anxious that he should have the opportunity of seeing her Majesty."

"It is quite impossible, my dear Sir, quite impossible. There are two insuperable objections. In the first place, no audience has been requested for him; and, in the next place, he is not in uniform. It is only the other day that the French Embassador wished to present a gentleman connected with the diplomacy of his country who was in uniform, but for whom an audience had not been asked, and he was not allowed to do so."

"Nothing," answered Mr. Soule, "would be further from my wish than to intentionally violate the etiquette of Her Majesty's Court. This gentleman is only not in uniform because he left Paris in great haste and brought none with him. He returns there in a day or two. As I have already said, I have special motives for wishing him to see the Queen, and under the circumstances I must request you to take her Majesty's personal commands upon the subject."

There was no answering this, so the unfortunate Chambellan bowed with a rueful countenance, and went to refer the matter to the tribunal of last resort.

As soon as the door closed upon him Mr. Soulé took my arm, and he slowly paced up and down the room. "It is all right now," he whispered to me; "the Queen is the best-natured person in the world, and I am sure that she will not turn you away."

His prophecy proved correct, for presently the "Introducer of Embassadors" returned, and with an expression of face as if some dire misfortune had befallen the Spanish monarchy, said that Her Majesty consented to receive us both.

Thereupon he preceded us through a passage-way to the open door of a moderately-sized drawing-room, upon the threshold of which he bowed profoundly and then backed himself out of sight.

As we entered by this door Isabella II. entered by another door from the diagonal corner. The movement seemed to be a simultaneous one. I was a little behind Mr. Soulé on the right. The instant he perceived the Queen he bowed to the floor, and I followed suit. At the same moment down came Her Majesty in the way that school girls call making a cheese. One step with each foot, and the ceremony was repeated on both sides. And so on some six or seven times until we met at a marble table in the centre of the room. Mr. Soulé then, holding the President's letter in his hand, commenced in a low tone a very fluent and elegant little speech in French, at the conclusion of which he laid the letter upon the table. While this was going on, the Queen stood with her right hand resting upon the table with a look which indicated plainly that she considered such business a bore. I had an ample opportunity for taking mental notes of her appearance. Now if my impression was not a flattering one it was at least unprejudiced, and I must sacrifice gallantry to truth.

"The Innocent Isabel," as she was styled in her youth, is considerably above the average stature of her sex, and is of ample dimensions every way. Her forehead is low, and her nose and chin unmistakably Bourbon. She wore a black dress very décolletée, but not more so than is common among fashionable ladies, and the charms which it partly concealed were evidently of ponderous proportions. Upon her hands, which are very large and which looked swollen, she wore lace mitts, not gloves, leaving the fingers bare. Her whole skin was red, and had the appearance of being affected with some cutaneous disorder, which I have understood is the case. I certainly did not fall in love with Her Majesty at first sight. I have heard others declare her handsome; but there is nothing as to which there is a greater difference of opinion than female beauty.

At the conclusion of Mr. Soulé's address she replied at less length in remarkably good French, but with a decidedly Spanish accent. When she had finished she drew a little sigh and paused a moment, and then abruptly asked in a much louder voice, and with a total change of manner,

"Well, Mr. Soulé, and how is Madame Soulé?"

"She was very well, your Majesty, when I last heard from her. She is in the French Pyrenees."

"I thought she could not be in Madrid, for I have missed her for some time. When you next write to her remember me to her. Ah! Mr. Soulé, neither I nor my mother will ever forget your kindness during those horrible days of June."

I can not say here that the Queen's eyes were literally suffused with tears, but both her face and countenance indicated considerable emotion. Her manner during the above dialogue had been as familiar as that of any well-bred person in society. In her last remark she alluded to the revolution of the previous June, when Christina's life was in danger, and when Mr. Soulé alone of the corps diplomatique offered her the protection of his house and flag.

Before any thing further was said Mr. Soulé very kindly turned to me and called me to her attention, apologizing for having brought me with him in so unceremonious a manner, but explaining that as I might not very improbably see the President before very long, he was desirous that her Majesty might avail herself of the opportunity to send to him any verbal message she might desire. She smiled, and gave me a commission which I will not here repeat, but which was full of kind and friendly feeling. She then asked me how much longer I expected to remain in Madrid. I answered not more than three days, as I had already overstaid my time. "Oh," she replied, "you must certainly stay for the ball next Wednesday. Do you know, Mr. Soulé, it is the first really gala ball I have had since I have been on the throne?"

"I should be most happy to stay, your Majesty, but in the first place I have no uniform."

"Oh, Mr. Soulé will arrange that, will you not, Mr. Soulé?"

"Certainly, your Majesty."

"But then there is another difficulty. I am for the moment in the public service, and my instructions were to return to Paris the moment my business was accomplished."

"Now," she continued, with a smile, "if you were a subject of mine I would command you to stay. But you American gentlemen are a self-willed and independent race. Still I presume that if you will not obey my orders, you will Mr. Soulé's. Mr. Soulé, please order him to stay."

"I order you, Sir, to obey her Majesty's commands."

I bowed and said I would—but I didn't.

After this badinage there followed a pause of sufficient length to indicate that the audience was at an end. Perceiving this Mr. Soulé backed a step and bowed as he had done on entering. I ditto. Majesty ditto. And so we kept it up facing each other all the time, until at last both parties disappeared at the same moment through their respective doors.

When we again found ourselves in the ambassador's waiting-room, there was the old Chambellan, who evidently belonged to that genus of fossils who believe that a breach of etiquette is sufficient to make the firmament fall. Coming up to me, he affectionately put his arm round my neck and said:

"Do you know, Sir, that an exception has this evening been made in your favor, which I venture to say has never been made before in the history of the Spanish Monarchy! I am confident that no person was ever presented before to a Spanish Sovereign without being dressed in uniform."

I put on an air of offended dignity, as if piqued at the impediments he had originally thrown in my way, and replied: "I acknowledge that the compliment was a great one, but I can appropriate no portion of it to myself. It all belongs to my minister. I counted for nothing in Her Majesty's condescension. She did not even know my name."

"Well," he replied, "it was a compliment to both;" but I stuck to my original proposition, in which, of course, I was entirely right.

"Do you know," he resumed, "that we are going to have a grand ball at the Palace on Wednesday, when the Court goes out of mourning? You must stay for it."

"I am much obliged to you," I answered, "but I have already received an invitation from the highest source—from Her Majesty herself. If any thing could induce me to remain for the fête, it would be her gracious request that I would do so."

Thereupon the old gentleman had nothing further to say, except that he hoped he should see me there.

We shook hands with him and commenced our egress, which was accomplished in the same manner as our entrance had been. When we got outside the abode of royalty Mr. Soulé went to his dinner-party and I went home.

ON BEING FOUND OUT.

WHEN I was a boy at a small private and preparatory school for young gentlemen, I remember the wiseacre of a master ordering us all, one night, to march into a little garden at the back of the house, and thence to proceed, one by one, into a tool or hen house (I was but a tender little thing just put into short clothes, and can't exactly say whether the house was for tools or hens), and in that house to put our hands into a sack which stood on a bench, a candle burning beside it. I put my hand into the sack. My hand came out quite black. I went and joined the other boys in the school-room; and all their hands were black too.

By reason of my tender age I could not understand what was the meaning of this night-excursion—this candle, this tool-house, this bag of soot. I think we little boys were taken out of our sleep to be brought to the ordeal. We came, then, and showed our little hands to the master; washed them or not—most probably, I should say, not—and so went bewildered back to bed.

Something had been stolen in the school that day; and Mr. Wiseacre having read in a book of an ingenious method of finding out a thief by making him put his hand into a sack (which, if guilty, the rogue would shirk from doing), all we boys were subjected to the trial. Goodness knows what the lost object was, or who stole it. We all had black hands to show to the master. And the thief, whoever he was, was not Found Out that time.

I wonder if the rascal is alive—an elderly scoundrel he must be by this time; and a hoary old hypocrite, to whom an old school-fellow presents his kindest regards—parenthetically remarking what a dreadful place that private school was; cold, chilblains, bad dinners, not enough victuals, and caning awful! Are you alive still, I say, you nameless villain, who escaped discovery on that day of crime? I hope you have escaped often since, old sinner. Ah, what a lucky thing it is, for you and me, my man, that we are not found out in all our peccadilloes; and that our backs can slip away from the master and the cane!

Just consider what life would be, if every rogue was found out, and flogged coram populo! What a butchery, what an indecency, what an endless swishing of the rod! Don't cry out about my misanthropy. My good friend Mealy-mouth, I will trouble you to tell me, do you go to church? When there, do you say, or do you not, that you are a miserable sinner? and saying so, do you believe or disbelieve it? If you are a M. S., don't you deserve correction, and aren't you grateful if you are to be let off? I say again, what a blessed thing it is that we are not all found out!

Just picture to yourself every body who does wrong being found out, and punished accordingly. Fancy all the boys in all the school being whipped, and then the assistants, and then the master. Fancy the provost-marshal being tied up, having previously superintended the correction of the whole army. After the young gentlemen have had their turn for their faulty exercises, fancy a Doctor of Divinity being taken up for certain faults in his sermon. After the clergyman has cried his peccavi, suppose we hoist up a bishop, and give him a couple of dozen! The butchery is too horrible. The hand drops powerless, appalled at the quantity of birch which it must cut and brandish. I am glad we are not all found out, I say again; and protest, my dear brethren, against our having our deserts.

To fancy all men found out and punished is bad enough; but imagine all women found out in the distinguished social circle in which you and I have the honor to move. Is it not a mercy that a many of these fair criminals remain unpunished and undiscovered? There is Mrs. Longbow, who is forever practicing, and who shoots poisoned arrows too; when you meet her you don't call her liar, and charge her with the wickedness she has done and is doing? There is Mrs. Painter, who passes for a most respectable woman, and a model in society. There is no use in saying what you really know regarding her and her goings on. There is Diana Hunter—what a little, haughty prude it is! and yet we know stories about her which are not altogether edifying. I say it is best, for the sake of the good, that the bad should not all be found out. You don't want your children to know the history of that lady in the next box, who is so handsome, and whom they admire so? Ah me, what would life be if we were all found out, and punished for all our faults? Jack Ketch would be in permanence; and then who would hang Jack Ketch?

They talk of murderers being pretty certainly found out. Pshaw! I have heard an authority awfully competent vow and declare that scores and hundreds of murders are committed, and nobody is the wiser. That terrible man mentioned one or two ways of committing murder, which he maintained were quite common, and were scarcely ever found out. A man, for instance, comes home to his wife, and—— But I pause—I know that this Magazine has a very large circulation. Hundreds and hundreds of thousands—why not say a million of people at once?—well, say a million, read it. And among these countless readers I might be teaching some monster how to make away with his wife without being found out, some fiend of a woman how to destroy her dear husband. I will not then tell this easy and simple way of murder, as communicated to me by a most respectable party in the confidence of private intercourse. Suppose some gentle reader were to try this most simple and easy recipe—it seems to me almost infallible—and come to grief in consequence, and be found out and hanged? Should I ever pardon myself for having been the means of doing injury to a single one of our esteemed subscribers? The prescription whereof I speak—that is to say, whereof I don't speak—shall be buried in this bosom. No, I am a humane man. I am not one of your Bluebeards to go and say to my wife, "My dear! I am going away for a few days. Here are all the keys of the house. You may open every door and closet, except the one at the end of the oak-room opposite the fire-place, with the little bronze Shakspeare on the mantle-piece (or what not)." I don't say this to a woman—unless, to be sure, I want to get rid of her—because, after such a caution, I know she'll peep into the closet. I say nothing about the closet at all. I keep the key in my pocket, and a being whom I love, but who, as I know, has many weaknesses, out of harm's way. You toss up your head, dear angel, drub on the ground with your lovely little feet, on the table with your sweet rosy fingers, and cry, "O sneerer! You don't know the depth of woman's feeling, the lofty scorn of all deceit, the entire absence of mean curiosity in the sex, or never, never would you libel us so!" "Ah, Delia! dear, dear Delia! It is because I fancy I do know something about you (not all, mind—no, no; no man knows that). Ah, my Bride, my Ring-dove, my Rose, my Poppet—choose, in fact, whatever name you like—Bulbul of my grove, Fountain of my desert, Sunshine of my darkling life, and Joy of my dungeoned existence! It is because I do know a little about you, that I conclude to say nothing of that private closet, and keep my key in my pocket. You take away that closet-key then, and the house-key. You lock Delia in. You keep her out of harm's way and gadding, and so she never can be found out.

And yet by little strange accidents and coincidents how we are being found out every day! You remember that old story of the Abbé Caquatois, who told the company at supper one night how the first confession he ever received was from a murderer, let us say. Presently enters to supper the Marquis de Croquemitaine. "Palsambleu, Abbé!" says the brilliant Marquis, taking a pinch of snuff, "are you here? Gentlemen and ladies! I was the Abbé's first penitent, and I made him a confession which I promise you astonished him."

And yet to be found out, I know from my own experience, must be painful and odious, and cruelly mortifying to the inward vanity. Suppose I am a poltroon, let us say. With fierce mustache, loud talk, plentiful oaths, and an immense stick, I keep up nevertheless a character for courage. I swear fearfully at cabmen and women; brandish my bludgeon, and perhaps knock down a little man or two with it; brag of the images which I break at the shooting-gallery, and pass among my friends for a whiskery fire-eater, afraid of neither man nor dragon. Ah, me! Suppose some brisk little chap steps up and gives me a caning in the street, with all the heads of my friends looking out of all the club windows? My reputation is gone. I frighten no man more. My nose is pulled by whipper-snappers, who jump up on a chair to reach it. I am found out. And in the days of my triumphs, when people were yet afraid of me, and were taken in by my swagger, I always knew that I was a lily-liver, and expected that I should be found out some day.

That certainty of being found out must haunt and depress many a bold braggadocio spirit. Let us say it is a clergyman, who can pump copious floods of tears out of his own eyes and those of his audience. He thinks to himself, "I am but a poor swindling, chattering rogue. My bills are unpaid. I have jilted several women whom I have promised to marry. I don't know whether I believe what I preach, and I know I have stolen the very sermon over which I have been sniveling. Have they found me out?" says he, as his head drops down on the cushion.

Then your writer, poet, historian, novelist, or what not. The Beacon says that "Jones's work is one of the first order." The Lamp declares that "Jones's tragedy surpasses every work since the days of Him of Avon." The Comet asserts that "J.'s 'Life of Goody Twoshoes' is a κῆρυμα ἐς αἰῶν, a noble and enduring monument to the fame of that admirable English woman," and so forth. But then Jones knows that he has lent the critic of the Beacon five pounds; that his publisher has a half share in the Lamp; and that the Comet comes repeatedly to dine with him. It is all very well. Jones is immortal until he is found out; and then down comes the extinguisher, and the immortal is dead and buried. The idea (dies iræ!) of discovery must haunt many a man, and make him uneasy, as the trumpets are puffing in his triumph. Brown, who has a higher place than he deserves, cowers before Smith, who has found him out. What is a chorus of critics shouting "Bravo?"—a public clapping hands and flinging garlands? Brown knows that Smith has found him out. Puff, trumpets! Wave, banners! Huzzay, boys, for the immortal Brown! "This is all very well," B. thinks (bowing the while, smiling, laying his hand to his heart); "but there stands Smith at the window: he has measured me; and some day the others will find me out too." It is a very curious sensation to sit by a man who has found you out, and who, as you know, has found you out, or, vice versa, to sit with a man whom you have found out. His talent? Bah! His virtue? We know a little story or two about his virtue, and he knows we know it. We are thinking over friend Robinson's antecedents, as we grin, bow, and talk; and we are both humbugs together. Robinson a good fellow, is he? You know how he behaved to Hicks? A good-natured man, is he? Pray, do you remember that little story of Mrs. Robinson's black eye? How men have to work, to talk, to smile, to go to bed, and try and sleep, with this dread of being found out on their consciences! Bardolph, who has robbed a church, and Nym, who has taken a purse, go to their usual haunts, and smoke their pipes with their companions. Mr. Detective Bullseye appears, and says, "Oh, Bardolph! I want you about that there pyx business!" Mr. Bardolph knocks the ashes out of his pipe, puts out his hands to the little steel cuffs, and walks away quite meekly. He is found out. He must go. "Good-by, Doll Tearsheet! Good-by, Mrs. Quickly, Ma'am!" The other gentlemen and ladies de la société look on and exchange mute adieux with the departing friends. And are assured time will come when the other gentlemen and ladies will be found out too.

What a wonderful and beautiful provision of nature it has been that, for the most part, our womankind are not endowed with the faculty of finding us out! They don't doubt, and probe, and weigh, and take your measure. Lay down this paper, my benevolent friend and reader, go into your drawing-room now, and utter a joke ever so old, and I wager sixpence the ladies there will all begin to laugh. Go to Brown's house, and tell Mrs. Brown and the young ladies what you think of him, and see what a welcome you will get! In like manner, let him come to your house, and tell your good lady his candid opinion of you, and fancy how she will receive him! Would you have your wife and children know you exactly for what you are, and esteem you precisely at your worth? If so, my friend, you will live in a dreary house, and you will have but a chilly fireside. Do you suppose the people round it don't see your homely face as under a glamour, and, as it were, with a halo of love round it? You don't fancy you are, as you seem to them? No such thing, my man. Put away that monstrous conceit, and be thankful that they have not found you out.

GRACE AND I.

WE were getting on the downhill of life, and beginning to be—a little sadly—conscious of the fact. Are people ever thoroughly reconciled to growing old, I wonder? Or do they feel, at best, only a kind of forced resignation? In my young days I supposed, as a matter of course, that the spirit and the body matured and declined together, and that all the middle-aged and elderly people around me had minds perfectly attuned to their time of life; they looked forty, fifty, and sixty, and felt just so. I had not heard then of the poor old lady who, beholding in the glass her wrinkled face, exclaimed, "It's none o' me! It's none o' me!" And if I had, should have regarded her as a very weak sort of individual. I have learned to sympathize with her in later years.

Grace and I had not gone quite so far; wrinkles and gray hairs were not very evident with us as yet, though they might be soon. An aunt, who had recently visited at our house, informed us that we were now "in the vigor of middle life," and we had felt considerably insulted by the statement, and asked each other, in a private "indignation meeting" on the subject, in what remote corner of second childhood the good lady put herself. "Middle life" indeed! Why it seemed no more than yesterday that we were children, and quite too young to "go with the big girls." The remark set us thinking, however, and we found we were further along than we had imagined; not so old, to be sure, as Socrates when he learned to dance, or even as Cowper when he began to write poetry, but no longer very youthful. Not to make any foolish mystery about it, I was twenty-nine, and Grace just two years less experienced.

Heretofore we had felt ourselves young as any body; had thought and spoken of ourselves as "girls" without the least suspicion that the term could be considered misapplied. But, as I said, Aunt Mercy's remark set us thinking, and I realized that next year I should be thirty! An unmarried female of thirty! I shivered as I remembered the vernacular for such a person. Not that there was any disgrace in being an "old maid;" I had long looked calmly forward to the probability of such a destiny. But to find that I had actually got there—and without knowing it!

After this for several days I kept a keen lookout for signs of age and failure.

"How hard my hands are growing!" I said, one morning. "Do you think, Grace, that it can be because I am so thin lately?"

"Very likely," she answered. "You could not reasonably expect good healthy bone to be soft. Console yourself, though, Jen, for mine are in the same state. At our age we can't hope to retain the tender palm of youth."

"Nonsense—your hands are soft as ever they were. But do you see any sign of a 'silver dawn' in my hair? Or traces of the crow's-foot round my eyes? Mind you tell me truly the first symptom that appears. Maria Theresa wished to meet her death awake; and I want to meet my age and its disfigurements with a full consciousness of them, and not go on flattering myself that I am 'quite young' or 'young enough' to the very verge of my threescore and ten." Grace promised faithfully to keep me posted.

There was one person who still considered us as in the "dew of our youth"—it was mother. Though we had gradually superseded her in every department of household labor, she regarded us as novices, liable to blunder at every step, and needing a world of directions about the simplest matter. Personal supervision she had renounced; but from her rocking-chair by the fireside, where she sewed or knitted or read the long day through, issued frequent commands and admonitions. "Time to put on the potatoes, Grace—and be sure that they're washed clean." "Don't forget the emptins when you mix up those biscuit." "And did you beat the eggs, Janet, before you put them in the cake? I ought to stand over you every thing you do, you're such heedless children!" Grace and I laughed, and agreed with each other that it was pleasant to seem young to somebody.

Mother was a widow, and we were poor. By that I don't mean wretchedly poor, but that we lived with great plainness, and were just able by so doing to make both ends meet. Father's health had failed, and he was not able to do much for some years before he died. He had made out to keep the place for us unincumbered, but that was all. There were fifty acres and a tolerably-sized house, two or three cows, a pig, and so on. You would think we could have got along nicely, but somehow we didn't; perhaps we did not manage well, but I'm sure we were never extravagant. A neighbor took our land on shares, but he wanted so much allowance made for his team and the seed he furnished that it cut terribly into our profits. Then we must keep up the fences and pay for every improvement; and if he only turned his hand over to accommodate us it was put in the bill. Then we must board a boy to do "the chores," and our fuel must be cut and drawn and split; Grace and I could not go out in the woods and fell timber, however much we might desire to. Every body seemed to think, too, that we were so wonderfully well off, and charged us full price and a little over for what they did for us. We found that it took nearly all our ready money to pay necessary expenses.

We managed in every way that we could think of. Sold our ashes and bought groceries and calico; saved all the hen-feathers and bits of rag and bought our tin therewith; used the smallest possible quantity of butter, milk, and eggs, and sold the rest: one winter we even did entirely without apples, and made sale of the whole produce of our orchard. All this helped, of course, but it did not make matters straight. Then the house needed paint, and the roof leaked, and a hundred little matters called for repair; while within, though we were careful as could be, the wood-work grew shabby and the wall-paper smoky and faded.

"We have tried what saving money will do," I said; "now we must set at work and make some."

But how? was the question. There was very little demand for plain sewing, and people who made it their business complained that they had not half enough to do. Grace might have been Female Principal at the Academy—she knew twice as much as a good many that did fill that position; but she was born and bred in Arlington, and a prophet, you know, never has honor in his own country. People would not have thought that Grace Maltby, whom they had known from her cradle, and who had never been at a boarding-school in her life, could possibly teach their children "the higher branches." But there was the common school, and she got one in our neighborhood: they paid twenty shillings a week and board, or four dollars and let her board herself. She chose the latter, of course, and walked the three miles a day very contentedly, looking to her golden gains. The money was paid at the end of the season, and it certainly came in as a great convenience; but, dear me! it did not do half that it seemed we must have done. The place, somehow, swallowed up all that we could get outside of it.

We thought of buying a number of cows and trying a large dairy, since butter and cheese were then selling at a high price; but mother would not hear a word of it. There was no capital for the outlay, and she had a mortal horror of debt. As for raising the money by a mortgage on our place, she would as soon have engaged to suffer from cancer for a term of years. We were a good deal disappointed, but perhaps it was best after all: we should have been obliged to pay so much for indispensable assistance that our profits might have been lost in our expenses.

It was about this time that we began to realize, and, as I said, sadly realize, that we were getting oldish, and had lived our best days. Before this I had always been hopeful, though without any particular reason for being so; had thought that somehow it would all come right in the end. Now I discerned the true state of matters—that we had passed our prime, and that, pecuniarily, things must grow worse with us from year to year. Mother never would incur expense unless she had the means of meeting it at once: the land would yield us less and less return as it became poorer from want of care; we must live closer and closer, our property depreciating all the time, and end up—how? The prospect was not a cheerful one; we had practiced a pinching economy for a long time, and it was hard to think that no improvement was possible; that all the change must be the other way.

I did not mind it so much for myself. I should have liked as well as any body to have a light, pretty paper on our sitting-room; to take a Magazine, and have plenty of books; to use Java or Mocha coffee instead of Rio, and white sugar in place of brown. I liked to see napkins on a table, and preferred silver forks to steel. But it was not for my own sake half as much as Grace's that I minded these things. You may think it strange that I do not speak of mother's comfort; but if you had known her, you would have understood it all. She had a supreme contempt for dainties; I believe she would have lived the year round on "Johnny-cake" and milk, and liked the fare. As for dress, her simplicity was Spartan. She took the old gowns which we had worn to the last verge of endurance and made over for herself; three breadths or four in a calico dress—it was all the same to her. Several good suits of clothing she indeed possessed, but these she obstinately refused to wear except on state occasions—Thanksgiving dinners, or a visit to some neighbor. Yet such is the force of native comeliness, that she was as nice-looking an old lady as you will often see, spite of her scant attire. I don't know what ample means could have done for mother since, like the Apostle, she "had all things and abounded" as it was. Our furniture she considered as more than good enough; our mode of life as comprising not only comfort but luxury; and as for the three-breadth calicoes, she never made them over without some remark on our extravagance in throwing away such serviceable garments.

At eighteen Grace was the prettiest girl, it seems to me, that my eyes ever encountered; and she had not lost much at the time of which I write. Such a sweet smile, such a clear bloom, such delicate and graceful features; small hands and feet, and a throat white as swan's-down. I had always fancied that she would marry well; some stranger—for no one in the place was good enough for her. Some tall, dark, handsome man, who would carry her away and give her all the luxuries and lady-like belongings that were so suited to her. Meanwhile mother and I would live on just as we were, and Grace and the children come to visit us every summer.

She was very different from me. I was a pretty good scholar in my day; but Grace went far ahead of me in every thing, and she was always learning something, even now. For my part, when work was done, I could find things to do that pleased me better than plodding over German, or vexing my soul with problems in trigonometry. I liked to read pretty well novels and poetry or the newspapers, but she delighted in Shelley and Keats and such writers, whom it would kill me to read a page of, and went into scientific works and history and metaphysics. I admired it all very much in her, though I could never have done it myself. Then she had such a pretty taste in dress, and always looked nice, though her clothes cost almost nothing. She loved flowers, and had a perfect passion for books and pictures. It was no wonder that I was always hoping the future would arrange itself so that she would have means to indulge her tastes, and lead altogether a more refined and congenial life than had yet been possible to her.

You may think that being so pretty and intelligent she would have plenty of eligible offers. Well, there were not many young men left in our place: most of them had gone to seek their fortune in the West, or in distant cities; and Grace was very quiet and reserved. Two or three opportunities of marriage she had and had refused, though one of the suitors, Lawyer Graves, was very well-to-do and a rising man. Mother was rather disappointed that Grace did not listen to him more kindly; and prophesied, as elderly people are apt to do on such occasions, that she would go through the woods and pick up a crooked stick at last. But even this fearful prospect did not move her to reconsider the decision.

"Why wouldn't you have him, child?" I said, one day when we were alone. "He is tolerably good-looking, tolerably gentlemanly, and would have made you very comfortable."

"I shall not marry any one on those grounds," she answered.

"They may be very good grounds for all that. I wonder what you demand in a husband."

"In the first place," said she, "I demand that I shall love him so much that I should be miserable without him."

"Why, Grace, I had no idea you were so sentimental."

"I intend to be always sentimental enough for that," she maintained. "Don't be impatient, Jenny; I am not. Wait 'for the hour and the man?'"

"But suppose they never come?" I asked, a little ruefully.

"Why, then, I make no doubt that we shall get along very comfortably without them," she answered, laughing. And with this I was obliged to be content.

It was now the spring of the year—early spring—the last of March. The cattle lowed their welcome to the season, and jubilant crows sounded from the barn-yard where the fowls paraded. Patches of snow yet lingered in the fields and by the roadside, but in our door-yard there was a visible greenness springing up among the brown débris of last year's grass; bluebirds and robins sang now and then their prophecies of summer; the air was mild, and the brook, freed from its icy slumbers, made itself heard all day in soft delicious murmurs. I don't know if such weather affects other people as it does me; I feel—not exactly discontented—but such a longing after something. It seems as if freedom, change, travel—seeing new scenes and new faces—would be so delightful. However, there was no use in thinking of that. The most exciting event we had to look forward to was house-cleaning—and that brought up afresh our lack of means. Grace and I went to the barn to hunt for eggs, peered into every corner of the mangers, climbed all sorts of steep places at the risk of our necks, but found nothing. So we sat down on a hay-mow and fell into conversation about our affairs.

"We really ought to paint and paper the house this spring," said I.

"Yes—if we could."

"And the sitting-room carpet is too shabby for any thing. I'll never buy a cheap article of that sort again; there's not a bit of economy in it."

"Well, you know it was a choice between that or nothing. We had not the money for a good one. It looked much better than a bare floor."

"I suppose it did. Then the wall must be mended if we can ever get the mason to spare us an hour—and oh, that roof, it leaks so badly!"

"It can't be helped, Janet; we haven't the money to repair it. You know Mr. Brown said it would be quite an expensive job, if done thoroughly."

"But when shall we have any more? I'm tired of hoping for better crops or better prices; they never come. And the outside of the house is getting so bad; it looks more like a brown building than a white one. It ought to be painted, if only as a matter of economy. The longer we wait the more it will take to do it."

"Yes, if we could," said Grace, again.

"The fact is," I continued, "that we want two hundred dollars this very minute to do what really needs to be done—not what we would like, but what we want, to be respectable. Two hundred dollars, and we haven't two hundred cents! And there's no way of getting them that I can see, now or ever. The amount of it is, Grace, that I shall go distracted!"

"Don't," said she, by way of cheering me up. "That would only be making fresh expense."

"Oh no. They have a ward in the poor-house for lunatics of a harmless sort, and I don't think I shall be violent."

"But mother and I would miss you so."

"You may console yourselves with thoughts of following soon. You can regard me as 'not lost, but gone before.'"

Grace smiled. "It is rather wicked for us to talk so, even in jest," she said. "Things haven't come to quite that pass with us yet. But I do wish we could think of something to brighten up the scene a little." And forthwith we resolved ourselves most vigorously into a committee of ways and means, but with very small result.

"Grace," said I, "suppose you take to authorship. I dare say you could do as well as a great many of them."

"Thank you," she replied; "but I fear I haven't the competent and critical knowledge of cookery and mantua-making necessary to success in that line."

"You mightn't do books, but you could be a 'Maude Meeke,' or something of that sort in the sensation papers."

"I haven't sufficient 'intellect,' Jenny. You know the heroes and heroines of those stories are always of the loftiest stamp. You remember what our little cousin used to say, 'Brag is a good dog, but Do is a better.' I am afraid that when I had proclaimed my hero, for instance, as possessing a mind of the highest order, and then had to furnish him out of my own brain with thoughts and remarks in unison with his exalted genius, the contrast between 'Brag' and 'Do' would be rather overpowering. Can't do it, my dear; haven't the first requisite."

A clever thought struck me. "Grace," said I, "let us prevail on mother to sell the farm!"

"Sell the farm!" cried she, in amazement; "what are you thinking of? Mother would no more do it than—" She paused for want of a strong enough comparison.

"But listen," I continued, earnestly. "Nearly all the money we raise from it goes back on the land again in the shape of seed, labor, and 'improvements' generally. Now if we sold the place we should have—" And I paused to do a sum in mental arithmetic. So many acres at such a sum per acre. "Dear me!" I exclaimed, "how little it is, after all."

"And think of parting with our home—the place we were born in, and where we have always lived? Why, Jenny, you don't know what it would be. Every corner of the house is dear to us, and every tree in the orchard has some association."

I felt all this, too; but the substantial benefits to be realized attracted me. The farm—say so much; then the "stock" would sell for something: we should have a little money in hand to help ourselves with. I expounded my views to Grace till she began to acknowledge the feasibility of the plan, and to build castles with me. Our "en Espagne" were not at all of a luxurious character; we did not expect idleness or amusement, but good, solid work, and such advantages as might accrue from it. We would rent a house in the village—Grace should teach, if she could obtain the necessary pupils; while I would raise our income to a comfortable standard by taking boarders. In our little town such a proceeding would involve no loss of "caste;" I was an adept in every sort of household labor, and could "set an excellent table," as the phrase is, if I only had things to set it with. There was no manner of doubt that I should do well. "Of course we shall have to keep busy," I said; "but that we are used to, and shall not mind. It will give us a great deal more to spend; and what is better, we shall know what we have. It won't go for things that make no return."

Once started, we went on as rapidly as the girl with the milk-pail. New carpets and chairs, and various other desirable acquisitions, shone upon us from the future. By-and-by, perhaps, if we did well, we might try some larger village; keep a boarding-school on a limited scale, Grace doing the head-work and I the hand. Our projects were wonderful, and we saw ourselves "laying up for old age," besides enjoying a great many comforts as we went along.

There was one terrible hindrance to the fulfillment of our desires—the getting mother to consent. Whenever we came to consider that branch of the subject we were brought up standing. It was like proposing a constitutional monarchy to an absolute sovereign, or informing a venerable president that the interests of the college require him to resign. It would be better for her as well as us could she only be brought to see it; but who should broach the matter?—who argue and convince her? We talked it over many a time, and got our courage almost to the point, as timid people with the toothache ponder the only remedy that can avail them, and wish so much they could, yet never quite accomplish it. Like them we deferred the dreaded moment.

One day mother had gone to take tea with a neighbor. Grace and I, as we turned and trimmed, and generally revamped those "best dresses" that we might have been known by any time during the last eight years, discussed our project for the thousandth time. A noise in the yard presently attracted my attention, and, looking out, I exclaimed, "Why, here's Dr. Olmsted!"

Dr. Olmsted was our Dr. Kittredge. Not that he owned two or three fine horses—his only steed was a very square-built sorrel pony, with a stumpy little tail that was no sort of defense against the flies; and in summer-time he used to go by decorated with so many green boughs that he might have passed for Birnam wood on its way to Dunsinane. Nor did our worthy Doctor dive into psychological causes and effects, as did that kindly philosopher. He was a member, in "good and regular standing," of the Baptist Church; and if he did not consider immersion as exactly needful to salvation, regarded it as the only proper "door," and thought that people who did not go in thereat had got into the fold in a very unauthorized manner. I call him our Dr. Kittredge, because he was the oracle for all that section of country in every thing pertaining to medicine. His devotees were as absolute, if not quite as numerous, as those of Buddh or Brahma. If people died any where about it was their own fault, in that "they didn't have Olmsted;" and supposing him to have been infinitely divisible, so that every clime and country could have had him, there was no good reason why the present generation should not endure forever. To be sure, once in a great while patients did die under his care; but that was because their time had come, when of course no skill could save them.

For the rest, he was the kindest, best-hearted person living, and a great favorite with Grace and me, who had known him all our lives. His wife, now some four or five years dead, had been our dearest friend; one of those women on whose steadfast regard, chary of profession but prompt in deed, you could implicitly rely. The Doctor was now perhaps fifty-one or two, but very well preserved. As he dismounted from his sulky, which appeared to be a "cast," only done in mud instead of plaster, there was no one we could have been better pleased to see.

"Good-afternoon, young women," he said, glancing in at us. "I hear your mother has some oats to sell. Can I look at them?"

"Certainly, Doctor. You'll find them in the carriage-house." He went his way, and presently returned, bidding us tell mother that he "would take the lot." Then disembarassing himself of a very rough and shabby overcoat, he announced his intention of spending half an hour with us.

"Can't you stay to tea, Doctor?" said Grace.

"Have you any thing very nice to tempt me?" he inquired.

"Nothing more than warm biscuit and maple sirup. Have you had any sugar yet?"

"Not an ounce have I seen; the season has been very unfavorable. Well, if you'll give me an early tea I will stay for it." And we talked a while of neighborhood matters.

"Have I any thing of a purse-proud look?" he asked, after a time. "For I have received a heavy fee to-day."

"A consultation?" said I, for we knew he was often sent for from a distance.

"No; a case de lunatico inquirendo; a father taking out a commission to manage the affairs of his son, who is insane. I gave my testimony and was about to leave, when the man's lawyer reminded him that I must have my fee. He tendered me this coin, inquiring if it would satisfy me; and I informed him that it would, perfectly." So saying, he displayed—a dime!

"And he actually had the face to offer you that!" I exclaimed.

"My dear, he was perfectly honest about it; he no doubt considered that it was an ample remuneration for my time and trouble."

"It takes all sorts of people to make a world," I remarked, with truth if not originality.

"And a doctor gets acquainted with most of the varieties. Speaking of consultations, I had a case last week that was a little too much for flesh and blood. A man over beyond the Guernsey had hurt his leg very badly"—(if you imagine, oh reader, that the Doctor said "limb" in compliment to ladies' society you are very much mistaken)—"and they sent for me. I went as soon as I could, and found quite an array of the brethren; three—four—physicians, they called themselves. We looked at the man and looked at each other, as wisely as we knew how, and then retired into a room by ourselves to consult. The youngest, as in duty bound, gave his opinion first—to save the life the limb must be amputated; the next one followed suit—I could hardly believe my ears; and so on till they came to me. 'Gentlemen,' said I, politely, 'I shall be glad to have you tell me which of his legs you propose to amputate!' Pack of ignoramuses! disgrace to the profession! The man will be around again in a month; and they would have sent him hobbling about on cork for the rest of his days!" And the Doctor's pleasant face glowed with indignation.

"Very fortunate for him," said my sister, "that he had such an accomplished surgeon to interfere in his behalf."

"No satire, if you please, Miss Grace. I don't profess to be Keate or Brodie, but I do claim to have a modicum of common sense." Which claim very few would incline to dispute.

Tea was ready by this time, and while the Doctor sipped his Hyson—very strong and sweet, with plenty of cream—he informed us that he was presently to have a partner in his business, on whom he expected to put all the long, hard rides and heavy work, while he enjoyed the otium cum dignitate in his office. The young man was quite a prodigy of good looks and talent, according to his account, and it was prophesied that Grace would lose her heart to him at sight. In return for this news we confided our own plans to him, and requested his advice concerning them. He thought the notion a very good one, and volunteered to say as much to mother, if we liked. This took such a load from our minds, and the whole thing seemed so much more feasible when a business-man like Dr. Olmsted had approved it.

"I'll mention it day after to-morrow, when I come for the oats," he said, at parting. "Ah, girls! how comfortable you make a man. I should have had one of you in my own house long ago, if I could only have made up my mind which to take."

"Which of us would take you, you mean!" I answered, laughing.

"Nonsense! you would either of you jump at the chance of such a handsome young husband," he said, as he drove away.

I shut the door and we talked about him; how merry and kind he was, and how like a father to us! We speculated a little—not much—on the coming physician; whether he were really as “nice” as Dr. Olmsted boasted; whether we should consider him worth knowing or not.

“For that matter,” observed my sister, “we shall not probably be called on to decide. Such an Adonis will hardly trouble himself to make the acquaintance of ‘single ladies of a certain age.’”

Now if ever a speech sounded absurd it was this of Grace’s, when you looked at her fair, sweet face and girlish figure. I told her so; and then we talked of what lay a great deal nearer our hearts than any doctor, young or old. Our plans seemed almost realized now that we had ventured to confide them to a third party, and we awaited, with mingled hope and anxiety, the Doctor’s decisive visit.

He came as was agreed, and gently and skillfully worked the conversation round to the desired point. How nervously we listened to him! and made errands out of the room every now and then to escape the first burst of mother’s surprise and wrath. For amazed and horrified she truly was. What! we had grown too genteel to live on a farm, hey? Wanted to move into the village and set up for ladies! Sell the farm, indeed, and leave herself without a home! The thing was too preposterous to be thought of for a moment.

The Doctor waited for her indignation to expend itself a little, and then proceeded to set before her all the proposed advantages. She fought every inch of the ground; but men have always a way, somehow, of domineering us about every thing of a business nature—putting us right down as ignorant or incapable where we differ from them. • The Doctor so clearly proved to mother her utter unfitness to take charge of the farm—so set before her that she was the lawful prey and spoil of any one who had to deal with her—that in the end she promised to think about the matter. So we considered the victory as almost gained, and at once, in imagination, selected our house, engaged our boarders, and were in the full tide of successful operations.

But a sudden period was put to all our plans—Grace fell sick. Whether she had taken cold in house-cleaning, or got her feet wet in some of our long spring walks, we could not tell; but one day she complained of fever and a headache, and was soon prostrate with a severe and dangerous illness.

Oh how little, how worthless every ambition we had felt looked to me as I sat by her bedside in those long nights, watching her uneasy slumbers, and oppressed by the dread that she never would recover! Nothing was of any consequence except to see her well again; or if that could not be, to rest assured that she had passed into a happier state. We had a long time of suspense, for when the first violence of the disease was over the Doctor dreaded a decline, and for weeks we watched and waited; but at last there came a day when he had nothing but good news for us, and thenceforth she recovered rapidly. How happy we were! and what a miracle of skill we thought the Doctor!

While Grace was at the worst our old friend trusted her case to no one but himself. As she grew better he occasionally sent up his partner, or “pardner,” as he was more commonly denominated. Nothing but an angel direct from heaven could possibly have looked sweeter than she did in her convalescence, and I could not wonder that his visits were continued long after they ceased to be strictly necessary.

“‘Single females of a certain age,’” I remarked to Grace one day, “do not seem to frighten Dr. Morris as much as you apprehended.”

She blushed a very guilty crimson. “I have no doubt,” she said, “that he thinks us a couple of very nice old maids.”

“Us!” I did not consider such barefaced hypocrisy worthy of a single comment.

It is a good thing that people in real life are not obliged to linger along, and have quarrels, and be miserable, as they are in novels, in order to “make out the story.” Grace’s true love contradicted the proverb and ran entirely smooth. Summer passed and autumn waned, and in the drear days of December we had a quiet wedding. It realized my every ambition for this darling sister. Dr. Morris was all that our old friend had claimed for him: handsome, gentlemanly, with mind and cultivation that more than satisfied her best ideal. Not wanting, either, in worldly prosperity, and, best of all, fitted to aid her progress in that path which, since her illness, she had most earnestly desired to tread.

In the course of the winter mother sold her farm, and we removed to the village; but we do not rely upon boarders for subsistence. It was very lonely without Grace, and Dr. Olmsted used to come in frequently to cheer us. Whether it is true, as he says, that he “had had thoughts of me for a long time,” or that now, when only one was left he found it easier to make up his mind as to which of us he really wanted, I can not say. But he managed to persuade me that thirty and fifty-two are not such very different ages, and that looking on a man as a father for a good portion of your life is the best possible preparation for regarding him as a husband during the remainder of it.

Mother divides her time between the two houses, and is alternately “ridden over” by the youngsters of each, who conceive that grandma has no business in life but to make herself useful and agreeable to them. As for my own—But, as I live, there is the Doctor’s sulky, and I must put away my writing and hurry Ann about the dinner, for he will be so hungry after his ride.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record embraces the important events of the month, closing with the 6th of May.—Early in April it became apparent that the Administration had decided upon its policy. The Southern Commissioners, on the 9th, were informed that the Government declined to acknowledge them in their official capacity. Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State, said, in his final reply, that he saw in the events which have recently occurred, not a rightful and accomplished revolution and an independent nation with an established government, but rather a perversion of a temporary and partisan excitement to the purpose of an unjustifiable and unconstitutional aggression upon the authority of the Federal Government. The remedy for these evils was not to be found in irregular negotiations, but in the action of the people of the United States, through Congress and such Conventions as are authorized by the Constitution.—A Commission appointed by the Virginia Convention to ask of the President information as to the policy which the Federal Executive intended to pursue toward the Confederate States, was received by the President on the 13th. Mr. Lincoln replied that he intended to pursue the course marked out in his Inaugural Address. The power confided in him would be used to hold, occupy, and possess property and places belonging to the Government. By “property and places” he then meant chiefly military posts and property which were in the possession of the Government when it came into his hands; but if, as now appeared, an assault had been made upon Fort Sumter, he should hold himself at liberty to repossess it, if he could, and also all like places which had been seized before the Government was devolved upon him; and in any event, he should to the best of his ability repel force by force; he might also cause the United States mails to be withdrawn from all the States which claim to have seceded. He should not attempt to collect duties by armed invasion of any part of the country, though he might deem it necessary to relieve forts upon the borders of the country. He concluded by reaffirming every part of his Inaugural Address, unless what he now said of the mails might be regarded as a modification.

In the mean while increased activity had been noted in the navy-yards and forts at the North. Vessels were equipped and manned as rapidly as possible. About the 8th a fleet, having on board nearly 2000 men and a large quantity of stores, was dispatched Southward. It soon transpired that its object was to reinforce Fort Pickens, and if possible to throw provisions into Fort Sumter, the supplies of which were known to be nearly exhausted. On the 8th General Beauregard, the Commander of the Confederate forces at Charleston, was formally notified that an attempt would be made to provision Fort Sumter. After communicating with his Government, he was directed to reduce the Fort. On the 11th Major Anderson was summoned to evacuate the Fort. He refused to comply; and on the morning of the following day fire was opened upon Fort Sumter from Fort Moultrie and the Confederate batteries. This was returned by Major Anderson with as much vigor as was possible with the small force under his command. The bombardment continued with scarcely an intermission for 34 hours. The wood-work within the Fort was set on fire by hot shot, the quarters were entirely consumed, the main gate burned, the gorge wall seriously injured, the magazine enveloped in flames, and the door closed from the heat, so that only four barrels of powder and a few cartridges were available. The garrison, which numbered only about 100 men, including laborers, were exhausted by fatigue and hunger, the only remaining provisions consisting of salt pork: opposed to them were 7000 men and powerful batteries. Further resistance being impossible, and the vessels not being able to afford any assistance to the Fort, Major Anderson accepted the terms which had been offered before the commencement of hostilities, evacuating the Fort, marching out with flying colors, saluting his flag with fifty guns. The men on both sides were so completely protected by the works that no loss of life occurred during the bombardment; but in saluting the flag a gun burst, by which several of the defenders of the Fort were injured, one being killed. The evacuation of Fort Sumter took place on the afternoon of Sunday, the 14th of April, Major Anderson and his men embarking on board a steamer for New York, where he was welcomed with distinguished honor. The Secretary of War subsequently addressed a note to him, expressing perfect satisfaction with the manner in which he had defended the post under his command.

Hostilities against the United States having thus been commenced by the Confederate States, President Lincoln, on the 15th of April, issued a proclamation stating that the laws of the United States had been and are opposed in several States, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; he therefore called for 75,000 troops from the several States. The first service assigned to this force would probably be to repossess the forts and other places and property which had been seized from the Union. An extra session of Congress was also summoned, to meet on the Fourth of July.

Dispatches from the Secretary of War, addressed to the Governors of the several States, designated the quotas assigned to each State, under this proclamation. The Executives of the slaveholding States, with the exception of Maryland and Delaware, peremptorily refused to comply with this requisition. Governor Ellis, of North Carolina, replied, “I regard the levy of troops made by the Administration for the purpose of subjugating the States of the South as in violation of the Constitution, and a usurpation of power. I can be no party to this wicked violation of the laws of the country, and to this war upon the rights of a free people. You can get no troops from North Carolina.”—Governor Jackson, of Missouri, answered, “There can be, I apprehend, no doubt but these men are intended to form part of the President’s army to make war upon the people of the seceding States. Your requisition, in my judgment, is illegal, unconstitutional, and revolutionary in its objects, altogether inhuman and diabolical, and can not be complied with. Not one man will the State of Missouri furnish to carry on such an unholy crusade.”—Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, replied, “In answer, I say emphatically that Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States.”—Governor Letcher, of Virginia, answered, “I have only to say that the militia of Virginia will not be furnished to the powers at Washington for any such use or purpose as they have in view. Your object is to subjugate the Southern States, and a requisition made upon me for such an object—an object, in my judgment, not within the purview of the Constitution or the Act of 1795—will not be complied with. You have chosen to inaugurate civil war, and having done so, we will meet it in a spirit as determined as the Administration has exhibited toward the South.”—Governor Harris, of Tennessee, refused in terms equally explicit to comply with the requisition of the Government. In his Message to the Legislature, dated April 25, he takes strong ground against the action of the Administration, which he says is designed for the subjugation of the Southern States. He recommends the immediate passage of an Act of Secession, and an Act for the union of Tennessee with the Southern Confederacy, both to be submitted separately to the people at an early day. He also recommends an appropriation for arming the State, and the creation of a large military fund, to be placed under the direction of a special Board.

The position of Virginia is of the greatest importance. At the breaking out of hostilities the State Convention was in session. As noted in our last Record, a resolution was passed expressing an earnest desire for the re-establishment of the Union in its former integrity; an amendment declaring that Virginia ought not to accept a form of adjustment which would not be acceptable to the seceding States was rejected. Commissioners were appointed to wait upon the President and ascertain the policy which he intended to pursue. An amendment denying the right of the Federal Government to deal with the question of secession was rejected. A resolution was adopted expressing a willingness that the independence of the seceding States should be acknowledged. An amendment declaring that Virginia would secede in case the proposed amendments to the Constitution were rejected by the non-slaveholding States, was lost. And resolutions were adopted opposing any action on the part of the Federal Government for retaining or retaking forts in the seceding States, and affirming that any measures of the Government tending to produce hostilities with the Confederate States would leave Virginia free to determine her own future policy. When the proclamation of the President calling for troops was issued the Convention went into secret session, and on the 17th of April passed the following:

AN ORDINANCE TO REPEAL THE RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA BY THE STATE OF VIRGINIA, AND TO RESUME ALL THE RIGHTS AND POWERS GRANTED UNDER SAID CONSTITUTION.

The people of Virginia, in their ratification of the Constitution of the United States of America, adopted by them in Convention on the twenty-fifth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, having declared that the powers granted under the said Constitution were derived from the people of the United States, and might be resumed whenever the same should be perverted to their injury and oppression; and the Federal Government, having perverted said powers, not only to the injury of the people of Virginia, but to the oppression of the Southern Slaveholding States.

Now, therefore, we, the people of Virginia, do declare and ordain that the ordinance adopted by the people of this State in Convention, on the twenty-fifth day of June, eighty-eight, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and all acts of the General Assembly of this State, ratifying or adopting amendments to said Constitution, are hereby repealed and abrogated; that the Union between the State of Virginia and the other States under the Constitution aforesaid, is hereby dissolved, and that the State of Virginia is in the full possession and exercise of all the rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State. And they do further declare that the said Constitution of the United States of America is no longer binding on any of the citizens of this State.

This ordinance shall take effect and be an act of this day when ratified by a majority of the votes of the people of this State, cast at a poll to be taken thereon on the fourth Thursday in May next, in pursuance of a schedule to be hereafter enacted.

The “schedule” appoints the time and manner of holding the election. Polls will be opened in each military camp, in addition to the regular election precincts, and all volunteers will be entitled to vote. The election for members of the United States Congress, which was to take place on the same day, is prohibited, unless otherwise ordered by the Convention. The proceedings of the Convention were held in secret session; but the passage of the ordinance of secession was telegraphed to the South. Mr. Stephens, Vice-President of the Confederate States, at once set out for Virginia upon a special mission, the result of which was a convention between Virginia and the Confederate States, upon the following terms: Virginia adopts and ratifies the Constitution of the Provisional Government of the Confederate States, adopted on the 8th of February, unless the people, at the election to be held in May, reject the ordinance of secession. But until the union between Virginia and the Confederacy is perfected, the whole military force, and the military operations of the Commonwealth, are to be under the control of the President of the Confederate States, on the same footing as if Virginia were a member of the Confederacy. If the State becomes a member of the Confederacy, she is to turn over to it all the property and stores acquired from the United States. Any expenditure of money made by the State in the interval is to be met by the Confederate States. This Convention is signed by Alexander H. Stephens as “Commissioner for the Confederate States,” and John Tyler, William Ballard Preston, S. M. D. Moore, James P. Holcomb, James C. Bruce, and Lewis E. Harvie, “Commissioners for Virginia.” This convention bears date the 24th of April.—In the mean time the people and authorities of the State did not wait action of the Convention. The United States Armory at Harper’s Ferry contained some 15,000 stands of arms. It was guarded by only 40 men under the command of Lieutenant Jones. On the 18th of April the commander was apprised that two or three thousand Virginia militia were advancing to take possession of the armory and arms. The position being untenable by the small force under his command in the face of so large a body, Lieutenant Jones destroyed the greater portion of the arms, set fire to the Armory building, and withdrew with his command. They were fired upon by the inhabitants, and two of the troops were killed. The remainder made their way through Maryland and escaped.—At the Navy-yard near Norfolk were stored an immense amount of artillery and munitions of war. Here also lay the ship of the line Pennsylvania of 120 guns, used as a receiving-vessel; the ships of the line Columbus, Delaware, and New York, of 80 guns, useless for naval purposes; the frigates United States, Columbia, and Raritan, greatly out of order; the sloops of war Plymouth and German-town, of 22 guns; the steam-frigate Merimac, under repair; the corvette Germantown, 22 guns, nearly ready for sea; and the brig Dolphin, of 4 guns: in all of a capacity 21,000 tons, with 606 guns, though with a few exceptions practically useless. Besides these was the ship Cumberland, the only one of the vessels in commission. Preparations were made to capture the Navy-yard, and vessels were sunk in the channel to prevent the passage of the Cumberland; but the steam-tug Yankee from Charleston arrived opportunistically, took the Cumberland in tow, forced her over the sunken vessels, and towed her off. In the mean time the other eleven vessels were scuttled and set on fire, and the buildings at the Navy-yard were also set on fire, after as much of the public property as possible had been destroyed to prevent its becoming of use to the enemy. It seems, however, that the destruction was incomplete, and that a large amount of artillery and munitions of war fell into the hands of the Virginians in a condition to be made available.

When the proclamation of President Lincoln calling out the militia was received at Montgomery, President Davis issued a proclamation, dated on the 17th of April, inviting all persons to apply for letters of marque and reprisal, to be issued under the seal of the Confederate States. Those applying for these letters are to make a written statement, giving the name and a suitable description of the character, force, and tonnage of the vessel, with the names and residences of the owners, and the intended number of the crew. All applicants, before receiving their commissions, must give bonds to the amount of $5000, or $10,000 if the vessel is to have more than 150 men, that the laws of the Confederate States shall be observed, and all damages done contrary to those laws shall be satisfied, and that the commission shall be surrendered when revoked by the President.—President Lincoln thereupon, on the 19th, issued a proclamation, announcing the blockade of all the ports of the seceding States, and that a competent force would be stationed to prevent the entrance and exit of vessels at these ports. Any vessel attempting to enter or leave these ports is to be warned by the commander of a blockading vessel, the warning to be indorsed on her register; and if the vessel again attempts to enter or leave, she is to be captured and sent to the nearest convenient port. On the 27th the President issued a proclamation extending the blockade to the ports of North Carolina and Virginia. It is announced that the blockade will be maintained by at least fifty vessels of war, accompanied by a fleet of steam transports capable of conveying an army of 20,000 men.—On the 3d of May the President issued another proclamation, calling into service 42,000 volunteers to serve for a period of three years, unless sooner discharged; ordering that the regular army should be increased by 22,714 men; and directing the enlistment for the naval force of the United States of 18,000 seamen, for a period of not less than one or more than three years.

The Congress of the Confederate States met at Montgomery on the 29th of April. The Message of President Davis announced that the Permanent Constitution had been ratified by a sufficient number of States to render it valid, and that it only remained to elect officers under its provisions. The Message of President Lincoln calling for volunteers is characterized as a declaration of war, which will render it necessary to adopt measures to replenish the treasury of the Confederation, and provide for the defense of the country. Proposals had been issued, inviting subscriptions for a loan of five millions; more than eight millions were bid for, none under par. The whole amount had been ordered to be accepted; and it was now necessary to raise a much larger sum. The Confederate States had in the field, at Charleston, Pensacola, and different forts, 19,000 men, and 16,000 were en route for Virginia. It was proposed to organize and hold in readiness an army of 100,000 men. "We seek no conquest," says Mr.

Davis, "no aggrandizement, no concession from the Free States. All that we ask is to be let alone; that none shall attempt our subjugation by arms. This we will and must resist to the direst extremity. The moment this pretension is abandoned the sword will drop from our grasp, and we shall be ready to enter into treaties of amity and commerce mutually beneficial."—In the mean while warlike and aggressive measures have been pushed forward with all possible activity. The forces besieging Fort Pickens have been augmented, and new batteries have been constructed against it. Vessels belonging to the Government and to individuals have been seized. Among these is the steamer Star of the West, which had been dispatched to Indianola, Texas, to bring away the United States troops collected at that port. The vessel was lying at anchor, awaiting the arrival of the troops. At midnight of the 19th of April the steamer Rusk approached, and the captain of the Star of the West was informed that she had on board 320 United States troops, which were to be embarked. Every assistance was given for the reception of the supposed soldiers, who, however, proved to be Texan troops. As soon as they were on board they took possession of the steamer, which was taken to New Orleans, the crew being detained as prisoners of war. Shortly after, 450 of the United States troops attempted to make their escape from Indianola on board of two sailing vessels. They were pursued by two armed steamers, manned by the Texans, overtaken, and made prisoners.

The attack upon Fort Sumter aroused an intense feeling throughout the Free States. All the Governors responded promptly to the demand of the President for troops, promising to raise not only the number required, but as many more as might be needed. The Legislature of New York appropriated three millions of dollars for arming and equipping troops; Connecticut appropriated two millions, Vermont one million, New Jersey two millions, and other States in proportion. The Common Council of the city of New York appropriated one million. Besides the public appropriations, in every considerable town and city private subscriptions have been made for the same purposes, and to support the families of volunteers. The aggregate of the sums thus furnished is estimated at 25 millions. Public meetings have been held every where; and all men, without distinction of party, express the determination that the Government must be sustained at all hazards, and at any cost of life and money.

It being supposed that an attack upon Washington was meditated, the first care of the Government was to provide troops for its defense. The usual route to Washington from the North and East lies through the city of Baltimore. The first troops which reached this point were a regiment from Pennsylvania, and one from Massachusetts. Upon their arrival, on the 19th of April, they found the railroad track through the city obstructed, and their passage was opposed by a mob. The Pennsylvania regiment, being unarmed, was driven back. The greater part of the Massachusetts regiment passed on to the station without interruption. Two cars in the rear were detained a few moments. The troops left the cars and attempted to march through the city. They were assailed by missiles and firearms, three of them were killed. They then fired upon the mob, killing and wounding several; and then forced their way through, and proceeded to Washington. This was on the 19th of April, the anniversary of the Battle of Lexington.

For some days Baltimore was completely under the control of the Secessionists. The railroad track upon each side was torn up and bridges burned, so that direct communication between the North and Washington was suspended. Regiments which set out from New York on the 19th were therefore stopped at Philadelphia. They were finally sent by steamers to Annapolis, the capital of Maryland, which is also connected by railroad with Washington. Other regiments gathered at New York were forwarded to the same point. The troops here were placed under the command of General Butler, of Massachusetts. Rails had been removed, bridges destroyed, and engines rendered useless on the road to Washington. The Massachusetts and New York troops, who were the first at Annapolis, were on the 24th of April sent on toward Washington, repairing the track and rebuilding the bridges as they advanced. The New York 7th reached the capital on the 26th of April, having opened the route, which was taken in possession by the Government. They were speedily followed by other troops from New York and New England, until at the close of the month the capital was considered secure from any force that could be brought against it from the South.

The position of Maryland is especially critical. Governor Hicks had throughout opposed the secession movement, and refused to summon an extra meeting of the Legislature. Upon the receipt of the requisition for the Maryland quota of troops, he wrote to the Secretary of War, asking if these troops were to be used solely within the limits of the State and for the protection of the National Capital. He said that he wished for an assurance to this effect, that "in responding to the lawful demands of the United States Government he might be able to give effective and reliable aid for the support and defense of the Union." He was informed that it was not intended to remove the troops from the State except for the defense of the District. On the 18th of April he was notified by the Secretary of War that information had been received that the United States troops would be obstructed in their passage through the State, and a hope was expressed that this obstruction would be prevented by the State authorities. On the 20th he wrote that he had endeavored, with little success, to preserve peace and order; the rebellious element had the control of things; they had the principal part of the military force with them, and had taken possession of the armories, arms, and ammunition. He therefore "thought it prudent to decline for the present the requisition by President Lincoln for four regiments of infantry." He urged that no more troops should be sent through Maryland. He was informed by the Government that, for a time, no more troops would be sent through Baltimore, provided that they could march around the city. On the 22d the Governor wrote again—although he had previously admitted that he had no right to demand it—advising that no more troops should be sent through Maryland, and suggesting that the British Minister, Lord Lyons, "should be requested to act as mediator between the contending parties of our country." To this Mr. Seward replied, affirming the right and necessity of sending troops through Maryland, and declining to ask for foreign mediation. In the mean time the Governor repeatedly protested against the landing of the troops at Annapolis and the military occupation of the Railroad thence to Washington, assigning as a reason for the latter protest that he had summoned the Legislature to meet at the Capital, and the occupancy of the road would prevent some members from reaching the city. General Butler, the United States officer in command at Annapolis, replied that his troops were in Maryland to maintain the laws and preserve the peace against all disorderly persons whatever; that he had taken possession of the road, because threats had been made to destroy it in case the troops passed over it; if the Government of the State had taken possession he should have waited long before he entered upon it; that he was endeavoring to obtain means of transportation so that he might vacate Annapolis before the meeting of the Legislature; and that he could not understand how, if the road was rendered impassable one way, the members of the Legislature could pass over it the other way. He also understood that apprehensions were entertained of negro insurrection, and offered his command to suppress it. The Governor thanked him for the offer, but said that the citizens were fully able to quell any insurrection among the slaves.—Annapolis and the railway remaining in possession of the Federal troops, the Maryland Legislature met at Frederick on the 27th of April. The Governor, in his message, admits the right of the United States to transport their troops through Maryland; counsels the State not now to take sides against the General Government, but to maintain a neutral position, so that in the event of war it may not take place on her soil. The first action of the Legislature rendered it doubtful whether that body would sanction even this recommendation of neutrality. A bill passed the Senate vesting the entire military power of the State in a Board of Public Safety, a majority of which were in favor of secession; this bill was subsequently re-committed, apparently on account of the strong feeling existing in a large portion of the State against any attempt to urge measures for secession. A Committee of the Legislature, appointed to meet the President, admitted the right of the Government to transport troops through the State, and expressed their belief that no immediate attempt would be made to resist the Federal authority.

The position of affairs at the close of the first week in May is this: The Government of the United States is resolved to maintain its authority throughout the entire country, and has called for forces amounting in all to 180,000 men, and is on the point of beginning offensive operations; forts Monroe, M'Henry, and Pickens have been reinforced; the blockade of Southern ports has been commenced. The Southern Confederacy, probably strengthened by the addition of Arkansas, Virginia, and Tennessee, are determined to resist, at all hazards, and are sending troops to the Border States. The position of Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri is undetermined; but a few days must decide it. The only clew yet given to the action of the European Powers is the reply of M. Thouvenel, the French Foreign Minister, to Mr. Faulkner, our late Minister at Paris. It is to the effect that no application had been as yet made for the recognition of the Confederate States; that the French Government was not wont to act hastily upon such questions; that he believed the maintenance of the integrity of the Federal Union was for the benefit of France; but the principle was firmly established that all de facto governments had a right to be recognized as such.—Our new Minister to France, Mr. Dayton, is instructed to say emphatically that "the thought of a dissolution of this Union, peaceably or by force, has never entered into the mind of any candid statesman here.

POPULAR SENTIMENT.—We are fond of talking of the mysterious things in nature—of earthquakes, volcanoes, whirlwinds, pestilences, and other marvels of the material world; yet these do not begin to compare in strangeness and importance with the developments of the human heart as shown in the storms, and tides, and epidemics of popular feeling. The great questions of our future history do not turn upon marvelous phenomena in the heavens or under the earth, but upon the play of human passions; and while science is approaching toward a statement of the positive laws of the material world, human society is comparatively unknown, and what are called its laws are subject to great uncertainties and interruptions. During the last hundred years the historic races of our globe have not been troubled to any great extent by disturbances of what is regarded as the order of nature; and the crises in affairs have not turned upon famines, inundations, or pestilences. Short crops, indeed, will always tell upon public opinion, and there will be commotion wherever there is little bread. But the nature of the commotion will depend very much on the previous temper of the people.

The difference, for example, between Great Britain during the Irish famine and France during the distresses of the reign of Louis XVI. came less from physical than from social and political causes. The British suffered want with patience and relieved starvation with humanity, and the affliction was regarded less as the fault of the Government than as the visitation of Providence; while the French people felt that they had been trodden under foot by their rulers, and used the frenzy of misery to exasperate the madness of revolution. Thoughtful men foresaw trouble, and some remarkable predictions of the great convulsion of the eighteenth century are to be found in the pages of philosophers and theologians; yet the whole issue of affairs took the world by surprise, and the scientific world were quite as much in the dark as the multitude upon whom they looked with contempt. The great question to be settled was not What will the writers of the Encyclopedia or the idealists of the Gironde, but What will the people say and do; and the question was much mystified by the fact that the people themselves were more in the dark about their own movements than their superiors. For this is a memorable fact in all great popular outbreaks, that the chief parties in them are generally quite unconscious of their coming; and the populace can no more predict the storm that is to convulse its elements, than the skies over which angry clouds are flitting can of themselves predict the coming tempest. The reason of this ignorance comes from the very origin of popular commotion. The movement of the people does not generally begin in a deliberate theory or a settled purpose, but in a great emotion, a master passion. All the theories of human rights started by Rousseau and his school might be held, and have been held, by men of the most conservative position; and it is a noted fact that the infidelity of Voltaire prevailed most among the aristocratic wits and courtiers of his day. It was only when the populace felt that they had been trodden down by tyrants, and were set on fire with revenge, that radical opinions armed themselves with such terrors, and speculations that have been harmless in many coteries of doctrinaires or blue stockings, were found brandishing the sword or presiding at the guillotine.

Of course we do not deny that theoretic opinions have great power, yet of themselves they do not inflame the people; and their significance, even as opinions, is not felt until they are connected with some startling event or personage, or some inflaming appeal or symbol. We do not doubt that Rousseau's "Contrat Social" had a great deal to do with forming the mind of St. Just, Robespierre, and the theoretic radicals of the Terrorist school; yet such speculations could of themselves amount to little, and so far as motive revolutionary force was concerned, the Marseillaise Hymn was worth more than all the tracts ever published. The people are not philosophers, and they rarely accept a political or philosophical idea unless it is so embodied as to touch their sympathies and move their passions.

To illustrate the same truth by our own affairs, may we not say that, much as we may admire the arguments of our great conservative statesmen in behalf of our Constitution and our laws, no Union speech of Webster or Clay ever had half the power with the people that is exercised whenever the American flag is unfurled before the multitude and the "Star Spangled Banner" is sung?

There are, undoubtedly, laws to popular feeling; but it is not easy to define them, or even to apprehend them: and how little we are able to state them in cold blood or in our closet meditation, becomes quite clear the moment we make the issue practical, and try the experiment upon ourselves by going into the contagion of popular excitement. Of much of our nature, indeed, we can become cognizant without the help of the multitude. We do not need to learn of the thousand when to be hungry, or thirsty, or sleepy, or cold; and our leading physical instincts and appetites, although much modified by the influence of numbers, inhere in our own private constitution, and would command us in very much the same way if we lived alone like Robinson Crusoe, or were one of the great army of Xerxes. A man may, indeed, have his appetite a little sharpened by seeing others eat; but he need not wait long for this social sauce, and the passage of a few hours brings the ascetic scholar as well as the burly beef-eater to the table; and under the pinch of hunger the knightly Quixote and his voracious squire feel the touch of nature that makes the whole world kin.

There are also imperious intellectual instincts that are as independent of the force of sympathy as the physical appetites; and the mathematician does not hold his principles in the least at the mercy of social excitement or public opinion. Newton pursues his Calculus as calmly as if the earth were as passionless as the heavens, and men were as voiceless as the stars. The votaries of all the higher abstract philosophy, like Kant and Hegel, have something of the same exemption from popular commotion. Yet the interest which attaches even to such exact sciences depends much upon social feeling; and while the conclusions of the Calculus are wholly independent of popular favor, the zeal with which the study is pursued may be much enhanced by the smiles of princes or the applause of nations. The mathematician is human in whatever he thinks and does; he must be a man as well as a calculator. The moment he enters society he feels the social estimate that is put upon his labors, and as soon as he begins to apply his science to practice he finds himself in full contact with the world, and subject to all the interests and emotions of the world. As soon as he erects observatories, or builds ships, or constructs aqueducts or fortifications, he mingles with the crowd, and is moved by the ambition, fears, and hopes incident to all active life.

Some of our feelings that are most intense in the nearer social relations, lose their power when presented to the public. Thus lovers are very interesting to themselves, but little so to spectators, and their endearments appear ridiculous to the multitude of lookers-on. Even the parental affections are comparatively private, and we do not care to see children fondled in public. The parental feeling becomes interesting to the public only when it rises above merely private life into a universal meaning, and touches the common heart—as when Virginius slew his daughter with his own hand, and called on the people to avenge their wrongs and his own upon the ravisher's head; or when a mother offers her only son to her country, and gives him her blessing as he goes to the wars of liberty. We are all, indeed, compelled to respect the domestic affections in their own sphere; but they do not of themselves kindle great popular emotions. Sometimes, indeed, they become pathetic, and even inflaming, from their connection with public calamities; and no picture can be more touching than that of the soldier returning from the wars, all wounded and broken, to find a welcome from his desolate wife and child. The universal chord is here touched, and private feeling rises into the highest humanity. Whatever appeals to the parental instinct of the many has irresistible sweep; but this appeal must be something more than an exhibition of private affection, and must connect home affections with the general heart.

It may be affirmed, in general, that the people are most deeply moved by whatever comes home to their feelings; and of course nothing can come home deeply to their feelings without touching the affections which they have in common. Whatever is purely individual in taste or opinion or purpose can not act upon the masses; and all those niceties of culture or accomplishment that require rare acumen or exceptional training or gifts to be appreciated, can not be expected to kindle popular enthusiasm. If an assembly of fifty thousand men were gathered together from the people at large, just as they happen to come, in some enormous inclosure like the Coliseum, it would be a very curious study to ascertain the range and character of their sensibility. No reasonable man would expect to interest them in subtle metaphysics, or in exquisite disquisitions, or in the most refined poetry and art. If their ear even for music were to be tested, a stirring martial strain would at once kindle their enthusiasm, while they would hardly listen to the choicest airs from Mozart or Beethoven. If their sense of poetry were to be proved, some vivid narrative or startling drama would move them more than the polished sonnet or the most learned and sagacious didactic verse. They might be ready to weep at a thrilling tragedy, but they would be far more ready to laugh at a broad comedy. If eloquence were to be tried upon them, that would be found most effective that brings the largest range of motives to bear upon some contested point; and of all speeches that is the most telling that calls the people to some battle with a definite and positive foe, whether it be a campaign against a nation, a crusade against the heathen, or the marshaling of a militant Church against an infidel world.

The appeal of the orator to the mass avails little until he brings out the enthusiasm for what they all love into union with their animosity against what they all hate. The great popular commotions arise when the people rally for a common cause against a common enemy. Of course the cause and the enemy are more sure to be common when they are connected with common interests and passions of our nature, both higher and lower. That is the best cause to plead with the people which rests upon obvious grounds of common interest, and rises from that basis into universal principles; as, for example, the cause of a country whose soil gives the people their bread and home, and whose institutions are identified with their friendships, loves, and religion. The higher range of motives have greatest power when they are awakened; yet the lower are more obvious, and when a man is not thinking of his conscience or his religion, he can not help thinking of the land before his face, and the very thought of losing this sends the blood coursing through his veins, and rouses in time all the better convictions of his mind.

All popular commotions, therefore, must have a positive material basis, and even religious excitements of the revolutionary kind are sure to turn upon some tangible prize, upon some land of promise, whether Jewish, Mohammedan, Anabaptist, or Mormon. If we were called to name the three leading causes of popular agitation we might place them thus: the land and estate, the distribution of power and honor, partisan and sectarian opinion; and if we are asked to class these in the order of their influence it must be in the inverse order of their dignity; and we firmly believe that while moral and religious principle is the noblest motive, yet it needs to be connected with positive material interests to make it popular, and that the mass are most habitually acted upon by motives directly connected with the soil and their material welfare. They are capable, indeed, of an immense degree of enthusiasm for honor and religion; but they do not live long in the upper air of idealities, and all wars for ascendancy or faith settle down upon some solid ground of antagonism. The two extremes of civilization—the Mormon and the Roman Catholic—while professing to be under direct divine guidance, bring their zealots to a material test, and Salt Lake and the Tiber are the seats of their temporal thrones.

As the mass of men tend to rest upon a material basis in their ideas, there is a similar trait in their modes of action. The masses—as such, and unless animated and commanded by wise or heroic leaders—do not gain mind by gaining bulk, but rather become more heavy and unwieldy. Ten thousand men meeting together without organization, have not by any means ten times the mind of one thousand men, and one thousand men have not ten times the mind of one hundred men, nor one hundred men ten times the mind of ten men. A great multitude is a mob instead of a fellowship, and is as dangerous to itself as to its sworn enemies, trampling upon its own people, and, when driving every obstacle away before its irresistible sweep, wielding a power that is weak even in its might, bound even in its lawlessness, like the rush of the waters when the flood-gates are swept away, which roll on because they can not stop; and what is called their force is but the fearful necessity of their destiny. A mob is a great tide of people, and the individuals that compose it are no more masters of its movement than particles of water are masters of the drift of the tide upon the rapids that pour over Niagara. The whole mass must move on together according to the tendency that happens to prevail, and the minority is compelled to fall in with the majority, without giving the few opportunity to make their expostulations and influence tell with the many. The mass, indeed, readily accept a leader, but more from the fatality of a contagious enthusiasm than from the freedom of a sagacious choice; and hence their leader is more apt to be the most exciting name than the most desirable character. Hence great multitudes are not suitable deliberative bodies, and whatever is left to them to decide is generally badly decided. A mass meeting is very effective for popular agitation, but bad for executive, or judicial, or legislative action. The many, as such, are more under the sway of passion or emotion than of argument or forethought; and whatever appeals to the most obvious prejudices or immediate interests is likely to carry the day. Hence the danger of submitting great practical questions to the decision of mass meetings. We are not, indeed, despisers of the many, but, on the contrary, we are champions of the rights of the people; and precisely because we vindicate the liberty of every good citizen at the ballot-box, we oppose every effort to give the hue and cry of the mob sway over private opinion. We are sure that the citizen is much safer in small assemblies, that can be reasoned with and brought under the influence of sober thinkers in the quiet of fair deliberation, than in monstrous masses that are sure to be overpowered by some popular agitator.

We are not, indeed, prepared to say that the many are of necessity unprincipled or unwise; but we do say that they are not so much masters of themselves in great masses as in moderate assemblies, and the wisdom of our civil fathers was in nothing shown more emphatically than in their desire to avoid great assemblies of the people by a due division of the land into States and districts. An ochlocracy, or direct government by the whole population in mass, would be the most monstrous and dangerous form of society, and almost any tyranny that the earth has ever seen would be more tolerable than the sway of such a mob. It is not well that we are tending, in some respects, to such a method, and that our system of nominating our highest officers at great conventions or caucuses, is such as to make the decision sometimes dependent upon the most vehement agitator and the most brazen lungs. In fact, all great masses of men tend to a certain despotism, that merges individual judgment in the sweep of the popular tide under the popular leader. So true is it that as men multiply in numbers they diminish in independence, and in order to give even proper physical power to a great multitude of men it becomes necessary to divide them into small companies. What would an army be if the hundred thousand men who make it up were a mere mass upon a great plain, following their leader as a drove of buffaloes follow theirs? The larger the host the weaker it would be; and while it might trample down the enemy, it would be sure to trample down its own ranks. Popular sentiment needs division and subdivision for its proper direction and efficiency as much as military power, and great harm comes to a republic whenever this principle is forgotten, and the dead-weight of mere numbers is allowed to overpower individual influence and local independence and jurisdiction.

We have but touched upon a great subject, and hereafter we may treat more at length of the tendencies of popular sentiment in America.

Our Foreign Bazaar.

IT was just on this flowery month (when we write), nearly a score of years ago, when our eyes caught the first sight of the domes and towers and trees of the central city of France. It seems only yesterday when that blaze of newness and splendor along the Paris streets gave its first wonderment. The sky calm and bright; the Tuileries garden laden with its great spikes of chestnut bloom; the parterres gorgeous with hyacinths; the lilacs fragrant; the dingy tricolor drifting lazily over the central pavilion of the palace; here and there a lumbering diligence thundering down the side streets; a great eddy of clumsy houses filling the magnificent court which Napoleon I. had planned, and standing there all awry, and stained, and populous, as a kind of bourgeois protest against the vanity of Imperial promises; rough, harsh pavements along the completed half of the Rue Rivoli, which jolted you fearfully as you rode over them toward St. Cloud, and suggested the barricades they had made and might make; a seedy, mouldy look along all the houses of St. Honoré, as if the glory and splendor of the capital city had enjoyed its largest development, and you were only listening to the echoes of a greatness that had passed.

There was history all around you. Here passed the tumbrils that led to the guillotine; there passed the car which bore the Goddess of Reason; in yonder house lived Robespierre; the rubicund Philippe Egalité lived in the fine palace you passed in the morning; Napoleon made his great breach in Revolution there by the steps of St. Roque; a merchant king, who owns houses and shops in New York, has succeeded. Louis Philippe is not a romantic sovereign; his children play at battledore, and Marie takes lessons in drawing.

It seemed altogether a peace age; the deputies had their quarrels; the sub-lieutenants had their little duels in the Bois de Boulogne. There was intrigue about certain Spanish marriages, and sharp letters with England; sharp letters, too, with General Jackson about old liabilities. But the King, with his gray hair bundled to a point, like the comb of some old-time lady or of some sedate farm-yard rooster, was the Napoleon of peace and of trade. France had lived out its splendid days—fading all the way from the days of Turenne and the Maintenon—and would now float along in commercial quietude, indulging in ambitious recollections, perhaps, but keeping in the wake of our young Republic, which was now to lead the world in civilization, in wealth, in peace, and in content.

And when the break came, and when Guizot—who had hung a portrait of Alexander Hamilton on his library-wall—was compelled to flee, and the great king of the gray top-knot to flee with him, it seemed to hopeful American eyes, jubilant in their own successes, only a little swifter disintegration of the old world powers, which had lived out their time of growth and must crumble.

How we watched that Revolution! How we pitied sane men who debated with swords and barricades! How we wished they were as wise as we! It was strange that merchants should so peril trade, and priests forget peace-making, and philanthropists forget progress. But philanthropists did not forget progress: only such as Blanqui and Barbés conceived of a rational progress through gutters that ran blood. Civilization seemed trembling in the balance, when Lamartine lent his poet's tongue to steal away the fierce lightning from that wrathful cloud that gathered around the Hôtel de Ville, and that muttered death. Poor France! how lost she seemed to all rational estimate of her own need and welfare! If she had only been educated to liberty as we; if she had only her boast of elective judiciary, and free-schools, and a four years' monarch only, she might march on without a jostle or an unwelcome stir. But France had lived through the choicest vintage of her life; the promise, and the security, and the hope were all gone Westward. It seemed only a poor sign when a General Cavaignac was summoned to power, and suspended the press and proclaimed martial law. It seemed to us that men educated as Republicans would never need this—would never tolerate it even; but with a free people a man's thought put into keen words is stronger than his presence; and if martial law says, "Keep yourself in-doors," may there not be stronger reason to say, "Keep your thought in-doors?"

Well, we watched with hope and fear changing places as the French play went on. Great calm and unflinching resolution in the midst of terrible danger or of slaughter always challenges hope, and makes a nucleus where the timid may rally: the dead-wagons roll by dripping blood. France is paying a heavy price for something; what is worth most always costs heavily (a pleasant sophism, which in dreary times we try to graft our faith upon).

And after all, it is only "Louis Napoleon, President," that the blood pays for. Punch fires at him a broadside of inextinguishable fun. All those hopeful ones, such as Barrot, and Lamartine, and Thiers, who had begun the labor of overthrowing the old monarchy, are disappointed utterly: all the earnest men of the middle stage, who had caught the Revolution at mid-flood to conjure freedom, such as Hugo, and Marrast, and Pagés, and Arago, are utterly discomfited.

At first it is only the energy and earnest action of Louis Napoleon that rallies the hopes of those at the great trade centres of France. No class of men shift their political sentiments so easily as merchants; and as Louis Napoleon develops power to control the destinies of France, and a determination to use it, the old monarchism and the later jubilant republicanism of the traders tumbles into judicious and easy acquiescence.

Could ever any free-born men, said we, complacently, come to such swift turn of opinion into the ways of interest?

It seemed the seal of the national decay: Victor Hugo, in Jersey or Belgium, writes a scathing lampoon, which romanticists thought must put an end to the moral influence of Napoleon. But it did not: the factories of Rouen buzzed, and the shuttles of Lyons flew swift through the silken meshes. A great brocaded glory was laid, piece by piece, on France, until it culminated in the gorgeous color of Solferino. A stalwart despotism, that so many earnest thinkers had chafed under, had after all wrought out some of the grandest accomplishments of modern civilization—giving a free banner to Italy, and swift punishment to Ottoman barbarity in the wilds of the Lebanon.

Well, while the linden-trees of the Tuileries garden whisper sweet concord overhead, and while we recall that crumbling together of the merchant monarchy of Louis Philippe (congratulating ourselves that we had a General Jackson who did not crumble)—while we recall that phantasmagoric change, through silent shops, of rash republicanism into the dictatorship of Cavaignac (when we rejoiced that no American Cavaignac would ever suspend habeas corpus)—while we recall that cool, quiet outgrowth of Napoleonic despotism, which stifled men of thought and set factories at work (blessing God that thought, and industries, and all the humanities were guaranteed by a paper Constitution in America)—while we recall all this, under the linden-trees here in flowery May, we are appalled by the doubtful, if not broken promise of our American institutions. Where we had hoped for only growth and fullness, we see now over seas the inauguration of a more barbarous war than the world has known since the days of Cromwell and of Naseby. Our complacency and over-arrogance is humbled. With you, across the ocean, who now feel all the bitterness of a war actually begun, it may be consoling to reflect that all the forbearance and the justice may have been on one side, and all the intemperance and rashness upon the other; but over the vista of the water we who linger see a disrupted republic, and feel that after all no written Constitution, no common inheritance, no brotherly share in past victories, is proof against an alienation that wreaks its passion in slaughter, and that builds with hospitals and tombs so many testimonials of the truth, that the best of human governments is, after all, but an experiment.

That God with truth and justice will ultimately reign nobody doubts. But who and where are the infallible interpreters?

Are the sneers of Victor Hugo at the Emperor just? Is the harsh banishment of the poet just?

BUT our eagerness of outlook and apprehensions of war are not drawn wholly across the Atlantic. The European observer has nearer indications of storm. You have already been informed of the revolutionary spirit in Poland, kindled, without doubt, by the successful issue of the Italian uprising. Our present look is upon the streets of Warsaw, as far back as the eighth of April. There are angry crowds gathering on the Square before the Castle. The Prince Lieutenant orders the troops to mass themselves in a defensive position, and summons the crowd to disperse. But the Polish crowd answers the summons with sneers and hisses—all the more since a rumor is current that the Prince Lieutenant has received orders from St. Petersburg not to fire upon the crowd. The summons to disperse is again and again repeated, but is utterly unheeded. The cavalry are then ordered to make a charge; and, finally, the infantry fire by platoons. The killed and wounded are withdrawn within the Castle, so that there may be no more demonstrative funeral ceremonies; and so, before night, the streets are cleared. The streets are cleared, and Warsaw is still; but we have news yet to come.

It is dreary and saddening, this retrograde movement in a corner of the great empire which, under the auspices of the liberal Alexander, seemed just now lifting toward a newer and more Christian civilization: it reminds of the quick and earnest hopes which came in with Pio Nono, and which went out with the first gunshot. The Count Zamoyski is one of the heroes just now of Polish reverence; and the next news may make him the leader of a revolution or the tenant of some Siberian prison.

And the Pope—how shall we forget him in his strait? All the less, that he fainted the other day in his canonicals. There have been times in the history of Europe when the fainting fit of a Pope would have made the staple for an interesting period. And see how tamely it reads now: Contrary to his habit, his Holiness left his apartments (on the 2d April) with his head covered, and wrapped in his scarlet cloak. There were vague stories how the recognition of the new title of "Emanuel, King of Italy," by England and Switzerland harassed the old gentlemen. Who knows? However this may be, certain it is that so soon as Monseigneur Ricci chanted l'Evangile at the foot of the throne, his Holiness found himself growing worse. Yet he strove to stand, with a cardinal on either side of him. At the close of the chant the kind cardinals placed him in his seat, his head hanging on his breast. He had fainted even as they reseated him.

There was a rush for something that might revive the old gentleman; no physician being at hand, nothing more than incense in the sacristy, the cardinals sustaining meantime the poor drooping head with what grace they could! He, the master, all stiff in those cumbrous robes and heavy golden embroidery, seeming dead. But he was not; for when they brought the sal ammonia, or what not, and the sedan-chair, in which on occasions he takes great rides on the shoulders of men, he revived, and was borne back to his chambers—to bed. The next day, it is rumored, he chatted—only chatted—about negotiations with Victor Emanuel for a quiet settlement of their questions of difference.

The week after his fainting fit—just a week to a day—and the Holy Father might have read in the reported speech of Cavour before the Parliament of Turin such sentiments as these (we translate largely, but carry the intent): "It is easy to demonstrate that Italy, of all the nations in the world, is the one wherein exists least antagonism between the religious sentiment and the sentiment of liberty. All our grand thinkers of this age have applied themselves to the reconciliation of Christian loyalty with a spirit of liberty. The leading literary mind of Italy, the man who is counted among the first poets of Europe, and whom we are proud to count among ourselves (Manzoni?)—has throughout his triumphs striven to reconcile these two orders of ideas—ideas of loyalty to the Church and of individual liberty. Our philosophers—such honored men as Gioberti and Rosmini—have wrought toward the same goal.

"I believe," he says, "to speak frankly, that if Rome would accept our just proposals to-day, the party of the Church would be in a majority every where in our free country. For myself, I would submit, and close my career on the benches of the opposition.

"I am so far convinced of the profit and wisdom of what I propose, both to Italy and to the Church, that I can not imagine how a majority of you before me should not reach the same conclusion. It is a wonder to me—it must be a wonder to the world—to find that the representatives of free Italy manifest such calm, such moderation, such respect toward the Church of Rome.

"And the world shall know full soon that what we propose is the only means of securing to the Church its legitimate influence in Italy and throughout the world; and not long hence, I trust, and from the bosom of the whole Catholic people of Europe, a voice shall come to the Pope, saying, 'Accept loyally what the free Italy proffers; for it gives back liberty to the Church and lustre to the Papal throne. Accept her terms, and Italy, in achieving her freedom, will remain most loyal of all to the true spirit of her ancient religion.'"

Why not, on the faith of this, dismiss Louis Napoleon, and make such terms as can be made with Victor Emanuel?

MEANTIME, and only two days before the triumphal speech of Cavour, a great reactionary conspiracy was on the point of breaking into a war that would have involved half of the Neapolitan kingdom. The night was the sixth of April; the Committee of enrollment was known; its quarters known; the Duke of Cajaniello was chief; the Ex-Jesuit Trotta one of its arch-managers; numerous bishops had been bought over; 12,000 men, it was thought, could be relied upon; even the prison-keepers had been tampered with, and the gates were to be thrown open to the détenus. But the vigor of the administration thwarted the plot; twelve officers of the old army were arrested, pickets of soldiers posted over the prisons, and the languid Neapolitans rejoice at their escape from a new battle. M. Nigra, of whom we had occasion to speak in a recent paper, has thoroughly proven the wisdom of M. Cavour in naming to this important post, and has won the good opinions of all.

The only delicacy of the Sardinian situation is not, however, confined to the Papal question or to the reaction of Naples. Garibaldi, in obedience to what he believes to be the wishes of his old army of liberation, is insistent upon a reorganization and immediate preparation for battle. Cavour, advised and influenced by the Western powers, quietly but vigorously combats this hasty action. Austria, under her present stress, is understood to be eager for an opening of hostilities with the Court of Turin under conditions (like that of the success of the Garibaldian policy) which would alienate France. In this event she would hope to march at once to Turin and conquer such a peace as would restore Italy to its old status. The Dalmatian ports are represented to be in a thorough state of defense, and the Austrian navy rapidly increasing in efficiency.

As for Hungary, it still holds an attitude of defiance, although it has been honored with such Imperial favors—we had almost said humiliations—as would have never ripened into negotiation even in the days of Metternich. Just now there rises a curious complication of the Hungarian difficulties, by reason of certain Transylvanian rights which are for the first time brought in question. Yet again, if the Russian Emperor is to assume the kingship of Russian Poland, and restore the old nationality, what shall become of Galicia, that is even more hopelessly bereft of privilege than Warsaw? Must not Posen and Galicia both be snatched from their Prussian and Austrian masters, and together reintegrate the partitioned State?

In short, it is not easy to see how harmony can grow out of the present discord of the purely European questions: and besides these, among which we count the Holstein troubles, there remains that startling bugbear of the Syrian occupation. To match this partially, it is understood that England has increased her garrison at Malta from three to eight thousand troops, with stores and war material in proportion. Gibraltar is furnished for any possible eventuality, and the authorities of the Ionian Islands are preparing for possible trouble. These Ionians are not insensible to the recent movements toward the reinstatement of the old nationalities; their Greek sympathies are becoming more noisy than ever; and at the recent convocation of the Legislative Assembly a Zanteote member had the hardihood to propose that the question of the annexation of the Ionian Isles to Greece be submitted to a vote of the people. A debate followed in such temper, and of such subversive tendency, that the Lord High Commissioner, representing the English crown, was compelled to prorogue the Assembly.

As for the provinces of European Turkey, the embroilments are now so complicated that we despair of giving, in the brief space at our command, any intelligible account of them. Discontent and agitation are prevailing throughout: bloody insurrections have broken out here and there, and seem to promise a general uprising against the cruelties and weakness of the Ottoman master. The Montenegrins are ready for revolt, and with them will be the people of the Herzegovine, of Bosnia and Bulgaria, and even Servia. A long and indignant manifest of this latter people is copied into the journals of the West.

ABOUT Paris there is much small news afloat, but very little of large news. Thus, in the way of gossip, we hear that Mademoiselle Augustine Brohan, the favorite actress at the Français, is eager to retire for private reasons, but finds her right denied by the Société. A suit is promised to come of it. M. About has a play accepted, called "Gaetana," and under rehearsal. He proposes to withdraw it, and is refused. Another suit, we are promised, is to come of this. George Sand and M. Henri Martin are rival candidates for the 20,000 franc prize of the French Academy. The successor of M. Scribe is being talked of, but is not named with confidence. A short piece, of indifferent success, from the pen of M. Charles Hugo, son of the poet, is just now represented at one of the lesser theatres.

Lamartine relieves his other literary labors by certain gossipy sketches (more interesting than dignified) of the distinguished personages with whom his checkered life has thrown him in contact. Here is a specimen:

"A few years later, his (Hugo's) renown had grown with his years and with his works. He was married, and had already several cradles about his hearth. I was spending a diplomatic holiday by the valley of Saint Point, in my native mountains. I saw approach, along the paths opposite my window, through the chestnut-trees, a caravan of travelers—men, women, and children—some on foot, others on 'mules of thoughtful footstep,' as the poet says. The caravan soon reached the sandy foot of the mountains, crossed the stream and the meadows, and climbed the ledge, to the château. It was Victor Hugo and Charles Nodier, followed by their charming wives and fine children. They had come to beg my hospitality for a few days, on their way to Switzerland. Charles Nodier was the boon friend of every thing glorious. It was his business to love the grand. He felt himself on level ground only at the summits. His indolence prevented him from producing finished works; but he was equal to all he admired. He was content to sport with his genius and his sensibility—like a child with its mother's jewel-case. He threw away precious stones like sand. This carelessness about his wealth made him the Diderot—but the Diderot without noise or charlatanism—of our time. We loved one another for our hearts, not for our talents. He was a chimney-corner man—a familiar genius—a general confidant—the loss of whom does not appear so great as that of a lofty reputation. But the loss deepens incessantly; for it is in the heart. The poetic caravan continued its route toward the Alps. I saw it disappear behind the mountain. Since that halt of his (Hugo's) we have remained friends in spite of systems, of opinions, of revolutions, of different political creeds. For these are of the hour, and change with the hour; but poetry and friendship are in the dominion of eternal things—they are of the city of God. We shake off the dust of terrestrial cities as we enter."

This mention of Lamartine calls to mind a story of an old Florentine duel of his which just now finds the light in a "Histoire anecdotique du duel dans tous les temps," which may possibly tempt an American translator and publisher. It is compiled by Emile Colombey and published by M. Lévy. The Lamartine episode is derived from a letter written by Gabriele Pepé, dated Florence, March, 1826, and addressed to his brother Carlo Pepé, a writer of some distinction. Lamartine it seems, in his Dernier chant of Childe Harold, had indulged in expressions no way complimentary to the Italian character. Shortly after, he came to Florence in the capacity of Secretary of Legation to the French Embassy. He was received coldly, and Gabriele Pepé, who published in that time a little Dantean brochure, slipped into his book this aggravating mention: "This French rhymist of the Dernier chant of Childe Harold, who supplies his want of poetic fervor and of noble ideas by a facetiousness directed against the Italian character—a facetiousness that would amount to an injury, if the rhymist's assault were vigorous enough to do harm," etc., etc.

Of course the young Secretary of Legation chafed at this: he wrote to M. Pepé, a Neapolitan exile, for an apology—M. Pepé declined to grant it. Lamartine then called personally for an explanation—M. Pepé still declined.

Upon this Lamartine urged an instant meeting les armes à la main. "I replied," says M. Pepé, "that I would be always ready to afford him that gratification; but as he was slightly lame (having fallen from his horse the day before) I begged him to take time for his complete recovery, when the affair could be arranged. To this he consented. But a new difficulty now arose: the Tuscan laws were so severe against dueling that I, an exile, could ask no friend to stand by me without inadvertently giving a hint to the authorities. I proposed, therefore, to M. Lamartine to meet him in the presence of his second alone. To this he refused consent; and my only resource was to beg of him to name another of his countrymen who should represent my aid. This was arranged, and I found myself upon the morning of the meeting in the presence of three strangers—all fellow-countrymen. Of the two swords to be made use of, one was slightly longer than the other, and it was proposed to draw lots for the choice. But I objected, and at once took the shorter one, and the fight commenced. I found myself by far the better swordsman of the two; and having drawn a little blood from his right arm, he expressed himself, in answer to my demand, perfectly satisfied, and so the affair ended. I bound up his wound with my own hands, and we returned to the city in company. The police, however, had meantime been informed of the occurrence, and on our return I was arrested. Through the influence however of M. Lamartine and other friends I was presently set at liberty. Lamartine gave a grand dinner, at which I had the honor of being present; and not long after he published a frank avowal of his error in regard to the Italian character."

From the same book of M. Colombey we translate another excerpt: Two lads, educated together from their infancy, loving each other like brothers, part at length upon the threshold of life in anger. They had come from a country village up to Rio for a completion of their education together; they went away separate, and determined never to meet again. A woman the cause, who was loved by both. But unfortunately they did meet, and in such temper as forbade utterly any resort, except the last one, to a duel. At the first fire one fell, to all appearances mortally wounded. The other looked on with composure for a moment, then swooned, and on his recovery from the swoon, prattled like a child. His mind had given way under the shock, and he had relapsed into idiocy.

The wound of his friend, however, did not prove fatal; and after recovery he devoted himself assiduously to his unfortunate rival. Every resource of the medical art was tried in vain; his physical health was strong, but his mind refused to recover from the shock which had come from the murder of his dearest friend. Finally it was suggested that, since his fancy clung to the dead figure of his rival, it might be possible to restore him to himself by representing the corpse of his friend gradually coming to life again. So they arranged a bier in the room below that of the patient, and stretched his friend in grave-clothes. They brought him down, and placing him by it begged him to watch the corpse.

So he watched alone with the recumbent figure. After long hours there was a stir of the pall—the dead sleeper was waking.

"Be quiet!" says the idiotic man. But the ghost gains strength and stirs again. The maniac slips quietly out into the garden, and bringing in a mattock with him stealthily, again orders the sleeper to be quiet. But he stirs, and throws off the grave-clothes. In an instant the maniac beats him down and brains him with the mattock. The watchers rush in only to find the victim dead. But the maniac is calm, and says only, "Twice I told him to be still."

It gives a bad color to dueling. And wars are only great duels. And civil wars are only great duels between old friends.

Two men who lived at Rio, and loved the same fair face, and blundered into duel, and died for it—one smeared with blood and the other smeared with idiocy—are, after all, only two dead men who lived at Rio.

Of course it could not be helped: honor forbade.

What if the story were of two halves of a nation, of common blood, and speech, and ancestry; and the weltering victims counted by tens of thousands?

What if it could not be helped? And of course it could not.

Honor forbade.

Ah, the crimes that go to the account of such froth as human honor!

Editor's Drawer.

REV. DOCTOR SPRAGUE, of Albany, has made a magnificent volume of Methodist Ministers, nearly two hundred of them in a book of near a thousand pages. If any body thinks there is no "Drawer matter" in a houseful or a bookful of Methodist ministers he is greatly mistaken. Catch two or three of them together at the right time and place, and you will find they know how to enjoy "the good the gods provide" as well as the next man. These noble fellows who figure in this portrait-gallery were the great men of their day—fathers and leaders in the Church, pioneer preachers when Methodist was a new name in this country, and the sort of men that heroes and martyrs are made of.

Valentine Cook was one of them. During the frightful convulsions of nature that occurred in the vicinity of New Madrid, on the Mississippi River, in the winter of 1811-'12, the whole country was thrown into commotion. Mr. Cook, being at that time at home, was suddenly aroused from his slumbers at midnight, and, finding his bed and house rocking and staggering, and supposing the end of all things had come, sprang from his bed and made for the door. Mrs. Cook, in great agitation, exclaimed, "Oh, Mr. Cook, wait for me, wait for me!" "No, my dear," he answered; "when the Lord comes I'll wait for nobody!"

GEORGE GRAY got a good bit of advice that is worth remembering. George was a boy when he became a preacher: "Within a few days of the time that he was fifteen years and a half old his name was on the records of an Annual Conference as a traveling preacher—the youngest candidate ever received in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was sent to the Barre circuit, in Vermont. As he mounted his horse to set out for his field of labor—a journey of some two hundred miles—his uncle, who was a Methodist, and withal a man of more than common shrewdness, addressed to him some words of advice which he never forgot. 'Never,' said he, 'pretend that you know much, George; for if you do so pretend, the people will soon find out that you are sadly mistaken; neither tell them how little you know, for this they will find out soon enough.'"

DAVID YOUNG was one of the pioneers of Western Methodism. "No individual, however weak or obscure, coming to him as an honest inquirer after truth, ever failed to profit by his ample instruction; but woe to the captious fault-finder, who rudely attacked him or his creed. With such a man he did not stop to argue, but demolished him with one withering sarcasm, and passed on. On one occasion, a weak but conceited man attacked him unceremoniously on the subject of 'perseverance,' saying, 'So, Mr. Young, you believe in falling from grace, do you?' He replied, promptly, 'I believe in getting it first.'"

ONE of the lights of the Church rejoiced in the name of Billy Hibbard. "Once, when the roll-call of the Conference gave his name as William, he arose and objected to answering to that name, insisting that his name was Billy. 'Why, Brother Hibbard,' said Bishop Asbury, 'Billy is a little boy's name.' 'Yes, Bishop,' he replied, 'and I was a little boy when my father gave it to me.' His eccentricity discovered itself in all circumstances and on all occasions; and he would often say things which would well-nigh convulse his audience, when it was evident that he had not only had no design to produce such an effect, but could not understand how the effect had been produced. In other cases, however, it would seem as if his drollery found vent when he could not but have been aware that it must at least disturb the risibles of his audience. In the early part of his ministry, as he was preaching on the Golden Calf, after describing the process of its formation, he said, 'When it came out of the fire, it came out a great calf—bah! He was particularly shrewd in meeting and warding off the attack of an adversary. About the time the new Constitution was formed in this State he attended a camp-meeting at Granby, in which he dwelt with great earnestness on the position that 'a law-established religion is wicked.' He said, 'it was wicked as it existed under Pharaoh; it was wicked as it existed under Nebuchadnezzar; it was always wicked; but when Daniel came out the toleration ticket prevailed.' In a conversation with the Rev. Dr. M——, a Congregational minister of this State, the Doctor stated that he felt that sin mingled with every thing that he did—that there was sin in his very prayers. My old friend did not hesitate to say that he had no relish for the doctrine that we must live in sin, and set people to serve the devil and dance. 'But,' said Dr. M——, 'I regard dancing as a very civil and innocent recreation.' 'Then,' replied Billy, 'if there is sin in praying, and no sin in dancing, the sooner you stop your prayers and begin to dance the better.'"

These are some of the lighter things in the book. It is full of the deeds and words of the noble men who have served the Church and rested from their labors: serious, godly, great men, like whom we shall all wish to be when the day comes for which all other days are made. And so with this little sermon we dismiss Dr. Sprague and his Methodist Ministers.

BUT we are reminded of the flight of time. This Number begins the twenty-third volume of the Monthly. Eleven years we have opened and shut this Drawer for the amusement of mankind and the ladies, who are among the best of our readers and contributors. The publishers are always pleased when the new year opens with new lists of subscribers, to whom they offer great inducements on the cover, and the Drawer offers still greater inducements within. Now is the time for clubs, and the more we hear from the better for us and for you.

"Like your correspondent who 'used the glass kept for the niggers,' and who relates the joke at his own expense so pleasantly in the Drawer for April, I am a constant traveler. On one occasion I was journeying from Paris, Kentucky, to Maysville by stage. The night was delightful, and having the stage entirely to myself, I was in the full enjoyment of my third cigar when the stage drew up in front of the hotel at the Blue Lick Springs. After supper I resumed my seat, and was just settling myself for a comfortable smoke and dream when the stage-door opened, and a clear, musical voice asked if there was room inside. Of course I answered yes, and took her hand in mine to assist her into the stage. Offering her the back-seat, I sat down by her side and attempted to open a conversation. The weather, the season at the Springs, the water, all were tried. It was no go. She evidently regarded me as impertinent, and was determined to impress me with her dignity. On we rattled over the smooth road, and soon I fell asleep, and slept I know not how long, but was at last awakened by my companion leaning heavily against me. Moving back slightly, I allowed her head to sink gradually upon my lap. Ah! thought I, you were caught napping that time. Some belle of the season, possibly, sleeping here as quietly on my lap as a child sleeping on its mother's breast. No sleep for me any more. It was the first time any woman's head had ever rested there, and might be the last; the precious moments must not be lost in sleep.

"Soon after midnight the stage rolled up to the Lee House, and old Renz Connell came out with a light, precisely as he has done every night for twenty years; and I sat still—I wanted him to see my triumph. The light shining in her face awakened us both—her from sleep, and me to the fact that I had staid awake three mortal hours to hold a nigger's head!"

"My little niece, coming in from play the other day, was loud in her complaints against one of her playmates. Her mother sat by the window sewing, and my niece took her little chair and sat down by her side, when the following conversation ensued:

"NIECE. 'Ma, who makes little girls?'

"MAMMA. 'God makes them. Don't you know God makes every body?'

"NIECE. 'Well, if I had been God I would never have made Susie Lampkins!'"

WE are not yet done with the humors of the election. Here we have a story from Nebraska:

Graves has a slight impediment in his speech, but for all that he is an active worker among the "Irish element" whenever there is a Democratic caucus or an election to be held; and it is sometimes an object to know how Graves will go, for when he promises to support a man he'll do it in spite of every thing, and generally takes the Irish with him.

When the party nominations for members of the Legislature were about being made last fall, S—— was a prominent candidate, backed by Hanse (his right bower), who, to make a sure thing of the nomination for S——, sought out Graves to secure his co-operation.

After the caucus was over and the votes all counted, S—— was found to have been beaten by about three to one; and as Hanse could count up the names of many more persons who had promised to vote for S—— than he had received votes, concluded that Graves had "failed to connect." When they again met the following conversation was held:

HANSE (looking disappointed). "I say, Graves, why didn't you support S——, as you agreed to?"

GRAVES. "Never pr-pr-promised to."

HANSE (emphatic). "Yes you did."

GRAVES. "Where d-did I?"

HANSE. "Why, down at Mac's office."

GRAVES. "Th-th-think not; told you I *g-g-guess*ed I would; but I'm the poorest g-g-guesser you ever see—hardly ever g-g-guess right."

"WE have here several flourishing 'mission-schools,' and among the teachers is a Mr. R——, who is an especial favorite with the decidedly 'miscellaneous assortment' of scholars, not only for his singing, in which they delight, but because of his power in interesting them in Bible stories.

"A few Sundays ago Mr. R—— was telling them the story of Esther, stopping occasionally, according to custom, to ask a few questions, thereby insuring their attention and interest.

"After enlarging upon Haman's hatred, and endeavors to get rid of Mordecai, and their result, he asked, 'And how do you suppose Haman felt now, when the King had commanded that not only Mordecai but every one belonging to the Jewish nation should be destroyed?' 'Bully!' replied a little ragamuffin on the front seat, with an emphasis and earnestness that upset the gravity both of teachers and scholars.

"OUR Charlie, three and a half years old, is a great admirer of military men, and of Generals in particular—always listening with the greatest delight to such stories as relate to the exploits of Washington, Taylor, and Scott. He is uncommonly observant of the conversation carried on before him, often fitting the words of his elders to his own ideas in a very funny fashion.

"Not long since papa and mamma were discussing our national difficulties over their evening papers, quite unmindful of Charley, who, in full regimentals of paper hat and wooden sword, was busied in creating, with the help of a chair and half a dozen music-books, a suitable war charger for so distinguished a person to bestride. After attaining his perch with the utmost difficulty, he called out triumphantly, 'Look, mamma, look! I'm General Gov'ment!' As he was in imminent danger of a downfall, nobody disputed the resemblance."

"THE following anecdotes were related to me many years ago by Lord Stowell's valet. I do not know if they have ever appeared in print. I venture to forward them as a contribution to the Editor's Drawer connected with your excellent New Monthly Magazine :

"The late Lord Stowell, better known to the legal fraternity of this country as Sir William Scott, was fond of telling a good joke in his convivial moments, and Mr. R——, the rector of the village in which his lordship's country-seat was situated, always came in for a pretty fair sprinkling. The following anecdote Lord S. would relate, giving it a gusto which it somewhat loses in a recital. A few years before, when Mr. R—— was appointed to the living, he found the church choir very old and very self-willed. Among other peculiarities they always sang the same psalm to the same tune from one year's end to another, in the quaint old style then in vogue, commencing thus :

"All people that on earth do dwell,
To God their cheerful voices raise,' etc.

"Mr. R—— bore this for some time. At length he resolved to have a change, and mentioned the subject to the clerk. 'Amen' solemnly shook his head. 'It will be no use, your Honor; they'll break down.' 'Well,' says the worthy man, by way of compromise, 'they can sing the tune to another psalm of the same metre.' But on the following Sunday the old clerk arose, and with the usual nasal twang again commenced, 'Let us sing unto the praise and glory of God the —— psalm : All people that on earth do dwell.' This was a little more than the reverend gentleman's temper could brook, and stooping down from his reading-desk, exclaimed, in a voice that was intended for a whisper, but loud enough for half the congregation to hear, '—— all people that on earth do dwell! give out something new.'

"His LORDSHIP did not always escape scot-free. On one occasion, at the dinner-table, the servants had placed a fat goose in front of the clergyman. 'I have frequently noticed,' says Lord S., addressing the company, 'that if a fat goose be brought to the table, it is placed before a parson, if there is one present; how is that, Mr. R——?' 'Why, really, my lord, I can not say, nor did I know it was the custom; but there is something so odd in the remark that I am sure I shall never see a goose again, as long as I live, without thinking of your lordship.'"

MILTON speaks of the "darkness of excessive light." The perfection of the artistic poem following is that its faults culminate in positive virtues: it is so outrageously bad as to be actually a curiosity in its way—a real good. Such a talent for the invention of words that are not words, such a power of expression without the use of language hitherto known to books, is rarely if ever bestowed on men. Surely poetry is a divine art: poeta nascitur non fit.

JANIE IN HEAVEN.

Flown, Janie, flown from gleams of sordid earthness,
'Scaped through brief fate unto thy joyful station—
Sweet prelude calm to sparkling seraph birthness,
Where thy young morning pays her first oblation.
Fled from the joys which give but barren dearthness
To richest peace in woless congregation,
From childish glee to loud ecstatic mirthness
Amid the lyres of heaven's enraptured nation.

In strong, and vast, and piercing contemplation,
Designed in bliss to break no circling hearthness,
Nor given again to fleshly degradation.
Amid thy queening mates all thrilling joyful,
Thou reign'st in Jesus' blaze, forever there employful.

No more a child, we yield thee up a goddess;
We yield thee now an ardent dazzling flamer,
Of His tall worth a glad and vigorous laudess;
Through all His realms Christ's own impassioned namer,

'Mid his delights a ranger-wide-abroadess,
Loud with thy mates to be His glory's famer.
Ye of His banners each the standard-rodness—
His justice, mercy, wisdom, love, proclaimer.
Thou not of Him—while yet within thy sodness—
Thou not of Him for mortal sufferings blamer:
No thought of this, thou freshly-loosed goddess,
Shall ever prove of ringing shouts a tamer.
No: memories bring but spirit's quickened motion!
In young disbolied hearts they spring increased devotion!

A Godhead born, mild virgin princess queenly!
Fair sovereign empress, in thy sway thou glowest
In radiant courts, thyself superior sheeny;
Nor infant fancy more in guess bestowest:
Of those pure climes no longer now beweeny,
But thy wrapped thought their darksome mysteries knowest.

On marge reclined against fresh sylvan leany,
Or towers of heights thereon thy subjects showest:
Zionic summits spread their prospects sceny,
Adown whose floods thou oft thy barges flowest.
Full oft the bloomings of the dells are gleany,
Oft skim'st the oceans, oft on lakelets rowest:
And oft, explorer, from the sides of mountains, Glidest down their spouting shafts unto the depths of fountains.

Ye through the sunbeams wander ever, heeding
To every vibrant, every prospect sightly,
Or ride the cloudlets, through the fleeces speeding,
And glance from folds, and flash above them sprightly;
Lodging with birds, where blossoms ever seeding Fling down strange wreaths from distance far aheightly.

And deep withdrawn when star-faint curtains breeding,
The gathered viers cheer the saint-ones brightly
Amid the globes, exhaustless liquors feeding,
Ye, sacred gay, move round your sportings nightly,
Within their glare your dancings treading, leading Wild brisky chases, thrilly, blessed, delightly,
And join your tones, when bursts in invocation,
'Mongst every voice in heaven, the Minstrel of Creation.

A NEW BEDFORD dealer in "notions" says he was done for in this way :

"Dealing in almost every thing, from a fine tooth-comb to a mowing machine, we sometimes sell skates; and buying a lot at auction last fall, we thought to monopolize all the small-boy trade by posting a flaming placard announcing that we sold skates at twenty cents a pair. This attracted all the boys in the street, and great was the inquiry to see our twenty-cent skates; so one frosty morning in comes the hero of our story, and looking over the counter I saw a little fellow, hardly tall enough to reach the top by standing tip-toe. In answer to my inquiry, 'Do for you, my lad?' he asked if we 'had skates for nineteen cents?' I told him our price was twenty, but we would try to accommodate him. 'Well,' says the boy, straightening up to his full length, 'I've got all but eighteen cents, and when I get the rest I guess I'll buy a pair;' and turning on his heel he walked off with as much importance as would one of our oil nabobs about closing a purchase of a cargo of sperm."

"My friend A—— has a bright boy, a little over three years old, and his father and mother are not the only ones who think him ahead of most boys. Let me tell you one or two of his sayings:

"Not long ago his father and mother commenced taking French lessons, and Freddy was sometimes present when they were 'driving at' those peculiar nasal and guttural sounds which every beginner in that study has to master. One day Freddy and his older sister were out riding with me, and we passed a field where some cattle were bellowing as if on a wager. He looked up very serious and earnest, saying, 'H——, be those cows studying French!'"

"Ever after that, when we were on 'Lesson Third,' visions of 'the cattle on a thousand hills' came before me."

SOME twenty or twenty-five years ago, when the good village of Amsterdam, on the Mohawk, boasted a new stone school-house, a new teacher "from Down East," and a new school library (Harper and Brothers' series), the school, or the teacher, or the library, or all of them, were visited by a young lady too far advanced to be a scholar—a kind of Miss Slimmens in literature and love matters—who, after saying the smart things she had fixed for the occasion, and giving her blandest smile to the school (the teacher included), made known her business, which was to get a book for her own reading from the new library. The library was thrown open, and the school went on till, after a long and seemingly difficult search, she made her selection. The teacher took his place at the desk "to record according to law," and inquired the title of the book she had taken. In her prettiest voice she told him she had selected Harper and Brothers. You should have heard, at intermission, the school speculate on the "object of her choice:" one claiming that she expected music from the Harper; another that it was the Brothers she was after; while another, a Miss of sixteen, thought her knowledge of letters would be improved by reading all the books of that title, but roguishly hinted that she ought to have commenced earlier in life.

"I HAVE noticed, once or twice, anecdotes in the Drawer of good old Dr. J——, of Newburgh. The Doctor was very easily affected, and invariably wept while preaching. One Sunday he alluded to an old lady who had died during the week. Having largely expatiated on her worth as a Christian, he alluded to her prayerful habits, and closed his remarks by trying to repeat that beautiful hymn,

"'I love to steal a while away.'"

The Doctor had got thus far without weeping. The congregation were very much affected, but judge of the change when the Doctor said,

"'She loved to steal—'

Here he broke down, and wept for some seconds. Again he tried to repeat the hymn. But when he got as far as he broke down again. For the third time he commenced it, and a third time failed.

"'She loved to steal—'

"I do not suppose the Doctor intended to imply that this was one of her Christian graces; but the excellent man—for he was one of the best men that ever lived—certainly set us to thinking how a good woman could love to steal any thing."

ONE of the many learned contributors to the Drawer, a perfect Dr. Parr indeed, writes:

"Audax sum, Friend Drawer—but then I belong to a race whom the poet characterizes as 'Audax omnia perpeti,' which, freely translated, means 'Bold enough to perpetrate any thing;' and so I claim forgiveness for being so much exercised over two lines from Plato that I send them:

"'Ἀστέρας εἰσαθρεῖς ἀστήρ ἐμός·
Εἶθε γενόιμην
Οὐρανός, ὥς πολλοῖς ὄμμασιν
Εἶς δε βλέπω.'"

Of course I must send you a version of them—and more than one, so that you may choose the best. Will this do?

"'My star—the heavens look love on thee;
Thou gazest at the sky:
Ah! would that I those heavens could be,
And every star an eye.'"

Or this?

"'My star each night looks up at starry skies;
Would I were they,
To gaze on her with heaven's myriad eyes
Till morning gray!'"

Or will you permit me to depart a little from the original, and give you what it suggested to me in the following:

"'Each kindly star of holy night
That gazes on my fair,
To me beams now its eye of light,
And shows her mirror'd there.'"

"There, Sir, I've done my share, now let some other reader of the Drawer render homage to Plato's love epigrams, and oblige S. H."

"PERCY'S CREEK, WILKINSON CO., MISS., February 1, 1861.

"IN the extreme southern section of this State, in the County of F——, dwells as tall and gaunt a specimen as is seldom met with, answering to the name of Ham (whether a descendant of that worthy character of old, history saith not). Both minister and lawyer, he might be said to worship God and the—people. In the capacity of the former some said he possessed a pretty fair reputation; but it is in the latter that he displayed much zeal—some thought he was too zealous, and were impious enough to give vent to the expression of fear they entertained for 'Brother Ham,' of his having to pray mighty hard sometimes. But to the case in point.

"It so happened that he had an 'appointment' to fill in the church of M—— on the Sunday previous to the regular May term of the Circuit Court in F—— County. He chose for his text Revelation xxi. 8, expatiating long, learnedly, and eloquently thereupon, showing forth the evil effects of sinful practices in general, and that of lying in particular. His words seemed to fall upon attentive ears, and upon none more so than old Sister B——'s, who resolved to practice what her minister preached. Now it so happened that on the following week this reverend gentleman of the cloth had quite an important and extremely knotty case to argue in the 'halls of Justice,' in which Sister B—— figured as quite an important witness for the opposite side. The testimony had all been given in with the exception of herself, and Brother Ham had not established a single point; consequently he began to feel as though it were going to prove an unimportant case to him at least, for his was a contingent fee. Matters were growing desperate; the testimony so far had all been against him. Sister B—— was now called to the stand, and after the opposite counsel was through, Brother Ham proceeded to cross-question her. After asking several questions which were in accordance with her testimony already given, he ventured to propound one or two which evidently had a tendency to cause her to contradict herself. This 'insult,' as she styled it afterward, was too great to be borne; and, utterly regardless of time or place, she gave vent to her indignation and astonishment in the following words: 'Wa'al now, Brother Ham, it was only last Sunday that you was a preaching up to me not to tell a lie, and now here you are trying to make me swear to one!' It is needless to say the gravity of the Court was overcome, and that Brother Ham had no more questions to ask old Sister B——."

Was there ever more Irish in a story than in this that a clever correspondent sends to the Drawer?

"After the City of Mexico had surrendered to General Scott, it is well known that the troops were obliged to win their way from house to house and street to street, until they finally expelled the remnant of the Mexican army, which disputed every inch of ground from the gates of the city to the palace. The 2d Regiment United States Infantry (to which the writer belonged), under command of that sterling veteran soldier and honest man, Colonel (afterward General) Bennet Riley, were gaining ground step by step, under a hot fire from house-tops and church-steeple, when Pat Mullony, a private in Company F, made a dash and intrenched himself in a door-way (the door-ways are large, with heavy projecting jams), a full half square in advance of his company, and commenced a spirited fire. When he had fired five shots he was joined by a comrade just as he was preparing for the sixth round, who asked him what he was firing at, and desired a 'chance in.' 'Hist!' says Pat; 'wait till I fetch another of the bla'guards. I have done the business for five of 'em, and there is another waiting to be served the same sauce.' Bang! went his sixth shot, when his comrade, together with two others who had now joined them, exploded with laughter. 'What in the devil's name be ye laughing at, at all, at all?' says Pat. 'Sure didn't I fix his flint nice enough? and, be the powers! there is another spalpeen just stepped in his place, and waiting for a dose,' ramming his cartridge home with energy.

"'Stop, Pat,' said his comrade, 'don't you see you are firing at the Apostles?'

"'And is it the Apostles, is it? Now may the howly St. Pether forgive me!' says Pat, his eyes opening like two saucers as he made the discovery that he had been firing on two life-size statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, which stood on each side of a church-door, about musket-shot down the street. Pat had hit St. Peter six times. It was a standing joke against him, and he never heard the last of it as long as he remained in the regiment."

AND the next is as Irish as the other, and a Yankee is the hero:

"The market in the City of Mexico is in a large square near the Grand Plaza, surrounded by a wall. A soldier who hailed from an Eastern State, and who had become somewhat wild with excitement and aguardiente, gained a position under the walls of the market, and commenced firing, as fast as he could load and aim, over the wall. An officer approached him, and ordered him to point out who and what he was firing at.

"'Wait till I get another shot, Sir. I never missed at that range before, and I am sure this must bring him down;' and he let go again.

"'You big fool!' said the officer, 'you are firing at that statue in the market-place!' Which was the fact—he had been firing at an equestrian statue of Santa Anna!"

AFTER Orleans County, in the State of New York, had been erected from Genesee County into a separate organization, there arose the same old difficulty in reference to locating county buildings, which is the bone of contention, the subject of much dispute, and is often attended with as much difficulty as the creation of a new State. Matters were thus: Albion, in the town of B——, was the most central, being situated upon the Erie Canal, was thought to possess the greatest advantages, both natural and artificial, for the centre of business, the capital of the county. Gaines, the next town north, almost as central, contended that the village of Gaines was most suitable, and was so sanguine of success in the contention that they commenced to erect county buildings, at least a court-house. Being unable to agree, the Legislature appointed General Swift, Victory Birds-eye, and General Hathaway to settle the vexed question. The Commissioners arrived by appointment, and viewed the advantages of location in the village and town of Gaines. They were fêted and treated in as good style as the times would admit of, and next proceeded to visit Albion, and canvass the merits of that village. The merits of the location were discussed, and the advantages of the canal were considered. Next they were invited to visit the extensive hydraulic power near the old cemetery. Now it happened that Mr. Bumpus, familiarly called Old Bump, had the rental or owned a small grist-mill in the woods above the cemetery, out of sight. From this point it was agreed that the Commissioners should view the water-power. Bump had shut the gate by agreement, and a large pond had accumulated (for it was a time of low-water), and just before the Commissioners arrived had raised the gate, and a powerful stream was the result, which at once convinced the Commissioners, whom they took good care not to detain until the pond drained off. This settled the question, and Albion became the county town.

THE rector of a parish in Chenango County, New York, is the happy father of a bright-eyed little girl about two years of age. The father received a call one morning from a gentleman who is the possessor of a most ponderous and prominent nasal protuberance. Little "Ange" (Angeline), who was sitting on her grandmother's lap, at once noticed the extensive appendage, and doubtless struck with the thought that where one person had such a huge amount of gristle others must either be totally deficient or but stintedly supplied, raised her hand to her own face, and on making sure that she had a like organ, slipped from her grandmother's lap, and toddling up to the visitor, still clinging to her nose, exclaimed, with delight, "I've got a nose too!"

The gentleman had the good taste, seemingly, to enjoy the joke hugely, and indulged in a most hearty laugh, in which grandma and father were forced (unwillingly, no doubt) to join.

"Our little Charlie has the faculty of saying the very thing which he should not when in company. He was one day to visit a friend of the family, familiarly known as Aunt Peggy, whose forte it is to tell funny stories. As Charlie was leaving he extended the hospitalities of the family as follows:

"Aunt Peggy, do come up to see us soon; we always like to see you, you talk so foolish!"

"GRACIE B——, our little four-year old, was lately making excursions into Biblical literature, under the guidance of a maiden aunt. She was told of the ravens that brought food to the prophet Elijah, in his solitary exile, night and morning.

"What good ravens!" said Gracie; "but, Aunt Libby, where did Elijah get his dinner from?"

"Aunt Libby" hesitated a moment to frame a proper reply; when Gracie hurriedly exclaimed, as if she feared her aunt might get out the information first:

"Oh, I know! down town—just as papa does!"

"Oh, these children! Elijah dining at Brown's or Delmonico's, and riding up town in a car, holding on by a strap!"

"I HAVE a little friend who is about six years old. The other day he was taken with a fever, and was about to be put to bed. As he did not feel very sick, he insisted on remaining up. While his mother was coaxing and trying to get him to submit to be put into his crib, his aunt—an unmarried lady, of about fifty years—came in the room. Seeing his mad capers she scolded him a little, and said to his mother, 'Why do you let that child carry on so? If he was my child he should have a good flogging, and go to bed.'

"Georgy looked up into his aunt's face, and said, with the most serious countenance in the world: 'I guess when you get a husband you'll have to haul in your horns!'"

"Mrs. C—— was endeavoring to compose her little boy to sleep by singing the familiar nursery-song,

"Jack and Jill went up the hill,

To draw a pail of water;

Jack fell down and broke his crown,' etc.

"Supposing the little fellow was well off into dream-land, she was surprised to hear him 'open very heavy on the yell.' Asking him what was the matter, she was answered, 'I want Jill to help Jack up!'"

ONE of our Boston correspondents writes:

"During the visit of the Prince of Wales to this city I overheard, at a street corner, a conversation between two newsboys, which I think may amuse your readers; it certainly did me. The oldest, a bright little fellow with plenty of rags on his back, having finished counting a handful of coppers, suddenly broke out,

"I say, Teddy! I have a jolly good thing! We can make lots of money out of these Englishers."

"Go ahead," said Teddy, pricking up his ears.

"You see, then, Teddy, that as the procession passes, you shall play the desperate ruffian, and rush upon the Prince with a very sharp dagger, determined to kill him. Every body will cry murder, and nobody will do nothing. You have just grasped the Prince by the throat, and are about to bury the dagger in his heart, when I rush from the crowd, and boldly seize your arm. You fight like a good feller, and holler Blood! blood! all the time. But I am too much for you. I drag you away, and save the Prince. The perlice nab you and hustle you off, while I, wounded and faint, am carried to the Revere House (that's where the fellers stop) and put to bed. I get along very slowly, for I had a narrow escape, you see. I'm a hobject of interest. The Prince and all the other old cocks inquire for me every hour. The papers give the particulars, with big headings, and the fellers cry it around the streets. When the Prince goes off he leaves me a big pile of money, a gold watch, and a seal ring with his picter in it, and begs I will come and see him as soon as I can. Teddy, I shall become a big gun then.' And Mike, in his enthusiasm, gave Teddy a slap that sent him reeling to the nearest wall.

"Teddy looked puzzled. He spoke slowly and doubtfully: 'But, Mike, what will become of me?'

"Oh, you," said Mike, slightly dashed—"you'll be taken to the Perlice Court, where you must play crazy, and they'll let you off easy—two or three years perhaps. And, Teddy," he added, persuasively, "when you come out I'll make your fortin'."

"Teddy rubbed his head and brightened up. 'I say, Mike, it's a jolly good 'un—but s'pose you play the desperate ruffian, and get hustled by the perlice, and all that sort of thing, and I the hobject of interest?'"

"A FEW years since, sitting quietly in my office, a heavy rap at my door introduced a rough, hard-looking man, with wild, hard eyes, and grizzly hair and beard, tolerably well clad, but altogether a pretty hard-looking customer, and, as I soon discovered, with a wooden leg.

"Good-morning, your honor! will yer honor plase to help a poor fellow on toward Boston, where he can get a new leg that'll walk just like this same?" pointing to the sound leg: 'I've got twenty-seven dollars, and if I can make it up to forty, I'll be just the happiest man in the world!'

"Feeling in rather a liberal mood myself, and somewhat struck with the peculiar wild Irish phiz of the man, I asked him how he lost his leg, and whether he had any thing to show that he was 'all right.' 'God bless yer honor! jist read all thim papers,' and forthwith began to fumble in his pockets for documents. Satisfied that he was a 'proper case,' and feeling disposed to make him 'happy,' I handed him five dollars (evidently more than he expected), accompanied with the injunction that if I should ever lose a leg and apply to him he must help me in return.

"The poor fellow seemed overcome with gratitude, and exclaimed, with tears in his eyes, 'Oh, yer honor, never doubt Mike O'Conner! God bless yer honor! Oh, I wish yer honor could just now lose a leg, or an arm, or the like, just to see how quick I'd hand ye back these same!" and then, as if fearful that he had said something to possibly forfeit his five dollars, which he clutched in his brawny hand, he added: "But, God bless yer honor, ye'll never come to that—no, no!" and shuffling out as fast as possible, with his eyes fixed on his money, he put his wild face back in the door, exclaiming, "No, yer honor, ye shall never come to that; but if you do—if you do—God bless yer honor, jist inquire for one Michael O'Conner with the wooden leg!" thus showing a very warm and grateful heart under a very rough exterior."

"EVERY one in Western Illinois knows 'Nigger Brown,' and his taste for playing poker; and I am sorry to say there are some white men willing to give a practical demonstration of 'nigger equality' by playing with him. Some years ago Brown was playing his favorite game with old B—— H——. When each had bet his pile H—— called, and Brown threw down four aces on the table, when H—— coolly threw down five aces. 'Nine aces in twenty-card poker!' exclaimed the astonished son of Africa. 'Take de money, Mr. H——; take de money; dat beat de oldest man in de world!' And, to crown all, a by-stander picked up the cards, and found three aces remaining in the deck!"

"The following return was made by a constable in one of the counties of Illinois:

"Served the within summons on the wrong man."

"MR. DRAWER,—My wife is a very dear, loving, little woman, and an excellent housekeeper. For instance: On her birthday she moved her low rocking-chair close to my side. I was reading the Drawer. She placed her dear little hand lovingly on my arm, and moved it along softly toward my coat-collar. I felt nice all over! I certainly expected a kiss. Dear, sweet, loving creature!—an angel! She moved her hand up and down my coat-sleeve:

"'Husband,' says she.

"'What, my dear?'"

"'I was just thinking—'"

"'Was you, my love?'"

"'I was just thinking how nicely this suit of clothes you have on would work into a rag-carpet!'"

"Not long ago the colored congregation in our village was scandalized by the 'Mormon proclivities' of one of their worthy members. Walking down street one day, Brother A, their preacher, took Brother B, the offending member, 'to task.' Brother B listened silently to Brother A's long lecture on the wickedness of the course he was pursuing. After he had concluded, Brother B replied, very emphatically,

"'Brudder A, did you know Brudder H, what libbed down to Mount Pleasant?'"

"'Oh yes,' says Brother A, 'I knew him well.'"

"'Well,' says Brother B, 'he had two wives, and when he die, he die triumphant!'"

"An anecdote is told by some of the lawyers of Central Illinois as having happened in the early history of Piatt County which will bear a more extended hearing:

"Soon after the county was organized, and before a jail for the confinement of prisoners was constructed, as the circuit Judge was holding one of their first courts, one Jake A—— caused much disturbance in court one day by loud talking, etc. The Judge, after calling him to order once or twice without effect, ordered the sheriff to take him out of the room, there being no jail where such contempts could be punished by confinement. After being liberated by the sheriff on the outside, Jake, who was just drunk enough to have no sense, went around to a window opposite the Judge's stand, and stripping off his coat, rolled up his sleeves, and in the most contemptuous manner, with boisterous and profane language challenged his Honor to come out and fight him. Without taking other notice of the gross contempt than to order the sheriff to remove the nuisance, the Judge, from inability to inflict any proper punishment, allowed the incident to pass.

"The next morning, at the coming together of the court, the Judge, after consulting with the attorneys, ordered Jake brought before him for the purpose of giving him a mild reprimand, hoping, as he was now duly sober, he would manifest due penitence for his misbehavior on the day previous. Jake, upon the invitation of the sheriff, walked into court as if conscious of no conduct but that of the most elevated and ennobling character. 'Mr. A——,' said the Judge, 'you acted very disorderly yesterday, in the presence of the Court, for which it is my duty to punish you; but as you were much intoxicated at the time, it is thought best to allow you an opportunity for explanation. What have you to say in exculpation of yourself?'"

"During this brief but pointed reprimand, Jake eyed his Honor closely, the while conscious of his safety both from punishment by imprisonment and fine; for on one hand there was no jail, and on the other Jake was as poor as poverty itself; and at the conclusion he stretched himself up and said,

"'Well, Judge, I know I was rather boisterous yesterday; but, Judge, you was a leetle too fast yourself!'"

"This ended the reprimand; for seeing him wholly incorrigible, the helpless Judge ordered him away, and went on with the business."

THE following official document, cut from an Illinois newspaper, deserves embalming in the Drawer:

PROCLAMATION.

Issued by the Mayor of Dallas City. March 5th, 1861.

THAT it is reported by good authority that we had a MAD DOG to visit our city, a few nights since, a few nights ago he was seen in the evening just above town, laying by the bridge, and the next day was KILLED at Pontcosuc, after BITING several dogs in that place. We think he must have traveled through this place in the night, and we know not how soon some of the dogs here, may be taken with HYDROPHOBIA and perchance do considerable damage. I therefore, notify, the MARSHALL of this City, that he notifies all those persons within the City, that have a dog or dogs running at large through the City, to CHAIN him or them up, and on their refusing or neglecting to do so, the Marshall is hereby authorised to kill or have killed, such dogs as may find belonging to this town, not chained or running at large.

JAMES GASAWAY. MAYOR.

AN afflicted mother says: "A few days ago my little boy, five years old, was confined to the house in consequence of bad weather. As is usual in such cases, he was extremely troublesome and fidgety, and, in consequence, received a number of scoldings in the course of the morning. At last he looked up at me with a face full of indignation, and exclaimed, 'Mother, if all the bears in the world were one bear, and that bear had a sore head, it wouldn't be any crosser than you are!'"

GEOGRAPHICAL.—AN AISEY-ATTIC.

THEOLOGICAL.—THE DIET OF WORMS.

"THE finest telescope in our city," says a correspondent whose name and address are not for the public, "is owned by Mr. Johnson, who has great pleasure in introducing his friends to the heavenly bodies by the aid of his powerful instrument. A few days ago, when the evening-star was peculiarly beautiful to be seen, he asked his neighbor in business down town to call in some evening and take a look at Venus through the telescope. His friend took the number of the house; but when he called, shortly after, he made a mistake, and pulled the bell at the wrong door. Asking for Mr. Johnson, he was told that he was out, but his wife was in. He was shown into the parlor, to wait for the gentleman to return; but being politely received by the lady, he made known the object of his call—he had been invited to take a look at Venus! The excellent lady was not a little surprised by such an application, but presuming it was all right, sent to the kitchen for the colored cook, who rejoiced in the lovely name of the goddess of love. Venus came at the call; and, arms akimbo, presented herself at the parlor-door to the astonished gaze of the stranger. 'There must be some mistake here,' he said. 'I was invited by Mr. Johnson to call and look at the planet Venus through his telescope.' 'Oh, dear me!' exclaimed the lady, 'Mr. Johnson lives next door, and spends half the night among the stars. This is Mr. Thompson's; and the servant at the door must have misunderstood the name!'

"Begging ten thousand pardons for his blunder, the gentleman pursued his astronomical observations next door, and the two hundred pound Venus sunk below the horizon, to shine more brightly in the light of her peculiar sphere."

"Not a few of your readers in Vermont remember well the dignified 'look and mien' of the late Chief-Justice Chase, of that State, a man of great ability and marked characteristics. With his many noble qualities of head and heart, his old confrères at the bar and in the Senate had to recognize an irascible temper, that would sometimes break forth inordinately. Once, while presiding Judge of one of the County Courts, an appeal case from a Justice of the Peace came up before him, so small and contemptible in its origin that he was for tossing all the parties out of court without form of law. It appeared from the statement of the plaintiff's counsel that a turkey had trespassed upon the garden of a neighbor, and got shot for his hobbling and gobbling. The owner brought suit to recover damages of the neighbor who shot the turkey; and failing before the Justice, appealed. The moment the counsel revealed the sum and substance of the case the Judge cried out, in great anger,

"'Mr. Clerk, strike that case from the docket!' Then turning to the lawyer, exclaimed, with indignant emphasis, 'Why do you come here with such a case? Why don't you refer your little dispute to some of your honest neighbors?'

"'May it please your Honor,' replied the lawyer, 'we don't mean honest men shall have any thing to do with it!'

"Trial progressed."

"In a warm contest, a number of years since, for a seat in Congress, between that old prince of electioneers, John Taliaferro, and Colonel Gibson, the former had been successful in obtaining the support of a numerous family by the name of Fritter. It was the custom at that day, in Virginia, for the candidates to take their seats on the court bench during the election, and to thank each individual as he cast his vote, the voting being viva voce. As the members of this family came forward and severally cast their votes, Mr. T., with a graceful bow, would exclaim, 'Thank you, Mr. Fritter.' His opponent, Colonel G., who had not been aware of the great number of this family, stood it patiently until about fifteen had cast their votes against him, when, losing his patience, he exclaimed, 'Well, really I think we have had fritters enough; I am quite tired of them, and should greatly prefer some pancakes!'

"I was visiting at a farm-house in the neighborhood of the Jerseys last summer, where they have the usual (or an unusually large) number of the feathered tribe, but Lord of the Isles was an immense Shanghai rooster, who, like all other men, liked to keep the other sex in submission. This King Shanghai was a constant source of annoyance to the farmer, by digging up the garden and scratching out the grain, until his patience was exhausted, and he had several times threatened his life. But being a very handsome species and a great favorite with the mistress of the house, his life had been spared by her intercession. One day I was taking a walk through a newly-planted field of corn with Mr. M——, the master, and happening to hear a slight cackling ahead of us, we spied Master Rooster walking along, with all the airs of a Napoleon, only stopping at each corn-hill to dig out the grain which had just sprouted, and was nice and tender, and easily digested. He had gone on in this way, and by his own unaided efforts (for he would not permit another to venture on his ground) had succeeded in devouring several rows. Mr. M—— made a rush at poor S., and grasping him by the back of the neck walked off to the wood-pile, while I flew on the wings of love to the house to tell his intercessor; and between us both I don't think any poor criminal accused of murder had more eloquent pleading. At last he hit upon an expedient, and, much to our relief, poor Shanghai escaped with his beautiful cockscorn, but minus his toes. Mr. M—— placed his feet upon the chopping-block, and with a couple of blows of the axe severed all his toes, and left the poor fellow with only the stumps to walk about on. He very nearly bled to death; but a few days after I saw him walking about almost as lively as ever. Things went on quite favorably until one day I saw Mr. Rooster, like Brigham Young, calling his numerous wives about him to make, I suppose, a stump speech. After the oration was delivered he selected a couple of the finest hens, and sending them before him he followed in their wake—not with his usual dignity, though, but like a Chinese lady with her feet bandaged—to the same corn-field. I was watching in breathless anxiety to see the next move; and you can imagine my surprise and amusement to see the two hens walk deliberately up to each hill, and after they had scratched a while and laid bare the corn, march off to the next hill, while Master Rooster would walk up and pick up the delicate grains they had uncovered for him. Oh the devotion of the sex to the lords of creation!"

"THE practice of drinking whisky prevails very extensively in Kansas, as it does in most new countries. An acquaintance of mine was trudging over the prairies the other day, facing a cold wind, when, meeting a friend, he was asked, 'Will you take a nip?' 'Yes, certainly,' was the reply; 'have you any thing good?' 'Bought it at Troy [our county seat] for the best.' But, lo! when the bottle came out its contents were frozen solid! The vendor, upon being told the fact, said that perhaps a mistake had occurred, and that he had probably filled the bottle with some whisky which was only summer strained!"

"In our neighborhood lived Lyme Stone, universally known as Squire Stone, who occupied a fine house, carried on a large farm, and endeavored, when he over-imbibed, to keep within doors at home, and retain the good opinion of his townsmen by keeping his bad habits out of sight. His wife seconded him in this attempt, as will be seen. He told her one day that he had seen a drover in an adjoining town, and offered to sell him certain of his cattle for two hundred dollars; but the drover, relying on his description, thought one hundred and seventy-five dollars enough for them; and added, 'I shall let him have them, if he will give no more, as hay is scarce, and their value is depreciating every day. He will be here to-morrow to look at them.'

"The next morning the Squire commenced with a big 'eye-opener,' followed by several of lesser magnitude, which, in their turn, were succeeded by numerous drinks.

"At dinner-time 'might have been seen' Squire Stone sprawling on a bed, 'drunk clean through.' Soon after dinner Mr. Lamb, the drover, called. Mrs. Stone told him the Squire was about the place somewhere, and if he would examine the cattle, perhaps the Squire would return (to consciousness I suppose she meant) by the time he was ready to trade. The drover repaired to the barn, and the wife to pinch and punch her lord and master into a state of consciousness. The drover waited until his patience was exhausted, and was about leaving, when Mrs. S. remarked that she had heard the Squire say that he might have the cattle for two hundred dollars, and if he chose to take them at that price he might pay her the money and drive them away. This paved the way for negotiation, and the upshot of the matter was that the lady received the one hundred and seventy-five dollars, and Mr. Lamb went away with the cattle. The Squire, waking up about sundown, took a drink and went to the barn. Missing the cattle, he returned to his spouse for explanation, which he received; and as he had not a high opinion of the abilities of women when exercised outside of their household affairs, was disappointed in the price received; and being vexed with himself for letting rum get the better of him, he berated the poor woman soundly, pouring out his wrath for her presumption in taking management of farm affairs, and winding up with these words: 'Mrs. Stone, I will thank you not to administer on my estate until I am dead.'

"The old lady, quietly raising her spectacles from her tear-moistened eye, said, in the most subdued voice imaginable, 'Squire Stone, I thought you was dead. You have been "laid out" all the afternoon!'"

"An old 'Down East' customer was in the store the other day, and I inquired the whereabouts of a man in the same line of business in a town adjoining his own—whether he had failed, run away, or what had become of him, etc. His reply was, 'Oh, he ain't failed; he is rich, and is just mean enough to be.' They tell a story about him, but I don't know whether it is true, or one of those newspaper yarns; at any rate, they all say it is true as gospel:

"When he began to dicker he had a horse and wagon, and went peddling all through the State—different sorts of notions—and was at that time courting a real pretty girl who lived with her uncle's family as help. One morning, as he was about to leave to be gone some time, he called at the house to bid Amanda good-by. She, with tears in her eyes, followed him to the door, feeling 'real sorry' he was going to be gone so long; and as he was about to step on the wagon, said, 'Oh, Amasa! I wish I had something to give you to remember me by while you are away. Can't you think of any thing I have got that you would like to take?'"

"'Well, yes,' said Amasa; 'I guess you might give me that five-dollar bill your uncle paid you last week. I should like that better than any thing else I can think on.'"

"WHEN I was a boy I had a playmate, Charlie, a noble-hearted little fellow, who did not inherit that trait of character from his father. One rainy afternoon we were playing in the barn, when Charlie's father arrived home from a day's absence in the city. While unharnessing the horse Charlie's 'paternal' asked where the hens were. Charlie didn't know—guessed they had gone to roost.

"'Gone to roost!' cried old Squeezebags, in a terrible rage. 'Gone to roost at five o'clock in the afternoon, and you here playing! You go at once and scare them off, and drive them out of doors, or I'll "roost" you! They can see to peck an hour yet!'"

"Charlie left to obey orders, and I started for home."

THE Nashville Christian Advocate says that one of the preachers was holding forth on looking not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. The preacher had occasion to use the words visible and invisible. "Now, brethren," quoth he, "some of you may not understand these words. I will explain them to you." Stretching up at full length, with arms extended—"Do you see me now? Y-e-s. Well, this is visible." Squatting down behind the pulpit—it was one of those old-time high ones—he cried out, de profundis, "See me now? N-o. This is invisible."

FROM the rapidly-growing Nebraska Territory an intelligent correspondent writes to the Drawer on this wise:

"I have just received from a friend in Denver City the following answer to a petition for a divorce, which is too good to be lost. I therefore send it to you for exposure to the admiring gaze of the funny world.

"Last spring John Howard and his wife, Mary E—, left this city for the land of golden promise, Pike's Peak. After arriving at Denver City, John left his lady and went up into the mountains. Mary not liking, probably, to be left alone, and John rather liking to be relieved of the cares of double blessedness, did not return. All of which—with, perhaps, some other provocation—was considered by the fair Mary as a just cause for a divorce. So she applied to the Chancery Court of Denver for a release from the bonds of matrimony with the said John. Judge D——, who presides over that august institution, ordered the publication of the petition to be made in the city papers, and also requiring the truant John to appear on a day named in the notice before the Honorable Court, and show cause, if any he had, why the said application for a divorce should not be granted.

"John happened to see the paper containing the notice while ruralizing at Canon City, and at once set himself down to answer the petition, which he thus did:

"MARY E. HOWARD, }
vs. } "Answer of deft. to plff's.
"JOHN HOWARD. } petition for a divorce, in Court of Chancery, Denver City, Jefferson Territory.

"To the Plaintiff in the above action.

"Whereas, having been cited through the public press of Denver to appear before one Judge D——, of the above-elected Court, to show cause why your prayer to be divorced from me should not be granted, I, the said defendant, take this opportunity to relieve you from all embarrassment in the matter, by sending you a quit-claim deed to all my right, title, and interest whatsoever in you, leaving a blank to be filled up by the name of the party by whom you may in future be claimed. Hoping you will fully appreciate my good feeling in the matter, I will proceed to give you the said promised quit-claim deed, as follows, to wit:

"Know all men [and one woman], by these presents, that I, John Howard, of Canon City, of the first part, do hereby grant, bargain, convey, and quit-claim all my right, title, and interest to the undivided whole of the ancient and unreal estate known as Mary E. Howard, the title to which I acquired by occupation, possession, and use, situated at present in the town of Denver, J. T., together with all the improvements made by me thereon and therein, with all the use, rents, profits, and appurtenances therein any wise appertaining unto; to B——, of the second part, to have and to hold unto the said B——, so long as he can keep her without recourse upon the indorser.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 24th day of January, A.D. 1861.

"Signed JOHN HOWARD. [L. S.]

"Signed in presence of A. Rudd, Clerk of Canon City, District Civil Court, per Wilber F. Stone, Deputy."

"It is said that the answer and deed were satisfactory."

EVERY one has heard and will remember how Tom Marshall was once engaged in a lawsuit before a Magistrate, and a point of evidence being decided against him he became slightly irritated, but with the blandest expression he could assume under the circumstances, he said to the Magistrate,

"I wish your Worship would fine me five dollars for contempt of Court."

"The Court is not aware of any contempt, Mr. Marshall, for which you should be fined."

"Well, I feel a most profound contempt for this Court," responded Marshall, with that peculiar twitching of the facial nerves for which he is so remarkable. There was a roar of laughter from the crowd. And now for an imitation:

The other day a young lawyer of this county was employed to prosecute a man indicted for larceny before a committing court composed of three magistrates. On hearing the testimony they refused to commit the prisoner to jail. Our lawyer, whose name is M'Kay, had heard the above anecdote of Marshall, and concluded to take revenge on the magistrates. He accordingly began the attack.

"I wish your Worships would fine me five dollars for contempt of Court."

"Why, Mr. M'Kay?"

"Because I feel a very decided contempt for the Court."

"Your contempt for the Court is not more decided than the Court's contempt for you," was the response of one of the magistrates.

This was a stinging retort, and Mac felt it; but another worshipful member of the Court—a dry, hard-looking old blacksmith—put in a blow that finished the work, and completely demolished the young lawyer:

"We mout fine you," he said, "but we don't know which one of us you'd want to borrow the money from to pay it with."

The laugh was against Mac. He was a notorious borrower when he could find a lender.

"In the town of T——, not many miles from here, there was a shoemaker who at times officiated as preacher of the Universalist persuasion. He always wrote the notices himself, in order to save the expense of printing. Here is one of them:

"There will be preaching in the pines opposite the United States Hotel this Sunday afternoon on the Subject 'All who do not believe will be damned at three o'clock.'"

A revolution, almost as complete as those which South American generals proclaim in the politics of their countries, has been attempted in the Kingdom of Fashion. To do justice to it, we must quote, with abridgment, the language of an enthusiastic reporter for the newspaper press. He says:

"One of those important revolutions which take place sometimes in the empire of Fashion, as well as in the realm of any other potentate, has sprung upon us. It is no trifling innovation, no slight alteration, no inconsiderable addition, but a radical, fundamental change. The full skirt which the present generation so much affected has been repudiated, and in its place we have the quaint old-fashioned GORED SKIRT of our grandmothers and great-grandmothers. The premonitory symptoms of this change have been apparent to the observing philosophic eye in the gored outer garments in which ladies have perambulated Broadway for some time past. The moralist and the politician may both deduce a useful lesson from this fashionable revolution; and it is this—that while the lesser lights of fashion were trifling away their time and distracting public attention, fluctuating between the admissibility of belts, waists, and pointed waists, flowing sleeves or tight sleeves, the real point of danger was overlooked, and their insignificant local sleeve and waist squabbles were overwhelmed in the general cataclysm which has fallen upon us. But we do not hesitate to say that, like all sensible, practical people, we give in our adhesion to the powers that be, and we venture to assert that the gored skirts will, when they become, as it were, naturalized among us, be very popular with New York ladies.—The SKIRT is worn as long as ever, trailing a little in the back, and very full at the bottom, where it measures seven yards in width.

The skirt is gored, and each gore is piped, generally with some color that contrasts tastefully with the dress, or if it be a figured silk, the prevailing color of the pattern is used for piping. Some of these skirts are made with flounces almost to the waist, others with alternate folds and flounces; but it is generally conceded that the most distingué are those which have three or four small flounces, or rather frills, around the extreme end of the skirt. This permits the graceful sweep of the skirts to be plainly distinguished, and if the gores are piped with contrasting colors, the gay diversity is not concealed. Two tiny pockets are arranged on the front breadths, which are plain, and the dress is closed in front with buttons, or trimmed with nœuds of ribbon or velvet. Any misguided individual consoling himself or herself with the idea that this style will take less material will soon find out their mistake; a dress measuring seven yards round the edge of the skirt will not be a very economical one. There is still another way of trimming the skirt which we must not omit to mention, and that is, that the flouncing is carried up the gores, thus developing another way of disposing of the material, which appears to be the desideratum of the present régime. This style offers a security that the hoop skirts will still be indispensable, for the gored skirt requires a kind of frame to show its proportions. The CORSAJE may be considered as a kind of appendage to the skirt, being frequently cut out with it in the one piece. It is made high to the throat, and generally without trimming. The only kind which this style admits is a surplice trimming crossing the shoulders and terminating at the waist. It sometimes extends as far in front as the pockets. There is nothing arbitrary about the fashion of the SLEEVE; it is the only portion of the dress which may be regarded as free. All the varieties which have pleased and puzzled us for the last two or three seasons still remain—the flowing, the slashed, the puffed, the Georgian, and many others. The latter is a very handsome flowing sleeve."

WHAT next? This is the great question of human life, which equally puzzles the brain of the statesman and the noddle of the cobbler. The heir of a million is vexed with it, and it trembles on the lips of him who has eaten his last crust. The successful man avoids asking it, the beaten fears to answer it. It is signified by the earliest glimmer of speculation in the eye of infancy, and is the last expressive query ere the light of life goes out. Happy is that man who daily finds his answer in the law of a benignant necessity. Thrice happy he whose confiding faith shall solve the problem in the end.

As we sat at breakfast on the morning after the Lowell circus I asked the question, "What next, Dick?"

My companion had been unusually quiet during the meal, and now responded to my interrogatory with more mildness and hesitation of manner than was usual with him.

"I think, Cousin Robert, I would like to go back to Boston."

He blushed as he said this, and at the same time made a great pretense of cutting up his beef-steak, but I observed that he ate none of it after all.

"Go back to Boston!" I exclaimed, "to enjoy a repetition of the heat and dullness I heard you complain of so frequently while there! Why, Dick, what's the matter?"

My young friend was by this time in a state of crimson confusion, but he spoke up resolutely: "Cousin Robert, to tell you the plain truth, if it does not interfere with any plans of yours, I should like very much to have another opportunity of going to see—"

"Oh!" I interrupted, "you still entertain the idea of going to sea. Very well; if you are so determined, you can doubtless find a ship in Boston."

"Cousin Robert, don't make game of me, and I will be confidential with you. I am desperately in love."

"Good Heavens, Dick, is it possible that you are not cured yet? Six weeks of absence compounded with change of scene and salt-water! It is almost incredible."

Dick laughed, and answered in his balmy manner: "Cousin, you are older and wiser than I, and what you told me of the curative powers of salt-water I have found eminently true. I have not thought of Nelly Hardy since we entered New Bedford, I am sure. But you must recollect I was in love with Miss Prue Teazle when she was in Virginia two years ago."

I laid down my knife and fork, and opening my eyes as wide as possible, stared at my vis-à-vis in silent astonishment. The purposed impression of solemnity was defeated, however, by an uncontrollable fit of laughter which seized me.

"Well, well, my old cock," cried Dick. "You may jeer and ridicule to your heart's content; but didn't I see you were more than half gone with her yourself the other evening, and expected to get that bouquet, which you didn't?"

I immediately recovered my dignity.

"Come, boy, that will do. You haven't the wit of a gopher. Do you suppose that a man of sense and experience can not show his admiration for a young lady's wit and beauty without being in love with her?"

"Excuse me, Cousin Bob. Of course I was just joking about her, for it was plain to see it was the other one, Miss Stickley, that you were captivated with, and I think the flame was mutual."

"Get out with your impertinence, you dis-tempered puppy! But tell me, Dick, did you call on Miss Teazle after the evening we spent there?"

"To be sure I did! Politeness required that I should call next day; and I apologized for your neglect—told her you had engagements."

"The devil take you, Dick; I'm much indebted to you."

"Then I called twice afterward, and I tell you they have an elegant establishment. Such a pair of carriage-horses—it is enough to make one's mouth water; and Miss Prue's riding pony—he looks as if he was covered with black satin; you couldn't soil a white kid glove on his hide."

"Poor Nelly Hardy!" I exclaimed. "I used to think that the Squire had some pretty good stock on his place."

"Perhaps he has," said Dick, puckering his brows; "that is well-bred stock of his, I know—very fast too. But you see, Cousin Robert, they are not kept up like the animals here. Why, their stable over there is a showier building than Squire Hardy's house."

"Very well, youngster, we'll return to Boston, as you seem to desire it so earnestly. There is something very attractive at first sight in this educated life; this finished artificiality; this trim refinement manifest in all the details of living; but in the midst of its allurements I only yearn the more for wild nature's grace and freedom. The unpruned tangle-wood of the primeval forest—the clear unsophisticated eye of the prairie colt, guileless of bit or saddle."

Breakfast over, we walked to the dépôt to get information about the trains for Boston. As we entered the building we found one just starting for Portland, and my attention was attracted by the erect, portly figure of an elderly gentleman accompanied by a very stylish-looking young lady. They stood with their backs to us, and seemed to be interested in the movements of the porters about the baggage car. Suddenly she spoke up.

"There, papa, I recognize our porter with the trunks; now let us get in and be seated, for the train is about starting."

At these commonplace words Dick commenced tugging at my arm like a ten-pound bluefish.

"I say, Cousin, did you hear that?" he exclaimed, pulling me with all his might toward the platform of the car. I pulled back with equal determination, insisting that I had heard the remark, but could not perceive that it had any significance for us.

"Did you hear that voice? She is a Virginian, as sure as I live!" and he exhibited so much agitation of manner that I feared he had lost his wits, and forcibly prevented his following them into the car.

"Let me go and see the baggage," he said.

So I released him, and he ran rapidly toward the car, where they were still chucking in belated trunks.

In a few moments the train went off, and I moved slowly toward the door of the building to rejoin my comrade. Presently there was a movement in the crowd, and I saw a board of plaster images flying in the air above the heads of the people. A crash and loud voices followed, and I hurried forward to see the fun. There, to my horror, I discovered Dick, the centre of an amazed circle, attended on one side by a policeman, and on the other by the jabbering and gesticulating Lucchese cast vendor. Around them lay scattered the débris of birds, beasts, saints, emperors, republicans, and flower-pots, mingled in common and undistinguished ruin. Dick was all red and excited, and as soon as he laid eyes on me, he exclaimed:

"By thunder, Cousin Robert, I knew it—it was she; I saw her initials on the trunk—E. H. I knew I couldn't be mistaken, and if it hadn't been for this d—d fool with his crockery I'd have been on the train with them."

"You should have thanked him

for stopping you instead of smashing his wares," I said; "you had neither purse nor baggage."

The policeman tipped me a facetious wink: "On a spree, I guess—begun early in the day—but it won't cost much. The whole lot isn't worth more than a dollar or two."

I gave him to understand, in an undertone, that there was neither drink nor insanity in the case; but that the youngster had missed his sweet-heart, who was on the departing train. The officer laughed good-humoredly, and forthwith released his prisoner from manual durance. While adjusting his rumpled collar Dick turned to the bereaved sculptor and asked what was the damage.

"Oh Signore," cried the Lucchese, "to pay for all that magnificent statuary fifty dollars would not suffice!"

At the mention of this sum Dick was taken somewhat aback. "Fifty dollars!" he exclaimed. "If I had known it was going to cost that much I'd have kicked your head off at the same time."

"Give him two dollars and let him go," said the officer.

The statuary regarded him with an injured air, and declared he would sacrifice himself so far as to accept ten dollars. Meanwhile I had been looking over the pieces, and being something of a connoisseur in the arts, I was enabled to make a rough estimate of the loss, which amounted to about two dollars and thirty cents at market prices. This I went over with an authoritative air, stating the number of pieces broken and their prices. The cast vendor's countenance fell.

"Gentlemen," said he, "if I take less than three dollars I shall be reduced to ruin and beggary."

"Here are five, which will pay for your loss and your fright. Go your ways and prosper."

As we returned to our hotel I questioned my companion as to the identity of the parties who went off on the train, receiving his confirmatory statements with an interest which he little suspected.

"So now, Dick, after your exploit of the morning, the sooner we're off for Boston the better."

"Boston!" he exclaimed, with a look of astonishment. "Why, Cousin, they're on their way to the White Mountains—the porter told me so!"

"Squire Hardy and daughter, you mean. I regret that we missed seeing them; but the young lady in Boston?"

"Cousin Robert," said Dick, in a persuasive tone, "why not go to the White Mountains? I've heard so much talk about them."

"And Miss Teazle, Dick?"

Dick hesitated and stammered, in a way that showed more perplexity than indecision.

"Cousin Robert," quoth he, "you may think me a very absurd and unreliable person. Indeed I scarcely understand myself; but do you know that from the moment I heard Ellen Hardy's voice down there, all that nonsense about Miss Prue has gone out of my head?"

"All that nonsense has departed suddenly, to make way for a fresh arrival. Why, I thought Ellen Hardy had treated you badly, and you were running away from her all this time."

A momentary shadow passed over my young friend's face as I said this; but quickly recovering himself, he protested that he had entirely got over his love, and only viewed the lady in the light of a friend; but he "did like the old gentleman—a jolly old cock!" and, in short, he had been away so long that he was dying to see somebody from the neighborhood of home. As I had nothing to urge against these arguments, we took tickets for the White Mountains, by way of Portland, and were soon on our way there with locomotive speed.

On the morning we started a northeaster had covered the land with a wet Newfoundland fog, so that our observations of the country between Lowell and Portland were limited to views of the railway stations where we stopped. At one of these places I saw a bench full of individuals who looked as if they had been celebrating the ever-glorious Fourth; but as that day had not arrived yet, and, moreover, as we were in Maine, I came to the conclusion that they were only sleepy, or perhaps victims of that tyrannical liquor law.

At Portland we found a good hotel, and a well-built town set upon several hills, commanding, from different points, beautiful views of the harbor and the sea. Of this latter enjoyment we were deprived by the everlasting fog. Passing part of a day and a night here, we took passage next morning on the Grand Trunk Railroad for Gorham, intending to reach Mount Washington from that point.

As we drove inland we presently got out of the fog-bank, and had the satisfaction of seeing the face of the earth again smiling in sunshine. The villages are built generally of wood—neat, but not so tastefully ornamented as those of Massachusetts. There were extensive natural nurseries of evergreens, of such variety and richness as might excite the envy and admiration of tree-fanciers; while, on the other hand, there was little to flatter the utilitarian eye of the agriculturist accustomed to the broad corn-fields of the Middle and Western States.

If not particularly promising in corn, these fields however exhibited an astonishing fertility in scarecrows, impressing the stranger with amazing ideas of the boldness and voracity of the crows in this climate, as also of the wonderful inventive genius of the white inhabitants.

A very gentlemanly-looking gray-headed man, who sat in front of us, had overheard our facetious and disparaging comments; and as we stopped upon the outskirts of a village, he turned, and pointing to a group in front of a cottage that stood hard by, he said,

"Gentlemen, there is the most valuable crop raised in this country."

I recalled and repeated the lines of Alcæus of Mytilene:

"What constitutes a state?

Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,

Thick wall, or moated gate;

Not cities fair, with spires and turrets crowned:

No—Men! high-minded men!"

The old gentleman's face gleamed with delight, and half-rising in his seat, he began where I stopped and finished the piece:

"With powers as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake, or den,

As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude—

Men, who their duties know,

But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain;

Prevent the long-aimed blow,

And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain."

Ere the first line had passed his lips I recognized the master who had taught me to recite the verses, and as he closed we were exchanging a cordial double shake of the hands, while tears stood in the old man's eyes.

"Dick Dashaway, don't you know your old schoolmaster, Almont Ferule?"

A momentary sullenness had clouded Dick's face as he remembered the tender years of his boyhood; but it cleared off at this appeal, and he joined in the greeting as warmly as any of us.

For twenty years Almont Ferule had administered in the Academy of our native village in Virginia. With him I had completed my academic course; and under his auspices Dick had been initiated into the sorrows of classical wisdom. The history of his reign would be the history of a mimic state. At its commencement Power and Dignity sat enthroned behind the Teacher's desk, and the baton of command—a long flat cherry ruler—served the double purpose of ruling the good boys' copy-books and the stubborn souls of the bad. For, in those days, the mawkish and licentious sentimentality which denies all right to law, and robs all authority of its virility, had not yet obtained general public credit. The teacher was a despot in his realm, from whose decrees there was no appeal. The rod was his ultima ratio, and always ready; and if he did occasionally condescend to verbal reasoning with his subjects, he assured himself of their ears in a manner which forbade inattention. Under this sort of government the Academy prospered, and the boys learned something. But in the progress of things it began to be discovered that the model man of the New World, in his rapid approximation to perfection, had outgrown the ideas of a former age, and felt the necessity of casting his shell, like a last year's crab.

As the sphere rolls so floats the bubble. From the great state the little community learns its lessons. In the school there arose at first sullen murmurings, discontents, conspiracies; then rebellions and open war. Old Ferule stood his ground like a true king; he whacked, boxed, and expelled, with a royal faith in the divinity of his right. The rebels bemoaned their sufferings, and showed their wounds to mammas; and indignant mammas appealed to loving papas. The whole village rose against the bloody tyrant. Ferule quoted Solomon—"Spare the rod, and spoil the child." "Who was Solomon? Hadn't our ancestors fought and bled for freedom?" The dethroned pedagogue squared his accounts, packed his trunk, and returned to his kindred. Since that day the great untrammelled Democratic man has advanced with unparalleled speed toward the goal of human perfectibility, leaving behind him in the race Honor, Decency, and English Grammar.

Our old friend was now going on a visit to a married sister who lived some distance off the road, in a region abounding in fish and small game. He habitually passed his summers there for the purpose of recruiting his health; and as he took leave of us at the next station he pressed us earnestly to accompany him, promising fine sport with trout, pike, and salmon. I was disposed to accept the invitation, but Dick had other views; so we went on to Gorham.

On landing here we found ourselves in the midst of a fine mountain country. At the station is a large hotel, and a bear chained to a pole, for the accommodation and amusement of summer travelers. Immediately beside the platform was a roomy vehicle ready to convey us to the Glen House, eight miles distant, and located just at the base of Mount Washington. In this carriage we seated ourselves, in company with a third passenger; and were presently rocking and bouncing through a rough gorge in the mountains, eagerly looking out for scenery by the way. A heavy thunder-storm, which seemed to have been got up for the purpose of giving us a characteristic reception, now burst upon us in terrific fury. To protect us from the water the curtains were lowered all round, and we were left to our gloomy internal reflections, while our plucky driver stuck to his post and toiled on his splashing, swashing course. It was a wearisome and apparently interminable ride. The eight miles might have been eighty for all that we knew, as a man shut up in the dark can compute neither time nor distance.

"How many have you got?" cried a voice through the storm.

"Three," returned our driver, curtly, as he whipped up his toiling team.

"I was not so far wrong," muttered Dick. "I was just dreaming we were lobsters in a pot, washing about on the bottom of the sea. That sounds like a verification of it."

We arrived at our destination at last, and what was still more cheering the storm was over, leaving forest and meadow glittering in fair sunshine. As we descended from our carriage my eye first sought the President of the mountains, and having fixed upon his majestic form dwelt there for a space. Dick ran immediately into the house and called for the register, which he hastily examined; and as I turned to enter I met him coming out with a blank face.

"Dick," said I, "this is glorious. After spending so much time in a flat country, how exhilarating it is to breathe the mountain air!"

"It looks flat to me all about here," he sighed in response. "They are not here, Cousin. They must have taken some other route."

"We'll doubtless meet them to-morrow or next day, in some romantic spot, perhaps—which will be all the more charming. Meanwhile we must not mope. What shall be the programme for to-day?"

"Dinner will be ready directly," replied Dick.

"A very good thing in its place. And then for our afternoon's amusement."

The dinner was capital, and after that the accommodating landlord exhibited his list of entertainments.

We fixed upon a ride to Glen Ellis and the Crystal Cascade—a pair of pretty waterfalls, five and six miles distant. Commend me to a White Mountain landlord for promptness. By the time we had adjusted our riding toggery the horses and a guide stood ready at the front door. With corresponding promptness we mounted and were off.

Our road lay through a densely shaded gorge with rocks, laurels, and rushing streams, all redolent of the wild, untainted, unsubdued earth. Let your poet in his garret, and your parliamentarian in his crowded halls, prate about Liberty. Believe me, friend, they only worship a phantasm or a graven image, the conceit of their own brain, the work of their own hands. Ye who would worship at the shrine of the true goddess, seek her temples in the untrodden wilderness. What means this tumultuous joy at the smell of the woods? this proud swelling of soul as you tread the interminable aisles of the forest? this ennobling consciousness of might and right as you breathe the untainted air of nature's wide domain? It is that you have come to your lawful inheritance. The instinctive life-long yearnings of the soul are satisfied—you are free. When you get hungry, pitch in and make your living; when you get tired and long for society and the flesh-pots of civilization, go back, resume your chains, your duties, and necessities; bear them with cheerfulness, and don't talk twaddle about Freedom.

We accomplished our course at a dashing gallop, and then, at a signal from our guide, drew rein and dismounted. Tying our steeds beside the main route we took a foot-path through a piny thicket, which presently brought us to the verge of a rocky precipice overhanging a narrow gorge whose depths were concealed from the eye by masses of dark foliage. From the wild abyss we could hear the roar of the waterfall, and the rocks on which we stood seemed to tremble with the shock. Descending the cliff by irregular natural ladder ways, eked out with notched logs—crossing chasms by shaky bridges of fallen timber—we at length reached the bottom of a deep, damp, dark chasm, and stood upon the brink of a foaming caldron of emerald-tinted water. Looking upward we could see the stream pitching from a narrow cleft in the rocks, seventy feet at a single leap.

This was something worth seeing, and a worthy terminus to our spirited ride. We spent half an hour in climbing from rock to rock, crossing and recrossing the stream at some personal risk, to find the best points of view; and finally taking leave with reluctance, we reclimbed the cliff and remounted our horses. Retracing the road for about a mile, we again left our saddles and turned into the wood by a path leading up the great mountain. A walk of half a mile brought us to the top of a jutting spur overhanging a water-chiseled chasm through which a bright stream toiled with hoarse murmurings; while from far above on the mountain, where rocks and fir-trees crown the misty heights, the Crystal Cascade comes skipping down like a white-robed undine hasting to plunge herself in the gulf below.

The characteristics of the two waterfalls are finely contrasted—each beautiful of its kind, and both sufficiently impressive not to be easily forgotten. Glen Ellis, with its cavernous depths, its dark-browed precipices and gloomy hemlocks, is haunted by the earth-born gnomes, while sylphides and undines, the fairer spirits of the air and water, dance among the mists of the Crystal Cascade.

Once more to horse and back to our hotel in full gallop, where we arrived about sunset, gratified, exhausted, deliciously hungry and sleepy. Supper and bed soon quieted these pleasing emotions, and added to the agreeable reminiscences of our afternoon ride.

After a night of refreshing sleep, I rose early and hastened down “to greet the opening day;” but on the piazza I met with another greeting, which for the time made me forget both the sunrise and the mountains. There, in all the jocund freshness of life's morning, the perfect grace of twenty summers, stood my sweet friend and compatriot Ellen Hardy. She was earnestly watching the lofty peaks, just gilded by the rays of the coming sun, so that I approached her unobserved. In her dainty mouth she held a rose, and her clear hazel eye sparkled with the golden light reflected from the illuminated hills. Here, I thought, if a man was disposed to become an idolater, is something that he might worship. As I pronounced her name she turned quickly, and in the sudden flush of cordial recognition I imprinted a kiss on her red lips. It was certainly unpremeditated on my part, and I don't think Ellen quite intended it; for she blushed rosy red, and in that earnest, gushing manner of hers which enriches all her loveliness, she said, what was meant and accepted as a full and satisfactory explanation, "I was so glad to hear the tones of a familiar voice, and to see the face of one of our own people. Papa will be so much delighted."

"Dick Dashaway is with me," I said.

"I knew you were traveling somewhere together," she replied; "but did not know precisely where. Papa has talked of you frequently, and hoped to meet you. He is so little accustomed to traveling that he gets lonesome and homesick; but as he came solely for my pleasure, he seems determined to complete the job before he returns, flattering himself that I will have had enough of it to last me for some time to come."

On comparing notes I found we had passed them in Portland, and that they had come over from Gorham late last evening. As people began to gather upon the piazza I proposed a more extended walk; but Ellen excused herself, and ran to tell her father of our presence. After she was gone I picked up the rose she had dropped in the confusion of our meeting, and stuck it in my button-hole; but perceiving Dick coming to join me, I hid it in my vest to avoid any impertinent questions.

Dick complained of being a little stiff from yesterday's ride and proposed a morning julep, saying that there was a man here who pretended to know how to make them. I carelessly consented, and in due time the drinks were served. Dick pronounced his a failure, and the maker a humbug; but continued absorbing, on the great and well-established principle that something is better than nothing. I took mine mechanically, and was raising it to my mouth, but, moved by a sudden impulse, I jerked glass and all out upon the green.

"What's the matter?" cried Dick, in astonishment. "Was there a fly in it?"

I replied that this morning I did care to profane my lips with such stuff.

"Well," quoth he, "you've turned squeamish very suddenly. I've seen you drink worse; and, moreover, why did you break the glass? It will only add ten cents to our bill."

I said I was glad to perceive he was getting more economical, and as it seemed essential to man's happiness that he should break something occasionally, I thought ten cents' worth a very moderate indulgence.

"No retrospections, Cousin Bob. Come; I feel jolly; let us go down and plague the bear."

We walked down and found Bruin in an uncommonly lively mood, exhibiting his antics before a dozen or twenty admiring spectators. Dick swaggered up within a few feet of him, when the bear stood up, poked out his tongue, and made motions as if challenging him to a wrestle. He seemed half-disposed to go in, and declared if the bear would wrestle fair he could throw him. One of the by-standers remarked that the brute was disposed to be vicious, and advised Dick to keep out of his reach. To this friendly warning he responded by deliberately walking around the animal, and crossing his beat, leaned in careless bravado against the pole in the centre. Bruin's little eyes twinkled with mischief, but he took no apparent notice of the intruder until he had edged around so as to get between him and the hotel, the only chance of escape in the opposite direction being over a steep bank.

When satisfied with the position of his game he turned suddenly and made a rush. Taken by surprise, Dick looked right and left, and in his confusion sprung upon the pole. Bruin asked for nothing better, for although the biped was a good climber, the bear considered himself a better. But he did not consider that his opponent had three jumps advantage in the start; and then the thirty feet of chain hanging to his own neck got heavier with every foot of elevation. These equalizing circumstances made the race a pretty even one. The male spectators laughed and applauded, while the ladies screamed. Any one who has had experience knows that, above a certain limit, pole-climbing is no joke. At the height of twenty feet, more or less, my champion gave signs of exhaustion, and seemed disposed to turn the race into a fight. He stopped, and looking down, disengaged one of his legs, ready to give the pursuer a back-set when he got too near. The bear, in return, raised one of his formidable paws, at the sight of which Dick folded up and made another desperate effort. As he rose Bruin grabbed and caught his coat-tail. At this moment one of the hostlers ran in, and seizing the chain, dragged the animal down, who brought with him a fair proportion of his enemy's surcoat as a trophy. Dick now slid down, and hurried back to his room as soon as possible to readjust his wardrobe.

When he had accomplished this in a satisfactory manner I advised him to give his mustache an extra twirl, as he would probably see some one at breakfast that he didn't expect.

"Who is that?" he asked, staring at me like a scared frog.

"I saw by the register that Squire Hardy and daughter got here last evening."

"You're trying to quiz me, Cousin Robert."

"As I am a true man, it is so. And for better assurance, I saw the young lady herself about an hour ago."

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed. "Do you think she saw me making a fool of myself down there? Why, Cousin Robert, if I had thought she was looking on, the darnd bear might have swallowed me whole before I would have yielded an inch!"

"Come on; we'll ascertain at breakfast whether she saw you or not; and if she did, I'll warrant she will thank you for a good laugh."

As we passed along the passage we perceived, through a half-opened door, a young lady appareled for breakfast, who was rubbing her lips with Cologne, I supposed to cool a fever blister. Dick made a rush toward her; but I collared him in time to prevent his entrance, while the young person closed the door in his face with an expressive bang. I remonstrated sharply with my companion for his absurd behavior, who apologized generally to me and every one else who might be offended, swore he thought the lady was Miss Hardy, and finally intimated his belief that the julep he had swallowed had been drugged, for he never had one to serve him so before. I suggested that possibly the ignorant manufacturer had put water in it.

At the table we met our Virginia friends; and, as may be imagined, we had a merry meal of it. Ellen was lively, the Squire quite glorified, at meeting with us; and Dick, who began on a very subdued note, rose to brilliancy as the conversation progressed without any allusion to his adventure with the bear. I was myself soon convinced that they knew nothing of it, for the Squire was too much of a wag to let so fair an opportunity slip; and as for Ellen, she possessed, by right of inheritance, all her father's native humor, concentrated by a refinement and keenness of perception peculiar to her sex. That sensitive and romantic youth who, lured by the sparkle of her merry eye, sought to win the owner's favor, must tread with circumspection the narrow and slippery limit which divides the sublime from the ridiculous. I determined, therefore, not to "peach," but to hold the bear story in terrorem over my comrade, as a check upon his wild humors and vagaries.

After breakfast the ascent of Mount Washington was proposed, and I was sent to consult the oracles on the subject. The summit was clear, the day beautiful, and promised to continue so. The horses were accordingly ordered, and in due time we were all mounted and on our way. The whole party consisted of fifteen or twenty persons—ladies and gentlemen. But as we mounted and rode off in detachments, our quartette taking the lead, I did not interest myself in the composition of the cavalcade which followed. In this I showed bad generalship, as circumstances will prove that a little foreknowledge might have prevented surprise, and have changed the results of the day materially. But we must not anticipate.

In the outset I reined back and rode with Squire Hardy, determined to play the magnanimous with Dick, and give him full opportunity to weary his fair companion with his commonplace talk. When we had ascended to the region of dangers and sublimities I would then join her. I consider myself strong on scenery and things of that sort. Whose fault it was I don't know, but I found the Squire dull and uninteresting. He seemed jaded and out of his element; and, in short, a man of his character, to be appreciated, must be seen at home.

By the time we got to the dead timber I rode forward to join the daughter; but her acting cavalier seemed in no way disposed to yield his place. If I pushed up on one side, he crowded in on the other, although the road was not wide enough for two abreast. I was seriously vexed, and significantly alluded to the young gentleman's climbing capacities. The envenomed arrow fell harmless. The wily rogue had told her the whole story, so colored and arranged that, instead of the monkey, he appeared as a hero. I was superseded and disarmed.

"Dick," said I, "Mr. Hardy would like to have some conversation with you."

"Cousin Robert," Dick replied, pleasantly, "I know the old gentleman would rather talk to you than any one in the world. I wouldn't deprive him of the pleasure."

I would not have regarded this impertinence, but I observed that the young lady herself significantly gave preference to his attentions. Dick was called on to hold her glove and whip, while she retied the ribbons of her riding-hat. Dick must adjust her rein when it got tangled. Dick do this, and Dick do that. I opened once on the magnificence of the deep gorge which yawned on our right; but in the midst Dick was called to dismount and recover her veil, which had blown away. As I fell back, feeling deeply disgusted and revengeful, I heard Ellen warn her companion not to ride too near the edge of the precipice, lest he should tumble over, and I mentally estimated the total loss from such a catastrophe at one hundred dollars, the probable value of the hired quadruped.

As we mounted the steep and rocky stairway near the summit the riding became somewhat exciting; but Virginians are familiar with horse-flesh and rough roads, and the White Mountain nags are too well trained to make the work dangerous. Crossing a stony plateau, and just before reaching the apex, we drew rein beside a rude monument and cross of stone, which, we were told, marked the spot where a young lady who had attempted to ascent the mountain on foot fell from exhaustion and died.

Dick feelingly remarked that it "was a pity she hadn't come up a horseback."

"Poor child!" sighed the Squire, "to lose her life in so foolish and unprofitable an undertaking."

"She was a brave girl," said Nelly, "and I admire her spirit, while I pity her fate."

"If all heroism were to be estimated by our individual view of utility, the Pantheon of history would be stripped of its proudest ornaments, and its holiest shrines desecrated. What good has come of many a famous victory—the Thames Tunnel—the Atlantic Telegraph—the Great Eastern? What use are we to make of the North Pole, when discovered? and yet how many gallant hearts have perished in the vain pursuit, and how many more are burning to follow! Believe me, it is not to the wise and successful achievement of material and useful results that the world most heartily accords the crown of glory, but to the fiery soul that dares and perishes for an idea."

Ellen rewarded me for these observations by an approving bow and graceful wave of the hand. I felt encouraged to say more, but the wind was blowing sharply, so we saluted the monument and rode on.

The summit of Mount Washington is six thousand two hundred and sixty-five feet above the level of the sea, being the highest point in the United States east of the Mississippi, except some peaks among the Black Mountains in North Carolina, which overtop it by six or seven hundred feet. The summit is entirely bare of vegetation, a vast stone heap, rugged and wild, but too regularly shaped for picturesqueness or sublimity. The two ragged-looking buildings put up for the convenience and entertainment of visitors are sufficiently characteristic to detract nothing from the scene. The view from the apex commands the full circle of the horizon, and Mount Washington appears as an island surrounded by a tumultuous ocean of blue hills. But the adjacent peaks, jagged and bare, divided by valleys of stupendous depth, are yet the most impressive features of the grand panorama. I enjoy these things when alone, and still more with a choice companion, whose sympathetic appreciation is expressed rather by the eye than the tongue. I knew there was such a one at hand if I could only have the good fortune to secure her companionship; so when I saw my gallant young friend Dick issue from the house with a lady on each arm, I accosted the group with the subtle design of relieving him of one of them.

"Miss Ellen," said I, "let me have the pleasure of offering—"

"Cousin Robert Berkeley," interrupted Dick, "let me introduce you to Miss Puffin—very anxious to know you—has traveled in Europe—paints, writes, speaks French, and sings divinely."

The young lady—who was at least forty, and weighed two hundred and forty—simplified, courtied, and took my arm before I had recovered from the low bow which I made to conceal my disgust and indignation. I gave Dick a look which would have annihilated him if I had been a basilisk, and I wished for his sake I was one. He looked unconscious as a lamb, however, while his companion's eye twinkled with a suppressed merriment that made me half suspect her of being party to the outrage.

"Your young friend tells me," observed my fair partner, "that you are a great lover of the beautiful arts; in fact, that you have superb talents."

"My young friend, Miss, is an infernal—" (Oh! world of lies and hollow pretenses, must I swallow this?) "Ah! in fact, he is a devilish merry fellow, and talks extravagantly sometimes."

"Ah, really, Sir, merit and modesty are inseparable companions. But you can not make me believe he has exaggerated yours."

"I feel well assured at least, Miss Puffin, that he has not overestimated your accomplishments."

"Oh! pardon me, Sir; spare me," she wheezed; "I am nothing; a light giddy creature; have achieved nothing solid—a mere butterfly in the arts." If she had said a butter-tub it would have been nearer the mark; but she continued: "I am an immense admirer of genius, a huge adorer of the beautiful, an infatuated worshiper of the sublime. And speaking of the sublime, what a magnificent panorama is unfolded around us! How, in the contemplation of such a glorious creation, the mind recoils upon itself after its impotent efforts to grasp the infinite and illimitable ideas suggested by the vastness of the scene."

"Very true," I replied. "Then gaze upward into the intensified azure of the cerulean concave flecked with clouds of fleecy whiteness, and from the empyreal arch throw suddenly your bewildered glances downward into the stupendous abysses which yawn around, whose depths are hidden in shadowy and unfathomable mystery, exhibiting the disrupted strata of antediluvian formations crushed and splintered into a thousand fragments—Miss Puffin, allow me to assist you in mounting this rock. We have a better view."

"What vigorous language!" wheezed Miss Puffin; "what power of expression! Surely, Mr. Berkeley, you are a poet?"

"I have but rarely indulged in versification, Miss; but I feel assured that I have the honor of addressing a distinguished poetess."

"A few bubbles," she sighed—"airy and evanescent—unworthy of perpetuity. I am lacking in the energy and perseverance essential to great achievement. I am altogether a creature of feeling—I feel entirely too much!" she exclaimed, pressing both hands upon her voluminous bust. "It is a misfortune."

I agreed that it was.

Suddenly my companion stopped, and begged me to assist her to a seat on the rock, where, with a look of anguish, she commenced squeezing and caressing one of her gaiter boots. I inquired if she was ill, and officiously proposed to run for assistance to carry her to the house."

"Not at all," she replied, with sharp decision of manner. "That abominable stirrup has rubbed my corns red-hot. Heavens! what suffering! Excuse me; you may go and get me a glass of water with some peppermint in it—and—ah—brandy will answer, if there is such a thing to be found in this wretched rock heap."

I made haste, and was fortunately enabled to fulfill the commission to the satisfaction of my interesting acquaintance. She expressed her gratitude for the attention in plain, direct language, and we returned to the Tip-Top House, where we found most of the company collected for dinner. Dick and Ellen were missing, however, and the Squire, feeling some uneasiness at their absence, asked me to go in search of them. Under the circumstances I would fain have declined; but as a refusal would have appeared discourteous to the old gentleman, I started on the unpleasant errand. After looking and calling for some time in vain, I stepped upon a large boulder, and under its lee saw the truant pair snugly ensconced, Dick talking earnestly and Ellen listening with smiling interest. Something of the discourse I could not avoid overhearing.

"I do assure you, Miss Ellen, on my honor, my heart was never interested in that quarter. I never loved but once, never desired the affection of but one alone, and failing in that, life has no charms for me. I am incapable of another passion. You know, Miss Ellen, who that lady is."

Ellen nodded and laughed. "Ah, Dick, don't attempt to deceive me? Didn't you give Harry Byrd two pointer pups for a lock of her hair? And at the tournament, two years ago, didn't you crown her?"

Dick interrupted her vehemently, "Miss Ellen, upon my honor as a gentleman—"

From motives of delicacy, as well as zeal in the cause of truth, I put a stop to this by hallooing, "Ah, you runaways, I've found you at last!"

Dick jumped up as if he had been shot at, but the lady saluted me with entire self-possession and a look of polite inquiry.

"A message from your father, Miss Hardy. Dinner and the company await your presence."

When Dick recovered from his confusion he became enthusiastic on the subject of the view—asked me if I had ever seen any thing so magnificent—and said that he and Miss Ellen had been enjoying it wonderfully. I answered, dryly, that he had not chosen a good point for the distant view, as from where he sat they couldn't see more than fifty yards.

Dick, who never let any one have the last word, insisted that near views were often more agreeable than distant ones; and, for his part, he was sufficiently charmed with his company to think any view delightful—modestly hoping that Miss Ellen was of the same opinion.

She made no direct reply, but, looking archly at me, said, "If an appreciative companion adds so much to the enjoyment of a scene, you, Mr. Berkeley, must have had a delightful morning of it. Our acquaintance, Miss Puffin, is the most enthusiastic creature I ever saw."

As things stood I felt this as a personal insult, and replying only with a stately bow, led the way to the dining-table. After the Tip-Top dinner concluded, our company was mustered for the return to the Glen House, when I announced my intention of riding in another direction to visit the Crawford Notch. There was general surprise, and the Squire protested vehemently. He had been told it was sixteen miles distant; the road dangerous, if not impassable; at the bottom there was no accommodation, as the old hotel had been burned, and the new one not yet completed. I said I had seen some workmen from the Notch who reported the road practicable, and rough entertainment for man and beast obtainable below. Squire Hardy had flattered himself that we would join parties and travel together henceforth. It was a mere whim on my part. We could take a wagon and drive around to the Notch to-morrow; that would be much more agreeable and rational.

As I could not frankly state my reasons for the movement, I insisted that this White Mountaineering was too tame for my temper—a sort of cockney business; I wanted a little rough life and danger to stir my blood.

"When will you rejoin us?" he asked, with an earnestness of manner that touched me.

"To-morrow evening, perhaps. But if I don't get in, conclude I have broken my neck, and don't wait for me."

I spoke lightly, but I had secretly resolved not to rejoin them at all. As I turned to depart Ellen held out her little hand to me, but I affected not to see it, and, waving a general farewell, took the path leading toward Crawford's.

Descending from the knob of Mount Washington, I came presently upon a dark pond fed by the melting snows and overshadowed by bald and jagged crests of the mountain, presenting altogether one of the most striking pictures I had seen. Stony, grim, and desolate, I looked upon this lake of the clouds with a feeling of brotherhood. No flower blooming on its bleak margin, no living thing rippling its icy bosom, it resembled a sullen, deep-set black eye staring eternally upward from its sunless hollow at the unapproachable glories of the heaven above. The path for several miles led around and over this line of savage crests, in many places steep and dangerous; but, occupied with gloomy and bitter thoughts, I took little heed of the way, trusting every thing to the instinct of my hardy and well-trained steed. In time I reached the line of forest growth—at first appearing a mere thicket of stunted firs, and increasing in size as I descended. The character of the road also changed. The rugged pavements and steep stairways of loose and angular rocks had given place to deep-washed gullies, choked at every dozen or more rods with earth-slides and barred by fallen timber—and alternating with these were long causeways and bridges, of half-decayed pine logs, thicker set with traps and gins for horses feet, than was the Valley of the Shadow of Death for the feet of holy pilgrims; as I struggled through these difficult and vexatious passages I thought I heard a faint halloo from far up in the mountain, my horse at the same time stopped and gave a sociable whinny. I supposed the shout came from some of the workmen who had staid behind their companions, and with voice and whip tried to urge my beast forward. Although free enough in his pace heretofore he now resolutely refused to move, but pricked his ears, and, looking back, reiterated his call.

"The creature wants companionship," I thought. So I dismounted, and, seating myself upon a log, allowed my equine friend to solace himself by cropping the grass and leaves within his reach, while I continued to chew the cud of bitter fancies. What pride would have forbidden me to acknowledge, even to myself, while in the matter-of-fact bustle of the world, in this silent solitude might be proclaimed without equivocation or restraint—I love that young girl.

I had known Ellen Hardy from her childhood, I had romped with her, ridden with her, danced with her, and, as she grew older, I had chaperoned her in society, read with her, seconded her in musical duets, and had even talked philosophy with her. I had seen her under all circumstances, and had never seen a woman in whom were combined so much of personal attraction, cheerfulness of temper, and sterling good sense. As an intimate and valued friend of her father I enjoyed a sort of confidential position in the house, and was the oracle which the young lady consulted on all matters of etiquette, fashion, and taste. Her manner toward me had been always flatteringly deferential; I was always welcomed with cordiality, and felt that I was regretted when my visits were ended. Yet I was so much older than she that I never thought of her, I am sure, in any other light than that of an interesting and cheerful friend, and never indulged in a dream of romance of which she was the heroine. For some years past I had begun to think that my life was an aimless, incomplete affair, wanting some main-spring or essential balance to harmonize its movements. My accidental interview with Ellen in the morning had opened my eyes to the truth, dispelled my vain philosophy, and thrilled me with a passion as sudden and uncontrollable as ever blazed in the breast of one-and-twenty. Ah me! and I fear as absurd and hopeless as most of them. Can not I see too plainly that, with the characteristic subtlety of her sex, she perceives the change in my demeanor, and that I may not wrongly estimate the affectionate cordiality of her greeting, she gracefully but firmly repels me to my former position of an esteemed friend—a title which yesterday I rejoiced in, but to-day I loathe? Well, it is all clear, and with me all settled. Stiffen up, proud heart! no human eye must see your wounds—no human ear hear the confession I have whispered to this lonely forest. After all—perhaps—down; don't suggest doubts, that is weakness.

Another halloo upon the mountain—faint but distinct. She can not be seriously interested in that rattle-brained boy. It is impossible. I could not even respect her if I thought so; yet who knows? By-the-by, what a source of vexation that boy has been to me for the last five years! I never have an opening for an especially agreeable tête-à-tête that he doesn't interrupt me. If I attempt a remarkable anecdote, he never fails to trump it with some preposterous exaggeration that attaints all genuineness, or leaves the simple truth cold and impoverished. If I say a pointed thing, he botches it in the repetition, and then asks me how it was? In society he manages to monopolize the girl who is the toast, and invariably saddles me with some horrible megalonyx that feeds on literature. At table, if I set my heart upon a particularly brown biscuit, he is sure to take it before I am ready. He has lamed my favorite horses, shot my pointer-dog, upset my ink, mortified my vanity; and now stands between me and the sunshine that might have warmed my barren soul to life and joy. Yet I can't dislike him. He is so blunderingly obliging, so unconsciously absurd, so unselfish in his marplot zeal, so eager in his mismanaging generosity, that one is forced, in the midst of despair, to laugh and forgive.

My pony suddenly raised his head and set up a joyous whinnying, which was promptly responded to in the same language: and, to my surprise, I saw a couple of mounted travelers coming down the road hard upon us. As soon as they perceived me, the foremost of the cavaliers joined in the outcry, with many gesticulations demonstrative of pleasure. My surprise was not abated when I recognized Dick Dashaway and the guide.

"Hurrah, old fellow, we've caught you at last! What a lonesome, breakneck road this is, eh?"

I expressed my astonishment at seeing them, and asked Dick why he had deserted the Squire and company? He replied that, as we had started together, he thought it didn't look well to part from me at this time, and he had brought the guide to look after the horses. I intimated that his concern for me was entirely unnecessary, while his other friends would miss him. In short, I did not consider it altogether kind or polite to leave them.

"Indeed, I will be frank with you, Cousin Robert. I did insist on going with them and left them very reluctantly, I assure you; but Ellen told me it was not honorable to desert my comrade, and that if I did not follow you I would forfeit her respect."

I turned away for a moment to hide the emotion which these words excited.

Dick continued: "And you know, Cousin, I'd follow you to hell if she said so."

"Very cheerfully, my boy, I've no doubt. Was there any thing more said?"

"The Squire said you always were self-willed and stubborn as a mule, and ought to go by yourself, as you had chosen to leave them."

This naïve answer closed the conversation on that subject, and after a few more miles of troublesome riding, we arrived at the Crawford Notch. It was near sunset, and as both men and beasts were dead-tired we lost no time in inquiring for quarters. At this point was one of the principal establishments, erected for the entertainment of the thousands who resort to the White Mountains for summer recreation. The hotel had been lately destroyed by fire, and a large force was employed in rebuilding it on a handsome and more extensive scale. A hundred workmen of all grades, with numerous assistant quadrupeds, were encamped in the stables, ten-pin alleys, and other out-buildings which had escaped the conflagration. We were received with good-humored civility, and our horses accommodated in the most unexceptionable manner. Squeamish folks might have been disposed to turn up their noses at the sleeping apartment offered the bipeds—a stall between two respectable and well-mannered oxen, with a promise of clean hay. We are not of the fastidious, and accepted the hospitality in the spirit in which it was offered. I have slept soundly on many a worse bed in my time, and very often have passed the night in worse company—oxen don't get drunk and play cards all night.

We supped with the workmen in the ten-pin alley, and made a hearty meal on pork and beans; after which we looked around for something to amuse us until bedtime. Every White Mountain hotel has a bear, who is kept chained to a pole, like Samson, to make sport for the Philistines. The Crawford being a pre-eminent concern, had two full-grown animals and a four months' cub. The male was an old surly rogue, and folks had to be careful how they approached him. As Dick showed no disposition to enlarge his ursine experiences, I asked one of the boys to catch me a frog. This request was speedily complied with, and the goggle-eyed captive tied to the end of a twig. Thus armed I fearlessly approached the vicious brute, who also advanced to meet me as far as his chain permitted. As he reared up, apparently eager to welcome me with a fraternal embrace, I poked the frog in his face. Quick as thought he gave a yell and tumbled backward, evidencing the greatest disgust and trepidation. So I chased him around his tree until his arrogance was completely humbled, and he took refuge under a log, whining piteously. The spectators, and especially the boys, were delighted, and I fear it was a woeful day for Bruin and the frogs when I taught that trick to their enemies.

As we were about retiring to our stall, the foreman, who occupied a part of the ten-pin alley with his family, waited on us and offered us a bed, which two of his boys had agreed to vacate for our accommodation. We frankly accepted the courtesy and enjoyed it. In the morning, too, we took a private breakfast with his family—the bill of fare being enriched with a dish of trout, fresh caught and admirably cooked.

Before the sun had illumined the hill-tops we were again upon the road, both men and horses in fine condition. The Notch is a narrow and romantic gorge, walled in by precipitous rocks and mountains of imposing height. Its entrance resembles a gate-way of Cyclopean masonry, affording scanty room for the rugged highway, and the passage of a brawling stream, one of the sources of the Saco River. Our early morning's ride through this wild rift, halting and turning often to admire its savage ruggedness, forms one of the most agreeable reminiscences of our mountain trip. At the end of two miles the pass widens into a regular valley, and the scenery becomes more commonplace; at the same time the sun had begun to find us out, and I do not know when I have suffered more from the heat. This was especially the case after our road left the forests and led us through an open, cultivated country, where there was nothing to protect us from the downright blaze. At Jackson we took refuge with one Trickey (a disagreeably suggestive name for a landlord), and there dined and slept until four o'clock in the afternoon. We then mounted and rode to the Glen House, having made a journey of thirty-six miles around the base of that group of hills of which Mount Washington is the chief. Just before reaching our destination we met a fellow riding rapidly down toward Jackson, who, in answer to Dick's inquiry as to what was the matter, informed us that his wagon had stalled with some heavy logs, and he was going for reinforcements to help out.

Our friends were on the porch at the Glen expecting our arrival, and their welcome was flattering. Ellen desired to hear an account of our adventures, which I undertook to furnish, delicately dramatizing the most susceptible points; but Dick interrupted me with such an avalanche of jumbled gasconade that one who didn't know him might have supposed we had just returned from an exploration in the heart of the Andes. I went to the supper-table in disgust.

When we repaired to the parlor after tea, I perceived that there had been considerable accessions to the company during our absence. I joined Ellen Hardy, and in the crowd of strangers hoped to find a quiet opportunity for delivering several effective little speeches which I had carefully prepared during the day's ride. Dick, however, seemed determined to allow me no chance, and whether at the piano, or looking at the stereoscopes, or promenading the room, he was always at her elbow. Whether she observed my vexation and kindly devised a temporary relief I can not say, but I felt pleased and grateful when she sent him for a glass of water. He started precipitately, as if his life depended on the speedy accomplishment of the order. In the mean time I was astonished to find that I had forgotten entirely what I intended to say, and instead only uttered some awkward and pointless commonplace. With an air of kind concern my companion asked if I was not very much fatigued or unwell.

While reassuring her on these points I felt my usual easy confidence return, and had just begun to recall one of my little orations, when my friend, the megalonyx, entered the room, and waddling directly up to where we sat professed herself enraptured at my safe return. How supremely intense, how inexpressibly exquisite must have been my enjoyments on that long romantic ride! What advantages men possessed over the gentler sex! She envied them; she often wished that Heaven had made her a man. "Ah, Mr. Berkeley, do excuse me for interrupting your charming tête-à-tête; but won't you be so kind as to give me your arm for a moment? I see a dear friend over there by the window, and I am such a nervous, foolish creature that I can not cross a room alone before so much company."

I did not groan aloud as I gave her my arm and escorted her to the opposite side of the parlor. As I suspected, the dear friend was an artifice. She did not even pretend to recognize or speak to any one, but declining the seat which I urged her to accept, she hung on to me like the Old Man of the Sea. While she gabbled I cast a despairing look toward the seat I had left. I saw Dick enter with the glass of water, which the lady merely sipped and returned, thereby giving me assurance that she had only sent for it to disembarass herself of his company. True politeness is social freedom, not bondage. I determined to get rid of my incubus at all hazards; but while I meditated a plan, some one at the piano struck up a merry air, and the young people took their places on the floor for a quadrille.

"Do you dance, Mr. Berkeley?" asked Miss Puffin.

I answered, evasively, that I had occasionally danced, but was not fond of it.

"It is not considered an intellectual amusement," she said; "but there is something airy and graceful about it: and really now, if I hadn't this open wrapper on, I could be induced to join the set."

I saw Dick standing up with Ellen, and relying on the fact of the open wrapper, I thought I might risk a civility; so I intimated to Miss Puffin that, had she been in dancing trim, I should have been happy to join the quadrille with her; but as it was—

"Indeed, Sir, I can not refuse you under any circumstances. As you are not fond of dancing I accept the invitation as a personal compliment. So I'll just slip a pin in the wrapper to prevent its flying open—it will not be noticed; and if it is, I am above caring for fashion or form—nature is my idol: I am all nature, Mr. Berkeley—all nature!" she repeated, emphasizing the assertion with her favorite gesture.

Man, in his physical, political, moral, and social relations, is only capable of sustaining a limited amount of pressure. The fable of the camel whose back was broken by the addition of a feather to his burden, finds its moral, daily and hourly, in the current events of our lives. As we took our places I observed that Dick and his partner were convulsed with suppressed laughter. It flashed upon me that they had conspired to place me in a ridiculous position, and I resolved on immediate and ruthless vengeance on all parties concerned, beginning with the victim nearest my elbow. At the next "promenade all round," I accidentally trod with my whole weight on my partner's toe. A shrill screech followed, and at the same time losing my balance I fell sprawling on the floor. Over my prostrate body rolled my unfortunate partner with a jar that made the windows rattle. In the confusion that ensued I slipped out of the room, scribbled a hasty note to be handed to Dick Dashaway in the morning, and gave a man five dollars to drive me over to Gorham that night.

The following evening I spent in the city of Montreal, and from thence a two-weeks' tour by way of the St. Lawrence, Lake Ontario, Niagara, and Central Pennsylvania, brought me to my place in the Virginia Mountains. The Hardys, accompanied by Dick, had returned the week before. I had entirely forgotten my ill-humor, and lost no time in paying my respects. I found Dick spreading himself like the American eagle in the morning sun, and we had a world of merriment over our White Mountain adventures. From the course of events since that time it need not be a matter of surprise if our Summer in New England should terminate in an old-fashioned Virginia wedding.

LOVE'S MESSENGERS.

SUMMER Winds, whispering over the rye,
 Kissing the roses and hurrying by,
 Where have ye latest been, O where?
 Merrily tangling my maiden's hair?
 Wafting the tresses over her cheek,
 And playing among them at hide-and-seek?
 Or trying, with delicate scents of the South,
 To rival the breath from her own sweet mouth?

Tell me, Summer Winds, fresh and fair,
Where have ye latest been, O where?
But the balmy breezes floated away,
Daintily sighing—no word said they.

Bear ye no word from my maiden to me?
Did she not whisper her love to ye?
Ah! well do I know that her fondest dreams
By the sun's warm light or the moon's pale beams
Are ever of me; and the love she bears
Oft breaks from her sweet lips unawares!
Has she not murmured some tender word,
That ye, as ye floated by, have heard?
Tell me, Summer Winds, frolic and free,
What word has my maiden sent to me?
But the balmy breezes frolicked away,
Daintily sighing—no word said they.

O, faithless Winds! since thus ye are still,
And bring no message my heart to thrill,
I will send ye again to my maiden's side,
To tell her I'll meet her at even-tide.
So fly—fly fast o'er the waving rye—
The roses are lovely, but pass them by—
Bid them to wait for the kisses they crave,
And linger not on the rivulet's wave.
Hasten, O Summer Winds, sighing above,
Tell her this night shall she meet her love!
The balmy breezes floated away,
And the roses wept that they would not stay.

Around the hill the Summer Winds sped,
Whirling and eddying overhead;
Waving the moss on the cottage eaves,
Rustling the feathery locust-leaves,
Brushing the dew-drops, glimmering yet
On the odorous blooms of the mignonnette,
Till they reached a garden, kept with care,
And found a beautiful maiden there,
Alone in an arbor, where misty lines
Of sunshine fell through the tangled vines.
Then the balmy breezes sought her ear,
And the words they whispered were low but clear.

They lifted the tresses of gold and brown
That over her white neck floated down;
They said, in a musical, breezy voice,
"Thy lover is coming, Sweet Child, rejoice!
When Hesperus' light in the west grows dim
Thy lover will seek thee; be ready for him!"
The maiden heard, and a rosy glow
Flushed up to her cheek from her heart below,
And the Summer Winds caught, as they circled by,
Her perfumed breath in a gentle sigh.
Then the balmy breezes frolicked away,
And soon in the rose-leaves nestled they.

GEORGE ARNOLD.

“A VERY good land to fall in with, and a pleasant land to see!” was the unctuous ejaculation which rolled from the lips of the stout and staid old explorer, Hendrick Hudson, when he first gazed, two and a half centuries ago, upon that wondrous scene, now famous the wide world over as the Bay and City of New York.

Not one of all the millions whose eyes have since been blessed as were those of the “ancient mariner” has failed to echo his pleasurable sentiment, and in a crescendo of satisfaction commensurate with that ever-growing beauty of the landscape which has made the waters—once silent, save only when rippled by the stealthy passage of the birch canoe—tuneful with the flutter of a thousand sail, gathered from remotest seas; and which has covered the lonely forest-shores, far as the sight can scan, with the habitations of a great and happy people, until the wild home of the savage now stands transformed into the Empire City of a New World.

The peep here proposed at this land, so “pleasant to see” long ago, in its rude primeval garb, and so much more winsome now in its rich and rare adornment of human art and opulence, will be, for the most part, from the all-surrounding waters and their more immediate shores, with such occasional incursions into the interior as the nature of the case may demand.

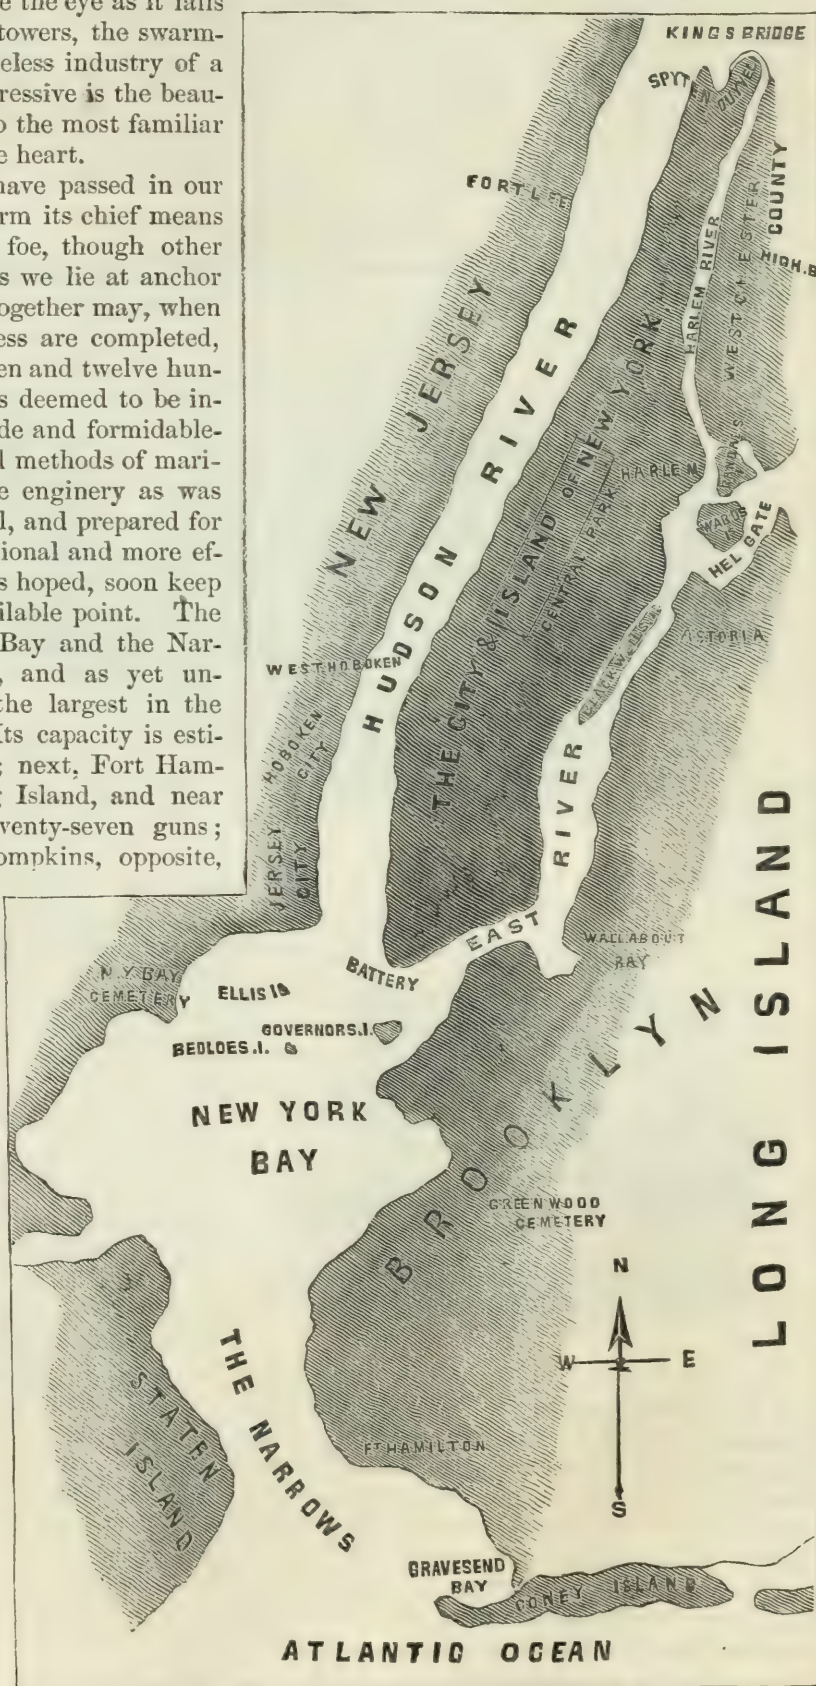

At the cape on the Jersey shore known as Sandy Hook, and lying some thirty miles south of the great metropolis, the voyager is at the extremity of the lower, or outer bay, and is considered to have fairly begun or ended his ocean cruise, as he may chance to be outward or homeward bound. Approaching the city thence, the transit of half the intervening distance will bring him to the “Narrows,” the famous passage which connects the outer with the inner harbor. On the right, at this point, the sweeping skirts of Long Island trail in the sea, turned up in the way of a hem, with the classic shores of that redoubtable suburban resort for ocean sports and pleasures, Coney Island. On the other hand are the bold hill-slopes of Staten Island, radiant every where with sunny village and villa. On either side, as he sails along, frowning fortresses indicate the proximity of the life and treasure they are placed to guard; and the splendors of which soon dazzle the eye as it falls upon the countless roofs and towers, the swarming population, and the ceaseless industry of a great maritime capital. Impressive is the beautiful spectacle always, even to the most familiar sight and to the least sensitive heart.

The fortresses which we have passed in our ocean approach to the city form its chief means of defense against a foreign foe, though other lesser works are around us as we lie at anchor in the harbor. All of them together may, when improvements now in progress are completed, be able to mount between eleven and twelve hundred guns. Their strength is deemed to be insufficient against the magnitude and formidableness of the present means and methods of maritime assault—of such terrible enginery as was recently opposed to Sebastopol, and prepared for Cronstadt; and various additional and more effective constructions will, it is hoped, soon keep watch at each and every assailable point. The fortifications in the Lower Bay and the Narrows include an unfinished, and as yet unbaptized work—said to be the largest in the country—at Sandy Hook. Its capacity is estimated at two hundred guns; next, Fort Hamilton, eighty guns—on Long Island, and near by, Fort Lafayette, with seventy-seven guns; Fort Richmond and Fort Tompkins, opposite, on Staten Island, the former with one hundred and forty, and the latter with forty guns; and batteries Hudson and Morton, sixty guns, also on Staten Island. In the inner harbor there is Fort Columbus, Castle William, and South Battery, on Governor's Island, with an aggregate strength of one hundred and eighty-two pieces; Fort Wood, sixty-seven guns, on Bedloe's Island; some inconsiderable defenses on Ellis's Island, and Castle Clinton (more popularly known as Castle Garden), at the city pleasure-ground of the Battery. Last, and chiefest of all, is Fort Schuyler, a casemated fort of great strength, and mounting two hundred and forty-nine guns, protecting the entrance to the East River from Long Island Sound.

Fort Richmond is a modern fabric, large and casemated, on the site of the old water battery of the same name. Fort Tompkins is a new work, now in process of erection, also near the site of an ancient namesake. Fort Hamilton, which is reached by a pleasant sail of eight miles down the bay, is a favorite suburban resort; a little hamlet lies around it, and conveniently near is a large summer hotel. The locality affords excellent opportunities for the refreshment of sea-bathing. Passengers thither are dropped by the boats which pass between the city and Coney Island.

The fortifications on Staten Island are equally interesting destinations on a morning ramble, the journey, no less than that to Fort Hamilton, involving the delightful voyage down the bay, and leading to many marvelously picturesque points of view on the shores and the overlooking hill-tops. If the stranger would see New York in one of its most charming aspects, or if the citizen would refresh his wearied soul with an hour's cheering communion with Nature in her heartiest and most inspiring mood, let him hie to the happy retreats of Staten Island. Great is the pleasure and small the cost of the journey, for—as may happily be said of each of the attractive points in the vicinage of the town—a poor little sixpence will buy it at any hour.

One of the busiest places on the island is the thriving village of Tompkinsville, opposite the Quarantine Ground, at the Narrows. Back of this village the ground rises boldly to an elevation of some three hundred feet, overlooking land and sea for miles around, and commanding, among other wonderful scenes, the view of the bay and city presented in our frontispiece. Down in the fore-ground, at the left of the picture, is a glimpse of a portion of the town and of the site of the hospitals, which were offered as a holocaust to the popular indignation at the time of the memorable Quarantine rebellion, in the summer of 1857. The hospitals, though sufficiently isolated when first built, had, in the course of years and with the growth of the population, come to stand, with all their peril to the public health, in the midst of crowded homes; so much so, that when the authorities neglected to comply with the demand for their removal to some more suitable place, the impatient populace took the matter into their own hands, and settled it by burning the obnoxious structures to the ground. They were subsequently rebuilt, in part, and were again temporarily used; but the patients were finally removed to the present floating-hospitals, miles below the old quarters, at the locality known as the West Bank.

In the neighborhood of the Quarantine ground are Forts Tompkins and Richmond, already referred to, and near them is the picturesque height of Signal Hill, crowned with the telegraph which announces the coming of the yet far-off voyager to the watchers in the city above.

Staten Island, or Staaten Eylandt as the ancient Dutch settlers wrote the name, was known to the Indians under the euphonious appellation of Squehonga Manackmong. It forms a considerable and an important part of the Empire State, extending some fourteen miles in length, and about eight miles at the point of its greatest breadth. Guarding as it does the great access to the city from the sea, it is, in a military point of view, a place of high consequence. So the British General, Sir William Howe, regarded it, when he established himself there, first of all, at the period of the American Revolution, keeping possession from 1776 to the close of the contest.

The island, lying as it does within half an hour's sail of the metropolis, and possessing great and varied topographical advantages, has become a favorite resort for summer residence, and many are the stately chateaux and the cozy cottages which crown its beautiful heights or nestle in its peaceful glens.

At the most northern point of the island, where it is separated from the New Jersey shore by the Kills, as the little strait here is called, lies New Brighton—a winsome village of country seats, much esteemed by the denizens of the city when the dog-star rages. New Brighton presents the pleasantest of faces to the water, and looks out upon a picture equally attractive in return.

A little west of this village are the grounds of that famous charity for superannuated sons of the sea, known as the Sailor's Snug Harbor. This fortunate establishment was founded in 1801, by Captain Randall, and endowed by him with farm-lands then far out of the city proper, and valued at the time at some fifty thousand dollars; but which are at this day in the heart of the most densely-populated and most valuable section of the metropolis, and are measured by inches instead of acres. Little did the worthy Captain, however sagacious he was, know, in 1801, how great his generous gift would be sixty years after, and how many thankful lips would bless his bounty. To see the fruits of a good deed, one has but to gaze upon the pleasure of the veterans here looking out from their quiet haven upon the passing craft, and living over again, in grateful memory and reverie, the scenes and incidents of their adventurous lives.

Bedloe's Island, lying in the inner harbor, midway between the Narrows and the city, is distinguished as the place for the execution of pirates. It was here that the infamous Hicks lately expiated his fearful crimes.

Governor's Island, yet nearer to the city, is occupied with the defenses of Castle William and Fort Columbus. The rolling green-sward, which is now broken here and there only by the shadow of a disconsolate tree, was once covered by a luxuriant growth of shrubbery, and was then called Nut or Nutten Island. This was in the ancient days of Dutch predominance. Formerly it was, no doubt, a portion of Long Island, adjoining. The good people of New Amsterdam were wont to drive their cattle from the one point to the other, so shallow was the channel which intervened in their day. The abrasion of the shores by the waves, and the filling in of the lower part of the city gradually widened and deepened the passage, until it became profound enough to give that safe transit to the market boats loaded with butter-milk, from whence came its present name of Butter-milk Channel. At this day it is sufficiently deep for the passage of the largest ships.

Before leaving the harbor it will be pleasant to lend our gaze for a moment to the two great Cities of the Silent, sleeping in quiet shades on either side—the beautiful hills and glades of Greenwood on the Long Island shore, and the solemn haunts of the New York Bay Cemetery on the Jersey coast, opposite. Greenwood is picturesquely situated upon Gowanus Heights, in the southern part of Brooklyn. It covers some three hundred and thirty acres of very varied topographical beauty, adorned by much attractive embellishment, in landscape gardening and monumental architecture. It may be readily reached by railway at any moment, from the ferry landings at Brooklyn. The New York Bay Cemetery occupies one hundred acres, all liberally and charmingly adorned. The usual access is by ferry or railway from Jersey City. To explore the scenic wonders of these solemn homes of the dead, in the traverse of their endless paths and avenues, now stealing into shady glens and now looking abroad over the surrounding sea and cities, or to think of past and future, in reverie and musing, among the quiet tombs, might easily and happily employ the longest summer day.

The harbor and its islets now passed, the eye is dazzled by the pride and pomp of the metropolis, and the ear is filled with the rushing sound of its busy life. We may, perhaps, better understand the scene with the aid of a hasty peep at its antecedents in history and character.

Our earliest knowledge of the region is gathered from the log of the old Dutch skipper, Hudson, the first European who ever visited it. Hudson entered the Bay of New York and sailed up the great river, afterward named in his honor, in his valiant little craft the Half-Moon, on the 9th of September, 1609. At that period the country was occupied by a tribe of the Lenni Lenapé Indians, a great nation which extended from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. The year following that of the discovery of the country another vessel visited it, under the patronage of the Dutch, who were then the richest commercial people in the world, and, three years afterward, that is, in 1612, there came yet two other adventurers, and in 1613 still three more vessels made their appearance. With these arrivals the settlement and trade of the present metropolis was fairly commenced. The first charter was granted by the Dutch Government in 1614, and the region was then formally invested with its ancient name of the New Netherlands. Huts and houses gradually sprung up, and at length a rude fort was erected for the protection of the settlers. Thenceforward the population and the trade increased, under the succeeding administrations of the Dutch, the English, and the Americans, until the cabin here and there, and the little exchange of furs and furbelows of the seventeenth century, has grown into the mighty city and the magnificent commerce of the present day. For the details of the thousand and one incidents in all this eventful progress of two and a half centuries, we must refer the reader to the proper histories, excepting as we may now and then be led, as we said, to look back into the shadows of the past for light upon the picture of the present.

The Island of New York, or of Manhattan, as it was more melodiously called of yore, has a length, in a general direction north and south, of some fourteen and a half miles, with a breadth varying from half a mile to two miles or more. Its area is twenty-one and three-quarter square miles, or thirteen thousand nine hundred and twenty acres, exclusive of what has been, or may be, reclaimed from the rivers and marshes around. This entire surface is embraced within the city limits, and all of it is, more or less, covered by the city streets and residences. The island and city is also the County of New York. The population of the city can not, at this time, fall much short of one million, exclusive of another half million in the neighboring cities of Brooklyn and Jersey City, and other immediate suburbs.

In continuing our journey around the Island City, we shall—starting from the lower extremity, where the East and the North or Hudson Rivers meet in the Bay—traverse the first-mentioned waters on the east, and thence enter and follow the Harlem River, still on the eastern side, until we meet the Spuyten Duyvel at the upper end of the city. The eccentric windings of this valorous little river, will lead us around the northern boundary of the island into the great waters of the Hudson on the west, through which we shall readily regain our starting-point in the bay or harbor.

The first scene of interest to us, as to all who approach the island from the south, is the Battery, a crescent-shaped domain at the lower extremity of the city. This venerable spot is dear to all New Yorkers for its picturesque delights, and doubly dear through its intimate association with the whole life and history of the city. It may be said to have been, at one time, the city itself; for here, or in the immediate neighborhood, was it that the old pioneers erected the humble cabins and established the little trading-posts from which the present capital has sprung. Its warlike name grew out of the early employment which was naturally made of the locality for military defenses, though its associations have been chiefly with scenes and incidents of peace and pleasure. The rude rocks which once occupied the ground soon vanished as the settlement expanded; pleasant paths, overshadowed by spreading boughs, stole into their wild places, and the present park appeared, to the delight of other days as of the present, and, let us hope, of the future forever. It was here that the worthy burghers of the past loved to loll in summer evenings, watching the ripples on the blue waters of the beautiful bay, as they came ever and anon into view through luxuriant clouds of philosophic smoke. Here was it that the good vrows plied their industrious needles while watching the happy gambols of the future mynheers of the town; and here, too, was it that simple youth and maiden whispered simpler tales of love in the quiet glimpses of the moon. In later days, noble gentlemen and stately dames gravely displayed their courtly graces here, in the morning and evening promenade. Of many a stirring spectacle has the time-honored spot been the theatre—in military parade, civic ceremonial, and municipal courtesy. Here Washington was welcomed when he visited the city to be inaugurated as the first President of the Great Republic; here Lafayette, too, was received at a later day, and after him all the honored guests of the city down to the dignitaries of the Japanese Embassy, and the young prince and lords of England during the year just gone by.

The ancient fortress, known as Castle Garden, which now stands on the margin of the Battery-grounds, was originally built on a mole, and was connected with the shore by a wooden bridge. The recent extension seaward has absorbed this causeway, turned the intervening waters into terra firma, and placed the fort upon the island itself. Castle Garden lost its military character—forever we trust—as long ago as 1823, at which period it was ceded by the United States to the city of New York. Afterward it became a popular place of public amusement. Ice-creams were sipped for many years within its venerable walls. On summer nights the air was filled with the strains of the lyric stage, in all the brilliant array of concert and opera. The immense capacity of the edifice—which is six hundred feet in circumference and sufficient for the accommodation of fifteen thousand people—caused it to be selected for the first appearance in America of Jenny Lind, and here the songstress was heard, night after night, by as many as the place could hold.

The walks and trees of the old park still remain fresh and green, and the picture, which the spot overlooks, of wide waters and distant shores, is now more beautiful than ever, but the social aspect has changed, and probably for aye. The city now, no longer confined to the little lower end of the island, has marched away leagues beyond, leaving its old site comparatively deserted. To visit it at this day from the fashionable quarters of the town involves the time and labor of a long journey by omnibus or railway. Rivals, too, have sprung up elsewhere in many different neighborhoods; and last of all, that happy one, the great public resort now growing into such varied and wondrous beauty under the name of the Central Park. Yet not even these noble grounds, with all their extent and culture, can surpass the old Battery in its charming glimpses of the busy bay, or in its luscious bounty of fresh sea airs. These virtues yet remain intact, though fashion no longer enlivens the spot, and though the old castle has been transferred from a hall of dainty pleasures into a noisy receptacle for the debarking emigrants from foreign lands. Leaving the Battery on the left, and entering the East River, a wonderful panorama greets the eye—such a picture as only a vast maritime capital can present. Far as the sight may follow the windings of the waters, all is instinct with life and action. Great ships, bearing the flags of every clime, crowd the wharves, their forest of masts and spars hiding the view of the walls and roofs beyond. Craft of every class are moving hither and thither, darting across each other's path, as their varying courses lead; while, as if yet more to confound the seeming confusion, ponderous ferry-boats are forever crossing and recrossing here, there, and every where—altogether, a scene of crowded and tumultuous movement, unparalleled in the New World, unless it be in the ceaseless rush and roar of the great thoroughfare of Broadway close by.

The East River is properly a part of Long Island Sound, which waters it reunites with the Atlantic through the Bay of New York. The first settlement of New Amsterdam was made upon that portion of its shores which we are now passing in our starting from the Battery. Until a recent period, it was the marine dépôt of the city, and is so to this day in a great measure—although the immense expansion of our commerce has necessitated the gradual occupation of the wharves on the North River, as the Hudson is called in contradistinction to the East.

Continuing our voyage, the first objects of interest are the great packet-ships which sail between the metropolis and the European ports. They lie at or adjoining the ancient wharves of the old town, many of which still bear their original names, as Coenties Slip, Burling and Old Slips, Wall Street, etc. Wall Street, now the mighty financial heart of the city, was, during the Dutch epoch, the upper extremity of civilization. The boundary walls, in this direction, stood here, giving to the famous locality its present name.

Half a mile up the river we are in the vicinage of the principal ferries between the metropolis and the city of Brooklyn on the opposite shore. The first ferry ever established was between a point below Peck Slip, on the New York side, and the present landing-place of the Fulton Ferry on the opposite shore. At the period these localities were much beyond the city limits, but were chosen on account of the narrowness of the river there, and the consequent reduction of the labor required to stem the great force of the current. The first ferry-house was built on the corner of Broad and Garden streets, now Exchange Place. At this remote period Cornelius Dircksen rowed all the good folk across who had occasion to pass from the city to the Long Island shore, and his work was not over and above laborious at that. This was during the first half of the seventeenth century. In the year 1658 the ferry lease was sold at auction at an annual rent of three hundred guilders. In 1810 the row-boats, or pirogues, gave place to the more efficient horse-boat, and four years later steam was introduced, Fulton having lately, in these very waters, triumphantly demonstrated the practicability of that wondrous agent in its application to navigation. The first steam ferry-boat employed was called the Nassau, and commenced its trips on the 8th of May, 1814, running during the day time only. Night trips were not introduced until 1827. At this time there are some ten ferries to Brooklyn and its vicinage, all well supplied with commodious and stanch steamers, en route incessantly night and day. Their average burden is about four hundred tons, and at certain seasons and hours they carry—so great is the travel—a thousand passengers at a time, besides horses and vehicles. This while passing and repassing every ten or fifteen minutes.

Adjoining the largest of the Brooklyn ferries is the Fulton Market—the most extensive of the city institutions of this class. It makes no sign from the water, but stepping ashore in the early morning, we may see a sight which, of itself, will reveal the whole story of the surging life around us—the hecatombs of edibles of all sorts at once suggesting the idea of the myriad mouths they are destined to fill. The merry bustle of the spectacle is very likely to induce a strong appetite for action of some shape, if not for breakfast. It is commended as an effective stimulant to the indolent and ennuied.

Let us here follow the crowds, ever going or coming thence, to the opposite bank of the river. The wondrous expansion of our metropolis is strikingly seen in the fact that, from the mere overflow of its ever-increasing population, one of its suburbs has, within the short lapse of a quarter of a century, itself become so great a city as to be to-day, numerically, the third in rank in the republic. Though founded as early as 1625, Brooklyn was, at the period of the Revolution and of the memorable struggle within its borders, known in history as the Battle of Long Island. Only a little settlement, the houses in which might easily have been counted from the opposite shore. It was only in 1808 that it was promoted from its humble village rank to the dignity of a town, and its city charter dates no further back than 1834. Its population to-day can not fall much short of three hundred thousand; and with so fair a prospect of continued increase that, at some not far-off day, she may presume to dispute precedence with her mother-capital, of whom she even now speaks as "our sister city."

At the abrupt turn which the river makes in this neighborhood, we pass Corlear's Hook on the New York bank—once the farm-land of Antony Van Corlear, the redoubtable esquire of Peter Stuyvesant in the New Amsterdam period; and upon the Long Island side the waters of the Wallabout Bay, historically interesting as the site of the earliest settlement of Brooklyn, afterward as the anchorage of the terrible prison-ships of the British during their occupation of New York in the Revolution, and now as the location of the United States Navy-yard.

Above and around the Wallabout is Williamsburg, formerly a distinct city, but now merged in Brooklyn under the title of the Eastern Division. Yet beyond is Greenpoint, and on the opposite bank of the Newtown Creek, which enters the river here, is Hunter's Point, the last of the business suburbs of the metropolis in this direction, and the beginning of the charming villa settlements of Ravenswood and Astoria.

This is the vicinage of the great ship-yards of the city. These establishments are gathered around upon either shore, making all the air resonant with "the sound of hammers, blow on blow," and exposing to the curious gaze all the patient and laborious process of marine architecture, from the anxious laying of the keel to the preparations for the exultant launch. Here or there may be seen the craft of every species, from the shrill-voiced tug or ferry-boat to the thunder-lunged and iron-wrought steamship—from the saucy little pleasure-yacht, eager to leap forth into the laughing waves, to the shadowy hulk of the grim warrior, solemnly growing into its earnest life. Among the scenes of this class most pleasurably visited on the city side are the great founderies known as the Novelty Works, at the foot of Twelfth Street, the yards of William H. Webb and Co., Thomas Colyer, C. E. Delemater, Roosevelt, Joyce and Co., and the Westervelt yard. On the opposite shore are the establishments of Webb and Bell, Henry Steers, Simonson and Co., Sneed, Rowland, and Co., and E. F. Williams, all at Greenpoint; and Lawrence and Foulkes and Edward Lupton in Williamsburg. The aggregate cost of the vessels constructed in the various yards during the past year is estimated at nearly three and a quarter millions of dollars.

The Dry Dock, at the foot of Tenth Street, is a structure of rare marvel. So complete and powerful is its operation that the largest ship may be "docked," or lifted high and dry out of the water and secured for repairs, in the brief space of four hours and twenty minutes. Ten years were passed and eighty thousand tons of stone were employed in its construction. The outlay involved exceeded two millions one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is said to be the largest dry dock in the world.

At the foot of Twenty-seventh Street we pass the ancient foundation of Bellevue Hospital. At Thirty-sixth Street is Kip's Bay, and at Forty-seventh Street is Turtle Bay, both points of importance during the war of the Revolution. At that time redoubts stood here, as also at the locality of the Shot Tower, a few blocks above. Hereabouts we are opposite the lower extremity of Blackwell's Island, and are exchanging the metropolitan aspect of the city shore for something like its ancient rocky and wooded look. The streets are fast finding their inexorable way, however, to the river, in this neighborhood, as they have done below. This wooded interval, which continues until we approach that part of the metropolis yet distinctively known as Harlem, is chiefly occupied in the way of rural resorts for the people on gala days and at holiday hours. Jones's Wood is a famous place of the kind, patronized, as is Conrad's Park and Hamilton Park, in the same quarter, by the Germanic portion of the inhabitants. Here, from booths and summer-houses, looking out upon the river through the sheltering foliage of venerable trees, many parties of both sexes and of all ages sit and sip their beloved lager, as in the blessed gardens of Faderland. To vivify the delight varied sports are provided, in the form of shooting-galleries, fandango travel, and, on high festal occasions, of most excellent vocal and orchestral music.

At Jones's Wood we are nearly opposite the centre of Blackwell's Island, and not far from the ferry thence to the foot of Sixty-first Street. This ferry is a half-hourly row-boat communication, under the direction of the Island authorities. Blackwell's Island lies lengthwise on the river, extending from north to south about a mile, and having a breadth of a stone's toss. It divides the river into two channels—that on the left hand washing the city shore and leading into the Harlem waters, the other, passing Ravenswood and Astoria, on Long Island, into the Sound. It is the most southerly of the group of islets which contribute so greatly to the picturesque character of the region. Seen, as they generally are, at sunset or sunrise by the departing or arriving voyagers, on the great steamers which travel the Sound routes between New York and Boston, their appearance is wonderfully varied and attractive—their diversified forms, their turreted walls, towers, and domes, the surrounding villages and villas, the distant city, the passing and repassing sails far and near, and the gold and purple glories of the sky, making a rare and surprising combination of picturesque effect. Many fine views of this portion of the city vicinage are afforded from the high grounds of the upper division of the new Central Park. It is not, however, for their natural beauty, great as that is, that these islands are most famous, but rather as the site of many of the excellent charitable and correctional establishments of the city—these defenses against the assaults of vice and crime literally covering their whole surface. The little area of Blackwell's Island alone contains the city Penitentiary, the Work-house, the Alms-house, hospitals, and a Lunatic Asylum, all of which are massive and imposing stone structures. Upon Ward's Island, next above, is the Emigrant Hospital; and upon Randall's Island, yet beyond, are the edifices of the House of Refuge. Some idea of the service performed by these establishments may be gathered from the fact, that the average number of inmates within their walls—those in Bellevue Hospital, just below, upon the city shore, included—is nearly seven thousand. On the last Saturday of the past year (1860) there remained in the Bellevue Hospital 1033 patients, in the Lunatic Asylum 711, in the Alms-house 1770, in the Work-house 1082, in the Penitentiary 762, and upon Randall's Island 886 persons. Two hundred children were sent from the last-named point, during the past year, to pleasant homes among the farmers of the West. "The Institutions," as they are familiarly called, are carefully fostered by the people, and are formally exhibited, with great pride, to the distinguished visitors and guests of the city. Blackwell's Island is, at its nearest point, about four miles from the City Hall, and Randall's Island is at a distance of seven and a half miles. Ward's and Randall's Islands were formerly called Great and Little Barn Islands.

It is in passing the islands to or from the Sound that the navigator encounters the once terrible and still dangerous whirlpool of Hell Gate, off the beautiful shore at the village of Astoria. The terrors of this transit lie in the swift and capricious currents, and in the treacherous points of submerged rocks. In other days it required as much temerity to dare their dangers as it does now to penetrate the mysteries of the poles. Tradition says that the Hell Gate rocks, which have been much reduced of late years by submarine blasting, were, at a far remote period, above the surface, and were used as stepping-stones across the strait. Tradition does not, however, mention the stature or length of limb of the race which then peopled the region.

Returning to the channel on the opposite side of the islands, and continuing our voyage from Jones's Wood, we soon reach the ancient village of Harlem, founded just two hundred years ago as the terminus of a country ride from New Amsterdam. It has served that excellent purpose ever since, though its little individuality is fast falling into that of the great city of which it is a part, the avenues and streets of the lower end of the island now traversing its precincts in unbroken order. The Harlem Railway through the Fourth Avenue, and horse-railways on the Third and Second Avenues, link it closely and cheaply with all parts of the metropolis below. At Harlem we are fairly at the end of the city streets and wharves, as the upper end of the island, extending still some four miles to King's Bridge, has not yet fallen a prey to the leveling despotism of the surveyor, except in the form of a net-work of charming country seats, and here and there a village nook. The region still retains its ancient rural aspect, looking out upon the surrounding waters through gentle valley slopes, or from the summit of bold, forest-crowned, and rock-ribbed hill-sides. To the citizen wearied with the endless streets its beauties are especially grateful, whether he ride through the lanes and roads of the interior or, like us, skirt the quiet shores. Strange that it should be so little known to the million around! Happily, within the last year or two, ways and means of public enlightenment in regard to it have sprung up, in the form of a route of pleasure travel through that portion of it upon which we shall immediately enter. Commodious steamers now convey passengers every hour of the summer days through the whole length of the Harlem River, from Harlem via the High Bridge of the Croton Aqueduct to the immediate vicinity of King's Bridge, taking them at once from the cars of the Third Avenue railway or the Peck Slip steamers, by which they arrive from the lower parts of the town; the whole trip by both boats, or car and boat, costing them but ten or twelve cents each way. Thousands daily avail themselves of these precious facilities for escape from the hot and dusty city to the pure air and sunshine of the country, filling the cool and shady woods all around with happy groups of ruralizers, and the waters with merry voyagers.

Passing now through the draw of the bridge by which the Harlem Railway crosses the river, we are on the bosom of a pretty lake-like expanse, shut in, beyond, by the approximation of the island and the Westchester County shores and the new bridge which unites them at M'Comb's Dam. The ground is rising to picturesque heights upon the right, while upon the opposite side the great Harlem Plains, stretching from the upper end of the Central Park at One Hundred and Tenth Street, terminate in long reaches of marsh and salt meadow. The boats of the Harlem and Spuyten Duyvel Steam Navigation Company are, perchance, puffing their merry way along; maybe a sail, here and there, is filled by the freshening breeze, or gay rowers are moving in time with gayer minstrelsy; or, who can tell, a patient angler is trying to lure a bass from its native floods, perhaps has actually got him upon his deserving hook, such things still happening here and among the islands of the East River beyond. Whether either or all these agreeable lights may chance to fall upon our picture, or not, it is still a pleasant one, and a worthy prelude to the galaxy of beauties immediately to follow.

M'Comb's Dam has long been a favorite terminus of the pleasure rides and drives from the lower part of the island. The Eighth Avenue ends here, after skirting the whole western line of the Central Park. The railway in this thoroughfare will soon be in operation along the whole route, making a new and very desirable access to the rural beauties of the city, of which the locality of M'Comb's Dam, or M'Comb's Bridge, as it may now be more properly called, is one of the chief portions. The Harlem valley stretch ceases at this point, and just beyond the high lands begin, and the bold shores on either side of the river are united by the magnificent marble arches of the great bridge of the Croton Aqueduct. There are two excellent hotels at the Dam, both approved resorts for creature comforts, either solid or fluid, after a hard drive, or an appetizing spell of boating or fishing. The glimpse of the High Bridge from "Florence's," with the agreeable fore-ground of soft-shell crabs, oysters, and miscellaneous vials, suggested by our sketch, is an enjoyment which hath been, and may, we trust, long be.

The elevated grounds of this part of the island are called Washington Heights, and upon the crown, just above the Dam, and midway between the Harlem and the Hudson, lies the village of Carmansville, traversed by the Tenth Avenue and the King's Bridge Road or Broadway. Prominently seen upon the summit of the river bank just beyond is the mansion of Madame Jumel, the widow of Aaron Burr. As we write the venerable lady is still the occupant of the estate. The Jumel House was at one time the residence of Colonel Morris, Washington's companion in arms at Braddock's defeat, and his rival suitor for the hand of Mary Phillipsee. It was also for a while the head-quarters of the commander-in-chief when the American army abandoned New York.

Near by, upon the island shore at the High Bridge, is the Fort Washington Hotel, the chief refreshment house of visitors, whether coming in carriages or stages through the city avenues or by the Harlem cars and steamers.

The High Bridge is, after the natural beauties of the Harlem, its most commanding feature, being charmingly seen through the whole course of the river, from M'Comb's Dam to its terminus at King's Bridge. The famous structure crosses the river upon fifteen arches, eight of which have a span of eighty feet. Its length is fourteen hundred and sixty feet, and its height one hundred and fifty feet. It was built at a cost of nearly a million of dollars. The little steamers of the Harlem land their pleasure-seeking loads at the foot of the bridge on the Westchester side, where they scatter joyously through the woods and over the meadows around, or climb the steep hill and cross upon the Aqueduct to the opposite shore.

The next landing-place of the steamers above the Bridge is at Tomlinson's Woods, which drop down from the site of old Fort George, of Revolutionary fame. Among the rocks and forest trees of this primitive region one may be as secluded as in the farthest mountain wilds, unless indeed, it should, as often happens, be overcrowded with roistering picnic groups.

Crossing to the right from Tomlinson's Woods, the boats touch next at Morris's Dock, permitting explorers to ascend the Westchester hills and enjoy the glimpses thence of the varied topography of the neighborhood—to see at one view the waters of the Harlem, the winding route of the Spuyten Duyvel, and the distant Hudson with its flank of Palisades.

The next point of debarkation, also on the Westchester side, is Fordham Landing, and the last, across the river, is the Century House, not far from King's Bridge. The Century House derives its name from its venerable age, claiming to be the oldest edifice in the region. It is nothing but a little Dutch hut, with such modern additions as were required for its present business in lager and soda water.

At the Century House we are almost within the evening shadow of the residence of Mr. Seaman; the palatial mansion of gleaming marble which has been so imposingly in view at all points in our voyage from the High Bridge upward. This edifice is equally prominent from various bends of the Spuyten Duyvel, and also from the Hudson.

King's Bridge is a venerable and historic little structure, spanning the narrow and shallow meeting of the waters of the Harlem and the Spuyten Duyvel. A century ago it was the only link between the Island of Manhattan and the main land. The troops of both armies crossed and recrossed it at the time of the Revolution, when it was the theatre of many stirring and memorable events. Anxious sentinels then guarded its approaches; armed hosts were encamped around it; and frowning fortresses looked down upon it from all the surrounding heights. Villas and chateaux have taken the places of the forts; fertile meadows and gardens occupy the camp-grounds; the sentry-boxes are replaced with oyster and beer shanties; and dashing equipages traverse it on their way from fashion-dom to the rural haunts of the vicinage.

The waters, as we have already intimated, are extremely shallow in the immediate neighborhood of King's Bridge; but being of navigable depth in all other parts both of the Harlem and the Spuyten Duyvel, it needs but to deepen them here in order to open the way for an easy passage of ordinary river-craft, which would save miles of travel round the lower point of the city in going from the Hudson to the East River, or from the East River or the Sound to the Hudson; and this improvement, it is said, might be made at a small cost. How nicely little steamers might make such a trip as our present one, with the way thus cleared, even despite the necessary draw-bridges!

Another mile's sail through the circuitous windings of the saucy Spuyten Duyvel will bring us to the waters of the noble Hudson, upon the western side of the island. The Spuyten Duyvel is a little stream, but it would take us a long while to traverse it were we to linger, as we might, at all its points of attraction: the prettily-wooded points here, the rocky shores there, and the vistas of valley-stretch, ending in villa or castle-crowned heights, revealed at every unexpected turn. The origin of the eccentric name of this capricious little river, meaning "in spite of the devil," is authentically determined by the veracious Diedrick Knickerbocker in his story of the "doleful disaster of Antony the Trumpeter"—wherein we read that the said Antony, of the family of Van Corlear, arriving one stormy night at the banks of the creek, urgently bound on an errand of his master, Peter Stuyvesant, undertook to swim across it, and swore roundly to do so, even "en spyt den duivel!" An eye-witness of the rash act is said to have testified to having seen the irritable personage thus daringly invoked seize poor Antony by the leg, and drag him under the angry floods; which testimony the supposed victim never reappeared to contradict. On the contrary, certain superstitious folk, it is asserted, profess yet occasionally to see his ghost haunting the fatal spot, and to hear his sonorous and soul-stirring trumpet mingling in the rush and roar of tempest winds. At the mouth of the Spuyten Duyvel, where it is crossed by the railway upon the banks of the Hudson, we pass the old revolutionary site of Cockhill Fort, which stood upon the bluff on the city side, and that of Fort Independence, once its vis-à-vis, on the opposite point. Another equally pleasant and much older reminiscence of the mouth of the Spuyten Duyvel is that of the attack made here by the Indians upon Hendrick Hudson while he was passing the spot, in his voyage of discovery, in 1609. Many of the first settlers of Manhattan were desirous, it is said, to plant their city of New Amsterdam upon the banks of the Spuyten Duyvel instead of upon the other end of the island. Could they now revisit the scene, they would see their preference virtually realized, after all, in the expansion of the metropolis from the one point to the other.

MOUTH OF THE SPUYTEN DUYVEL CREEK.

OLD REDOUBT, NEAR FORT WASHINGTON, ON THE HUDSON.

Marvelously changed is the picture as our boat at length leaves the little nooks of the capricious creek, and enters the stately floods of the great Hudson. The eye dilates and the heart expands at the sudden revelation, uncertain where to rest, drawn hither and thither by the rival wonders; now won northward to follow the frowning line of Palisades twenty miles or more to the broad Tappan, and now turned toward the south upon the spreading city and the distant sea. Long might we pause here in happy contemplation; but time and tide bear us inexorably on, and we must be content to enjoy the magnificent picture in such passing glimpses only as our opportunity now permits.

The upper portion of our island yet presents, upon the Hudson side as upon the East, very much of its primitive forest look; and for more than half the distance of the fourteen miles between the Spuyten Duyvel and the Battery the shore is as yet but little disturbed by the city encroachments, excepting as they occasionally "crop out," like the geologist's rocks, in the form of a factory dock, an embryo street, or a village nucleus. From the water, the landscape appears peaceful and rural enough in the curtaining veil of summer verdure; but step ashore any where and the cloven foot of the town is somewhat more evident. Along highways and byways, which seem yet to need no other evening light than that of the gentle moon, there already stretch lines of glaring gas-lamps, and in the shadow of mossy hillocks the eye may occasionally detect the intrusive uniform of the Metropolitan Police. Even the country-seats of the vicinage are, for the most part, far less durably and expensively constructed than are the chateaux on the river shores above the island—in view, no doubt, of the short lease anticipated from the sweeping expansion of the town.

The unexpected apparitions here just referred to, of those metropolitan belongings, the gas-lamp and the police-officer, will carry the thoughts of the musing naturalist curiously back to the period when our city fathers were considered to be exhibiting a wonderful degree of enterprise in passing an ordinance which required the suspension upon dark nights of a lantern from the windows of every seventh house, and when they established a night watch for the town, composed of "four good and honest inhabitants," with the simple duty of posting the people in respect to the hour and the state of the weather. But long is the interval since those simple days, and especially when it is measured by the changes which it has wrought. Our purpose now is to look at the present rather than the past; so let us sail along.

The lofty table ridge which overlooks the Spuyten Duyvel continues unbroken for the distance of a mile, when it drops nearly to the river level at the railway station of Tubby Hook. The whole way is closely occupied by quiet country retreats, with woods and lawns extending back to the King's Bridge Road. Tubby Hook is but little more than a name, borrowed, it is said, from a whilom ferryman of the neighborhood, but, according to the erudite surmise of the late Diedrick Knickerbocker, adopted in honor of a distinguished washer-woman who once practiced her art hard by. The place is simply a dépôt for the surrounding villa homes.

THE DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM, HUDSON RIVER.

In our next mile's travel we pass the heights memorable in revolutionary story as the site of Fort Trvon and Fort Washington. These were the last strongholds which the American army held upon the Island of Manhattan, and they were abandoned only after the bravest and most sanguinary defense. Traces of the conflict are to this hour occasionally discovered in the unearthing of cannon-balls and other appurtenances of bloody war. The precise spot upon which Fort Washington stood is now included in the beautiful estate of Mr. James Gordon Bennett. It is the highest of the high lands of the metropolis, and overlooks the river and all its surroundings of cities, villages, and farms, from the Tappan to the Atlantic. Both in its natural charms and its art embellishments, Fort Washington is confessedly the crown of all the rural portion of New York.

The picturesque promontory which steps so bravely into the river at the base of Fort Washington is Jeffrey's Hook. It was fortified during the Revolution, and remains of its redoubts are still distinctly to be seen. The wilds around are unoccupied, and offer most attractive allurements to ruralizers, especially with the facilities of the river railway and its station close by.

Opposite Mount Washington, and at the lower terminus of the Palisade range is Fort Lee—a pleasant village now, but a bold fortress long ago. It fell into the hands of the British troops simultaneously with its sister defenses on the other side of the river.

Continuing our voyage on this other side, we come immediately to the grounds of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, a noble edifice perched on the heights above, with broad, grassy lawns sweeping down to the water's edge. The access to this interesting institution is by the entrance on the King's Bridge road just above the village of Carmansville.

Next below the Asylum—not including a large sugar-refinery—is Audubon Park, a charming group of country-seats, all sharing in common the rural pleasures of a broad, woodland stretch along the river marge. Audubon Park was named in honor of the illustrious ornithologist. Here was his residence, and here his family still dwell. Near the lower end of the Park is the Carmansville station of the Hudson River railway at the foot of One Hundred and Fifty-second Street.

The interval between the Park and the railway dépôt is occupied by the thickly-wooded grounds of Trinity Church Cemetery. These grounds stretch back from the river to the Tenth

THE ORPHAN ASYLUM, ON THE HUDSON.

THE CITY FROM ELYSIAN FIELDS, HOBOKEN.

Our compagnons du voyage, who are sailing with us along the island shore, are, no doubt, looking wistfully across the wide river to the opposite beauties of the New Jersey side. Let us, before we drop anchor at the Battery, take a peep at these attractive suburbs of the metropolis. Though their rural charms are—like those of all the surrounding country resorts—fast passing away, before the rapid encroachments of the streets, enough still remains to repay a visit, while the pictures from the water and of the water are ever, and almost as ever, striking.

Avenue, at present the great central thoroughfare of this part of the island. Among the tombs here is that of the Audubon family, where the great naturalist himself is sleeping, and to which his eldest son and fellow-worker was borne only a year ago. This cemetery is the only one of any extent now remaining within the city limits. The large brick building, at the foot of One Hundred and Fifty-second Street, adjoining the cemetery grounds, is a summer hotel called the River House, and, just below, embowered in the foliage of an extensive park, is the Woodlawn House—once a private mansion, and now filled in the leafy months with fashionable truants from the town.

Yet a little further down and we approach that part of the metropolis still distinctively known as Manhattanville, but soon to be merged in the general mass, as the former villages of Chelsea and Greenwich were absorbed long ago. Manhattanville is a station upon the river railway, about eight miles above the terminus in Chambers Street. It is a considerable and very stirring place; and the streets are already graded and much occupied thence all across the island to Harlem, on the eastern shore. Among the public establishments of this part of the city are a large Lunatic Asylum, and a convent and seminary of the Catholic church.

Within the remaining stretch of the river-shore, until we again reach the compactly built town at Fifty-second Street, are included the several roadside resorts of Clermont, Stryker's Bay, and Burnham's; and the pretty edifice of the Orphan Asylum with its beautiful lawns sloping down to the river's side.

From Fifty-second Street back to the Battery and the Bay we see again, with variations, the busy pictures upon which we have already looked on our passage up the East River—endless and crowded streets and wharves and fleets of vessels of all kinds, jostling each other at the piers and in their passage to and fro in the stream. On this side of the city, huge lumber-yards take the place of the ship-yards and steamboats and steamers of the clipper ships of the East River. It was hereabouts that the Great Eastern was moored during her visit to New York in the summer of 1860.

The rocky cliffs of Weehawken are but little touched as yet by the hand of Improvement, and one may wander there to-day, as of yore, among quiet glens, and look out from breezy heights upon the far-spreading waters and the surrounding cities and towns. The ramble by the shore, too, is a pleasure still to be enjoyed, despite the opening of new roads and such changes as are now in progress, in the building of the huge docks of the Delaware and Hudson Coal Company. The scene of the fatal encounter between Hamilton and Burr, though much altered from its original aspect, is still sufficiently marked for easy recognition—the old landmarks of rocks and trees remaining intact by the margin of the river.

Hoboken, with its celebrated Elysian Fields, preserves less of its old character—excepting in the charming walks by the shore and past the Sybil's cave. The "Fields" have been greatly shorn, in late years, of their fair and broad proportions, little of them now remaining beyond the grounds used for the sports of the bat and ball. The spot is now more than ever given over to the outdoor festivities of the foreign population, especially those of the Teutonic stripe; and as at Jones's Wood, on the East River, great is the flow of lager and thick the incense of the friendly pipes. Excepting for the river pictures from its shores, and the grand panoramic views from its heights, Hoboken will, no doubt, cease in time to be a region of rural attractions—especially as the thousand and one varied delights of the new Central Park become available.

Jersey City, the Paulus Hook of Dutch days, is closely connected with the metropolis by excellent steam-ferries. It has liberally shared in the prosperity of all the vicinage of New York, until it has now a population of nearly thirty thousand, quadruple that of ten years ago. This is the metropolitan terminus of the great New York and Erie Railway and of the Philadelphia and Southern routes. Immense freights and thousands of passengers come and go every day by these highways. Jersey City is also the terminus of the Morris and Essex Canal, and the berth of the British line of steamships. The great dock, built for the accommodation of these leviathans, is among the chief boasts of the city.

THE CITY FROM WEEHAWKEN HEIGHTS, NEW JERSEY.

Many New Yorkers find it pleasant or convenient to reside in Jersey City, as in Brooklyn, and, indeed, in all the villages and country for thirty miles around; the facilities of travel upon railways and steamboats enabling them, with the little advantage of an early start, to reach their counting-rooms or shops in town as promptly as though they lived on the island itself.

We are now near the end of our route, having reached the point where the great waters of the Hudson mingle with the salt floods of the Bay. It only remains to flit across the mouth of the broad river and regain the grateful shades of the Battery grounds, from which we set out in this our varied voyage of thirty miles around the far-famed Island City.

THE DUELING GROUND, WEEHAWKEN, NEW JERSEY.

THROWN TOGETHER.

I.

THE hero of this story is Mr. Festus Buckle, aged thirty-four, a lawyer, and unmarried. He is tall, symmetrical, broad-chested, and, but for a slight stoop in the shoulders, perfectly imposing. With profuse wavy chestnut hair, and an absolutely patriarchal full beard of the same color, a Garibaldi recklessness of dress, and a long, nervous walk; his eyes large, blue, but—from much reading—near-sighted; his nose regular; the remaining features hidden by his mustache and whiskers. These latter waved picturesquely back above his massive shoulders as he strode down Broadway, and, combined with the shoulders, gave to following eyes an impression of majestic largeness. Look at him from behind, and you would take him for a pirate. But as you approach him in front, and see his spectacles, the delusion vanishes. Perhaps, after all, the best description of his personal appearance is a pirate, with a theological and metaphysical turn of mind, who under no circumstances could have been induced to capture a vessel which had any women on board; for all this was expressed in his face to those who knew him.

I have said that Mr. Buckle was a lawyer; but although he had an office in the fourth story of a building in Wall Street, his principal avocation consisted in being the mainstay of his worthy parents: consulting large books in the Hall of Records, to discover whether his father had sufficient title to his back-yard to warrant him in erecting a system of clothes-lines therein, and such like profound investigations. In the evening he read to his parents till ten—retreating precipitately up stairs at the advent of lady visitors. The reader will note this peculiarity, for upon this trait of Mr. Buckle's character hinges this story.

So much by way of introduction. Now for action.

Time—Three P.M. of a delicious, sunny September afternoon. Place—The open window of a second story front-room in Twenty-third Street, being Mr. Festus Buckle's apartment. Actor—That profound legal gentleman himself, who, having wearied of practicing that arduous profession, smoking pipes in a law office, had come up town in the middle of the day, and was now sitting in the window aforesaid, with a dreamy gaze at his friend Doctor Piper's gilt shingle on the opposite side of the street, and wondering why there wasn't any specialty for the sole treatment of sick gentlemen, so that he could have been a doctor too.

As he gazed Piper's door opened. A jolly, round-faced man, of a decided family look and about the middle-age, came rushing forth. He was in a high perspiration about something, and did not look up till Mr. Buckle called,

"Hello, Piper! Whither away?"

The round-faced family man threw a quick glance at the window, and instead of rushing down the street, as he had apparently intended, ran out into the middle of it.

"Hello yourself, Buckle! You're just the very man I want to see!"

"And I'm just the man that wants to see you. Come up, old boy!"

"I'm in an awful hurry! Run down and open the door!"

"Open it you—I'm lazy!" And with this Buckle tossed that rather superfluous utensil, his night-key, to the pavement.

"Oh, bless me!" said Mr. Piper, entering, "I'm in such a hurry I don't know where to begin first!"

"Begin any where, then, and trust to luck for coming out right."

"The steamer Montgomery sails for Savannah at half past four!"

"It always does on Thursday afternoon."

"From Pier 4, North River!"

"I'm sure that's a very good place to sail from."

"Be still! You know Mrs. Belle Godfrey, don't you?"

"I never heard of her!" exclaimed Buckle, with a countenance of awakened alarm. "On my honor, I never did!"

"Don't make any difference. She's my wife's cousin; young widow, beautiful, highly accomplished; goes on the Montgomery this afternoon—only one hour and a fraction!"

"Oh!" said Buckle, greatly relieved, "she's going away, is she? I thought you were going to ask me to call with you, or something of that sort."

"The postman has just brought a letter for her. I know from the handwriting that it's of the utmost consequence she should have it immediately."

"And you want me to run and get a boy to carry it down!" exclaimed Buckle, impetuously. "I see! I will! I'll be off this minute! Where's the letter? Give me my hat! Sit down and wait till I come back!"

"A boy won't do! Won't trust him! Letter's very important! A man must go!"

"Very well. I'll run and call a carriage for you!"

"Bosh! Got one of my own. I haven't time to go. I have a case of leg at the hospital—cut it off, you know—at three and a half; and two tumors in Twelfth Street for five. You must go!"

"Bless my— You don't mean it!" Every individual hair on Buckle's head began to assume the perpendicular.

"I do. Be quick! Here's the letter—here's your hat. Run out to Broadway—take the first South Ferry stage—get out at Morris Street, and go right west—takes you straight to Pier 4."

"You say she's a widow!"

"Talk about her affliction another time. When you get to the pier ask for the Purser—"

"And beautiful!"

"Be quiet. If you can't find the Purser hurry down into the cabin and knock at state-room door No. 14."

"Accomplished, heh? Knock at her door?"

"If she isn't in the state-room she'll be outside, see you, and ask what you want. Give her my love, and hand her the letter. If she doesn't see you, call out 'Mrs. Godfrey' at the top of your voice."

"At—the—top—of my voice! All the cabin will hear me."

"That's what you want."

"No, I don't! I don't! I'd rather look round."

"Well, be off at any rate. Quick! There's not a second to lose. I've been here three minutes already."

With a face of the most abject despair Buckle crowded his hat over his eyes, and permitted himself to be pushed down stairs. At the door Piper left him to hurry off after his "case of leg," and Buckle, wondering what the nightmare was like, if it wasn't this, sped for Broadway. Here, as prearranged, he took the first South Ferry stage. It was full, and he had to stand on the step. That he blessed himself over, for the jolt prevented him thinking connectedly. After coming near forgetting himself and going clear down to South Ferry, he jumped off at Morris Street, and was soon on board the Montgomery.

He asked the mate if he knew where the Purser was. The mate, who cherished ideas of discipline from having been in the navy, assumed a defensive attitude, and wanted to know if he looked like a Purser? Mr. Buckle had no distinct idea how a Purser did look, and forbore to reply. The next man he asked told him the Purser would go around just as they got off the Hook. Mr. Buckle had no desire to get off the Hook, but feeling much more like flying off the handle, pursued his queries further, and groped his way down to the cabin.

Finding No. 14, he grazed it tremulously with his fist. A rustle followed from within. Mr. Buckle started back.

"I declare I do believe she's in there!" said Mr. Buckle, speaking very much as if "she" were a ferocious individual of the gorilla family. The door-knob turned. Yes, she was coming out.

The door opened—the woman appeared. There she stood, projecting her head in an attitude of inquiry, a little woman, plump and riante, her face set in the middle of that make-believe saintly halo of tarleton known as a widow's cap. Seeing that Mr. Buckle was the most self-conscious-looking person in the saloon, she asked him in a soft voice,

"Did you knock, Sir?"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Did you wish to see me?"

"Yes—no—well, not particularly. I mean to say—that is—well, I've brought a letter for you. Dr. Piper requested me to."

He emphasized the last remark in an apologetic tone, as if he wouldn't for the world leave any impression that he had come of his own accord. Then, after a little confused fumbling, he dived into his breast-pocket and brought the letter to the surface. Handing it to the widow, he was about to beat a precipitate retreat, when she stopped him with a smiling—

"Oh, pardon me, Sir. Mr.—what may I call your name?"

"Buckle—Festus Buckle. Mr. Festus—Mr. Buckle."

"Ah, Mr. Buckle! A near neighbor to my cousin—just across the way, I believe. Please be seated. I have had the pleasure of meeting your mother. I have also seen you—smoking at your window," she added, archly.

"Have you, indeed?" said Buckle, perturbedly. "It's an abominable habit!"

"Oh, not at all! I am very fond of a good cigar."

"You are, really?"

"I am, really. Let me introduce myself. I am Mrs. Godfrey—Mrs. Belle—Mrs. Belle Godfrey. Perhaps you have heard my name before?"

"Oh yes! Piper has mentioned you—that is, incidentally you know."

"Well, it would have been quite an omission not to. But how absurd for me to introduce myself when you knew, of course, whom you were so kind as to bring the letter to! Ha-ha-ha!"

Her laugh was so fresh and silvery, so full of unrestrained bonhomie—to make a French bull by using a man's noun of a woman—that Buckle could not help assisting it with an antistrophe in that deep, gruff, pirate's chorus voice of his own.

"My acquaintance with your mother," continued the widow, "makes me feel quite as if we were old friends. I was therefore going to ask you to sit for a moment, excusing me while I read this letter, and then troubling you further to carry back a few lines if its contents need reply. I see it is quite an important one, judging from its handwriting. Can you easily spare time?"

"Oh, certainly!" returned the always obliging Buckle.

As Mrs. Godfrey sat reading the first bell rang. "Ah!" said she, finishing the letter hurriedly, "I must be quick about my answer. One moment, and I will get my writing-desk out of the state-room."

So Mrs. Godfrey jumped up, in a bewitching, bouncing-ball, little kind of a way, and ran into her state-room. There was a rattling, nervous sound in the state-room, and the moment after a soft voice called,

"Mr. Buckle! may I trouble you a moment?"

"Oh yes, Ma'am—I should say, not at all," replied Buckle, amiably. And emboldened by the extremity of his desire to confer an obligation, ventured within three feet of the state-room threshold.

"This lock plagues me so! I never can turn the key when I want to!"

"Ah! shall—I—ah—come in?"

"You may, if you'll be so kind. My hat-box, where I have the desk, is rather too heavy for me to bring out."

Aghast at his own temerity, Mr. Buckle entered No. 14, and for the next two minutes his piratical whiskers, in a manner unintelligible as some tremendous dream, were brushing against the snowy puffs of the widow's cap as he tugged at the key, and she benevolently helped him by holding down the lid with two small, fat, white hands of about five-mouse power.

"There!" said Mr. Buckle, at length, lifting himself up in such confusion that he bumped his head against the berth, thereby enhancing a vague sense he had felt before of having done something dreadful. "I believe it's unlocked now." Then added, as he felt the thump, "Oh! beg pardon!" being bewildered for an instant into the view that it was somebody else's head, and he owed an apology for it.

"Did it hurt you? I'm so sorry! I have some liniment in my trunk; but, dear me! that's stowed away in the hold, and we can't get it out till we're at sea. Though you're not going. I really wish you were—it would be so nice not to be among strangers! Well, here's the desk. I'll have the note ready in five minutes."

Mrs. Belle Godfrey immediately opened her desk, sat down at the table in the saloon, took out a quire of black-rimmed note, straightened on the thumb-nail of her left hand the nibs of a tiny gold-pen, dipped it in the ink, and leisurely put down her heading, forgetting no circumstance of time or place, with all a woman's sublime faith in the indefinite stretchability of "five minutes." She had got half-way down the first page, when a singular noise arrested simultaneously the attention of both writer and waiter.

Chik-a-rik-arik-arik-a-cher-r-r-r-r!

"Dear me—dear me!" cried Mrs. Godfrey, springing to her feet with an expression of intense distress, "Beppo has got out!"

"Beppo?" said Mr. Buckle, dreamily, debating whether this highly intelligible expression were some normal development of the unfamiliar animal, woman.

"Yes, Beppo," continued the widow, distractedly—"my pet red squirrel! Oh! where is he? He was in the state-room when we were unlocking the hat-box, fastened by a ribbon round his neck to the wire of the berth-curtain. We must have frightened the little precious so that he bit himself loose. Oh, do find him for me, Mr. Buckle! do catch him, or I shall never, never forgive myself!"

Mrs. Godfrey was trembling with grief, and might at any moment break out in that fresh spot known to Natural Historians who have cultivated her specialty as "a real good cry." Whatever that phenomenon might be, Mr. Buckle's admiration for scientific pursuits had never led him to witness it, and he didn't want to. So he straightway set about hunting the squirrel in good earnest. The arduousness of this gallant enterprise was slightly enhanced by Mrs. Godfrey's entreaty to the other benevolent passengers, who were prepared to join his chase, that they would by all means desist, for they might step on it, they knew, and then she would give up. Not wishing to have her do that, they obeyed, and Mr. Buckle went forth after Beppo alone. A few successive "cher-r-r-rs" from the cushion over the stern-post soon revealed that as Master Beppo's locality. But this apocalypse was only the beginning of troubles. Mr. Buckle made a pounce at the little beast; the little beast jumped over Mr. Buckle's head. Then the straightforward race began. Beast down the saloon table—Buckle alongside of it. Ten to one on beast, and no takers. At the end of the table beast jumps down, and pops through the open door into the Social Hall. But before Buckle could shut the further doors of the Social Hall beast had gone through, and was making the fastest time on record along the midship guards, past the pantry, kitchen, and engine-room.

"Oh!" cried Mrs. Godfrey, "he'll get down into the machinery, and be ground to death!"

But the power which takes care of squirrels as well as sparrows and men prevented such a lamentable dénouement. Beast still kept the straight line over all obstacles—and, to cut a long story short, eventually leaped through the steerage door, down the ladder, and, like Gill in the poem, Buckle came tumbling after.

Oh, the obliging Buckle! What a pickle he was in! He introduced himself to the astonished steerage passengers by shouting out, "A dollar to any body who'll catch that squirrel!" then remembering that Mrs. Godfrey had forbidden any assistance to his sole efforts, and seeing the imminent danger which might result from a scramble of twenty pair of hob-nailed brogans, he was on the point of amending his offer to "A dollar to any one who won't catch him!" But fortunately for Beppo's prospects of an extreme old age, the steerage conceived the idea that he was a rat, and made room for him. He accordingly got into some one of the two dozen tumbled berths, and was speedily hid from sight. Into which one was now the question to be settled.

This investigation took twenty-five minutes. With a most conscientious sense of duty to his employer refusing all proffers of assistance, he turned down sheets, lifted mattresses, piled up pillows, and shook curtains. At the close of the time mentioned his efforts were rewarded with success, and finding Beppo panting in a corner, he gently clapped a pillow over him, and dexterously brought him prisoner up the steerage ladder.

As he reached the deck he heard, for the first time, the regular thug-thug, thug-thug of machinery, and looking aft, beheld Governor's Island quietly gliding past the quarter!

Nothing but the tenacity of despair at that moment prevented his dropping Beast, pillow and all, to do what they liked with themselves.

For a moment he stood like any sensation heroine—"pale, transfixed, motionless;" then remembering the dictum of a celebrated man—"Do the duty nearest thee"—he resolutely marched back to the cabin and presented the squirrel to Mrs. Godfrey.

"Oh, Heaven bless you, my kind friend!" exclaimed that lady, as she caught up her pet and fastened his ribbon to her berth once more.

"Thank you, Ma'am," replied Buckle; then, in the same breath, "We don't stop any where, I believe, before we get there?"

"Stop? Get where?"

"To Savannah, Ma'am. I think that's where you're going? Because I find we've started."

"You don't tell me so! Oh, it must be a mistake! Stewardess, isn't there time for this gentleman to get off?"

"He could get off almost any where, Ma'am, but it would be rather wet," replied the stewardess, smiling.

"Oh dear me! And to think I have been the cause of it! What can I do, Mr. Buckle, to show how sorry I am? Oh, can you forgive me, Mr. Buckle?"

"I assure you I don't entertain the slightest gr— Oh, I mean to say certainly."

"Well, Mr. Buckle, since we can't help it, let's reflect that it might be much worse."

"Very true, Ma'am; so it might." For instance, Buckle was thinking, if there had been two ladies left on his hands instead of one.

"Will you excuse me a minute, Ma'am?" he added, after a short pause. Mrs. Godfrey bowed gracefully, and Mr. Buckle ascended the companion-way.

The Montgomery was now majestically approaching the Narrows. Of that magnificent gate, through which the gold and glory of our regal town is forever marching to pay tribute or bear away largess for the nations, Mr. Buckle had often thought, in the course of his wide studies, with patriotic enthusiasm. He had even written articles, entitled "The Narrows, and their Importance to New York, succinctly considered," which were refused by our very best journals. Love of the home fireside, and a proper caution against catching cold, had hitherto prevented him from making their closer acquaintance. He now had the opportunity of realizing his boyhood's dream. The Narrows were right before him!

But the Narrows did not seem to be exactly what he wanted. He retired to a sheltered place upon the poop-deck, and sitting down on the sky-lights of the after-hatch, drew from his breast-pocket the well-worn wallet, which, from the merry Christmas when it had happened in his stocking at the age of fourteen, had carried all the funds necessary for the accomplishment of his modest desires. Looking around to be sure that nobody saw him, he opened the wallet, and spreading his handkerchief on his knees to make a lap, shook the contents into it, and began counting, with this result:

"One receipt for waterproof blacking—cut from Scientific American. Key to my secretary. Shoe and Leather Bank—one dollar. Singular coin, brought from ruins of Pompeii—value supposed to be one cent. Two three-cent pieces. Mem. to have my next pantaloons cut looser in the knee. Eight postage stamps. Bank State of New York—another dollar. Extract from Tennyson's 'Maud:' 'Oh that it were possible!' Member's ticket to Historical Society."

"Four cents and one dime make fourteen, and a quarter makes thirty-nine cents. Two dollars and seventy cents!" exclaimed Buckle, the cold perspiration standing on his forehead. "Two dollars and seventy cents! Oh, Piper, Piper! A cabin passage is fifteen; and I don't believe the steerage is under eight. What shall I do?"

With a countenance of the extremest anguish Mr. Buckle walked to the larboard netting, and beheld gray Fort Hamilton, gold-leaved by the setting September sun. Each window on the palatial heights of New Utrecht was a square of fire. The scene was one naturally fitted to inspire the artist, the poet, or the philosopher—unless he were hard up. Mr. Buckle leaned over the side, with no responsive echo in his soul to Nature's beauty; and for a moment took into consideration the mathematical question whether, if he jumped over, he would be able to swim ashore. But it immediately after occurred to him that he had forgotten to learn how. And then he thought of old Mr. and Mrs. Buckle—what would they think when they found him spending the night out for the first time since they had the pleasure of his acquaintance? Night? Yes, three nights before he could even telegraph them!

Thrown together in a despairing heap he pursued these thoughts until the sun was nearly down and the Montgomery was passing the Dumb Beacon. At this juncture he was aroused by a tap on the shoulder, and rising from his bench beheld a man standing with outstretched hand:

"Your ticket, Sir—the Purser."

"Are you the Purser?"

"I am, Sir. Do you doubt it?"

"No; only I wish I had seen you a good while ago."

"Well, you see me now. Please hand over your ticket."

"Mr. Purser, on the word of a gentleman, I haven't got any!"

"You should have provided yourself beforehand. But the money will do as well now; though I can't promise you much in the way of a state-room."

"I haven't the money to pay for a state-room!" said Mr. Buckle, his anguish visibly increasing.

"Then you're out of place, Sir," replied the Purser, mildly; for he thought he saw in Mr. Buckle a poor gentleman in distress. "You will find pretty good quarters in the steerage."

"I haven't money enough for that," gasped Mr. Buckle.

"Then," said the Purser, with asperity, regarding Mr. Buckle in the less lenient light of a Jeremy Diddler, "what the d—l did you have the impudence to come on board for?"

"Sir! you are speaking to a—" began Mr. Buckle, in a defiant note; then recollecting that $2 70 is an inadequate specie basis for notes of that kind, terminated in a mild, soft voice: "I didn't want to come on board, Mr. Purser. I came to oblige a friend—Dr. Piper, of Twenty-third Street—and got left. No! didn't get left, I mean. You may know Dr. Piper? He's a rising young physician—"

"Don't try that on me, Sir! I'm acquainted with Piper—your kind of Piper that is, that smuggles himself aboard to hook a passage! That's a Piper that don't pay! You'll get Piper when the Captain sees you! You'd better go forward to the steerage-deck, and then perhaps he won't be so hard on you when I bring him up to you."

In the last stages of mental collapse—his hands in his pockets and his piratical beard upon his breast—poor Buckle clambered forward, and sat down over the forecastle. He didn't want a row with the Purser right in hearing of the cabin.

Ten minutes of suicidal wretchedness elapsed, and Buckle heard the Purser's voice saying, close behind him,

"There! that's the fellow!"

"Hello you, Sir!" said the Captain—his fresh, jolly face knit into the highest expression of ferocity which such a fresh, jolly face could wear—"are you the man that's trying to steal a passage to Savannah?"

"No, Sir! I haven't been trying to do any such thing!" exclaimed Buckle, in spite of his native mildness now quite brought to bay. "The passage has been forced upon me, Sir! So far am I from wishing to steal it, that if I were ashore I'd pay twice its value to have it taken off my hands. I'm a gentleman, Sir! And it strikes me that if the Purser had habitually associated with that class, he'd have recognized it in me when I told him I'd got left—hadn't got left, I would say!"

The Purser patted the deck with his foot and looked at the Captain—the Captain likewise at the Purser. Then they retired together to the extreme bow and consulted in whisper; while, like an ancient Christian martyr, Mr. Buckle looked to Heaven and awaited their sentence, leaning against the foremast.

"I don't know exactly what to make of the man," said the Captain.

"It's my opinion," said the Purser, influenced, unconscious to his own sense of justice, by the recent insinuations of Mr. Buckle, "that he's a swindler."

"But there's something about him which doesn't look just like a swindler."

"Swindlers generally wear those savage-looking whiskers."

"Yes, but then they don't put on spectacles. Whiskers and spectacles belong to different lines of the business. The whiskers are always rich English noblemen going South on a shooting tour, and having their funds sent by mistake to Savannah. The spectacles are young clergymen on their way to Augustine, with something bad the matter with their throats, under a misunderstanding that such cases are always passed free.

They always finish up the effect with a white choker. You see he mixes the whiskers and the spectacles. A swindler would pay more regard to probabilities, seems to me."

"Very well. We can let him stay in the steerage, if you say so. But suppose we try him with a few questions first?"

"All right. Go ahead!"

They returned, and Mr. Purser commenced the examination:

"I suppose you haven't any objection to mention your name?"

"No, Sir, I have not—especially where it's known. Mr. Festus Buckle."

"Buckle's not a bad name," said the Captain, encouragingly. "Drive on, Mr. Purser."

"And your residence?"

"No — Twenty-third Street, New York."

"Very nice street, too," again interposed the Captain, parenthetically.

"You say you came down for a friend—Dr. Piper—and got caught. What did Dr. Piper send you to do?"

"To bring a letter of importance, which came at the last moment, to a person on board."

"And is that person on board still?"

"She is a passenger in No. 14."

"No. 14, No. 14!" said the Captain, hastily. "Who is that? Look over your list, Mr. Purser."

Mr. Purser obeyed, and on inspection replied, "Mrs. Belle Godfrey."

"Mrs. Belle Godfrey! Bless my soul!" exclaimed the Captain. "Why, I know her as well as I do myself! She's gone South with me every winter since I've been in the line! Why, Mr. Buckle, I beg your pardon! Why didn't you tell us of this before? I'll go and see her directly!"

"Oh don't! really don't! Don't say any thing to her about it! I shall die of mortification; you see, I'm not at all acquainted with her, and only had any thing to do with her to oblige Piper."

"There!" said the Purser. "You hear that? He don't know her—only to oblige Piper—and all that sort of thing. I believe he is a swindler, after all! Well, Mr. Buckle, we shall soon find out; and if you are, we'll have to borrow your watch to pay for the passage you've borrowed."

The two officers then left Mr. Buckle to keep a look-out for Sandy Hook Light, while they repaired to the cabin.

In five minutes they returned, and Mrs. Belle Godfrey had persisted in clambering up to the forecastle deck with them, laughing at the idea that any place where her lively little feet could carry her was not good enough for ladies.

"Oh you poor, dear man!" she cried, taking the stupefied Buckle naïvely by the hand. "I'm so glad to find you! I was afraid you'd jumped overboard—I really was! Why in the world didn't you come and tell me what a pickle you were in? Of course nobody could expect you to go on an errand to the pier all prepared to make a voyage to Savannah! Just think if I'd got on to one of the Collins steamers by mistake instead of this. Why, I shouldn't be ready to make the trip to England, should I? It's all my fault from beginning to end, and I only beg you to forget all about it. Let's take a walk on deck till tea, and then we'll go down into the cabin again. Nobody else besides us knows any thing about this."

This frank statement of the bearings of such a terribly practical matter was something utterly unlooked-for by Mr. Buckle, in a woman. He had no idea that they ever thought of such matter-of-fact things as money; he supposed, if he ever reflected about them at all, that somebody always paid their passage for them. That they ate like himself he had occasionally noticed—that they also slept, was a truth which he held upon tradition, though in a rose-colored, angelic sort of a way which never mussed their hair; but these points of resemblance to male beings he had considered anomalies, and as to their thinking or talking like men in any respect, why, impossible! So that whenever circumstances over which he had no control had fatally forced him to address them, it was only upon the most trivial subjects, and in a style as nearly like Maud as prose could be. This I suggest as one of the probable reasons why he avoided them, because he did not succeed in that absolutely necessary kind of talk.

So now, when this cool wave of the widow's common sense dashed over his fevered brow, by mere astonishment it woke him from his previous bad dream, and he answered:

"I'm really very much obliged to you, Ma'am. Will you also have the kindness, if you can do it conscientiously, to certify to these gentlemen that I am Mr. Festus Buckle of No. — Twenty-third Street, of competent and respectable family, Attorney and Counselor, No. — Wall Street, and that all these facts, in form and substance, as averred, are true of your own knowledge and belief, so help you—"

"Oho!" burst in the Captain. "No need of an affidavit, I can assure you, Mr. Buckle."

"And, furthermore, that I am to be relied on as paying for my passage upon my earliest communication with my friends."

"Never mind that, Mr. Buckle," interposed the Purser. "It's settled. Mrs. Godfrey wouldn't permit us to return till we had assigned the debt to her. She's your creditor now."

"You—don't—mean—to say—!"

"That I have paid your passage?" laughed the little widow. "Is it such a very frightful liberty to take? Forgive me then, and, perhaps, I'll never do it again, unless Beppo gets loose, ha-ha-ha-ha!"

"Then, allow me to remark," said Mr. Buckle, in the fullness of his magnanimity lavishing upon her the attitude, expression, and peroration which he had been years keeping for that jury he expected to have some day—"allow me to remark that I consider it as doing honor to the noblest sentiments of the human heart! Also, that I will return you the exact sum for value received at the earliest possible opportunity."

"I'll stand surety for him!" said the Captain. "Hesha'n't go off the ship till we get to Savannah. If he tumbles over we'll catch him. Fare fifteen dollars and found, you know! See large bills."

"And to make assurance doubly sure, as well as to get forgiveness for my rough usage (Pursers must be Pursers, you know, Mr. Buckle!), I'll confine him in the upper berth in my room every night till we get to Savannah. It's the only vacant one in the ship; so I'm a pretty good jailor!"

"And I'll keep my eye on him!" said the widow, bewitchingly.

"Now, that's the cruellest punishment of all!" said the Captain. What with so much bantering, and the fact that the widow had just taken his arm to lead him away for the proposed promenade, Mr. Buckle felt himself blushing to a degree unprecedented since a bad dream he had years ago, when he thought he was at a tea-party where the company was all ladies but himself.

II.

When the tea-gong did sound the twin lights of Neversink Highlands were close behind the stern.

"There's tea," chirped Mrs. Godfrey. "Now, Mr. Buckle, like a good child say 'My Native Land, good-night!' and let's go down and find out whether we're hungry. The next time you see your native land you'll have to say 'Howdy'—that's the Savannese for 'how d'ye do?' If I'm sick, will you take care of me?"

"I'll try to," replied Buckle. Give him credit for the heroism of the answer! If there were no one else to do it on board, he would have taken care of the steam-engine, with similar feelings of graceful adaptedness, and about the same amount of knowledge of the subject. "Do you feel sick now?" he continued, apprehensively.

"No, not yet. But I shall be. I always am just about the time those lights get out of sight. I've made three voyages to Savannah and back. We're beginning to roll a little now. Are you ever sick, Mr. Buckle?"

"Fruit sometimes disagrees with me, Ma'am. But I don't think I was ever quite so far out at sea before; and I'm not sure about any thing else."

"Well, don't let's think about it. I hope you won't be. Let's go down to supper now, and banish disagreeable subjects."

People never think of banishing disagreeable subjects, you may have noticed, till those subjects are very pressing in their calls on attention. So it will not surprise you and me as much as it did Mr. Buckle, to know that Mrs. Godfrey had scarcely sent out for a piece of hot steak, stirred the sugar in her coffee, and with a forced smile accepted the butter from Mr. Buckle who sat next her, when, as in the case of Miss Muffett, who sat on a tuffet eating her curds and whey,

There came a great wave
Without asking her leave,
And scared Mrs. Godfrey away.

"Ah!" said an unfeeling passenger, who set up (I need not say without any substantial foundation) to be the wit of the vessel, "There is a lady who has no fondness for rolls with her coffee."

Mr. Buckle glared on the insensate wretch through his spectacles.

"I beg your pardon," said the passenger, instantly, "I did not know the lady was your wife, Sir."

"Oh!" groaned Mr. Buckle, once more blushing to his boots, and rose precipitately, under pretense of following Mrs. Godfrey—a duty to which his attention was thus providentially assisted. Simultaneously with him rose another roll, also three more lady passengers, though not from unselfish sympathy for Mrs. Godfrey.

Mr. Buckle found the little widow leaning against her berth, the roses fled from her cheeks and replaced by the pallor of deep, unnamable distress. She had not felt strength enough even to shut the state-room door, which was the only reason why Mr. Buckle saw her.

"Don't you think you'd like an omelet, or a plate of hot buttered toast?" asked Mr. Buckle, considerably.

"Oh, ugh! Go away!" exclaimed the widow, in a ghostly tone; and for reasons best known to herself, found strength to close the door. Mr. Buckle stood aghast. Was that the woman who had abashed him with her smiles, so short a time before? He was getting on fast in his Natural History of the animal's habits!

"Look-a-here!" said the Captain, rising and bending to his ear, "You just leave her alone for a few minutes, and then come back and carry her on deck. That's the best thing for her."

"Do you always have to carry them?" asked Mr. Buckle, in a confidential but excited tone.

The Captain was compelled to smile audibly. "When they can't walk," said he. "I hope that isn't this lady's case; but if it is, nerve yourself up to it, you might have a worse load! At any rate, take her on deck in five minutes, and keep her there as long as you can."

Mr. Buckle obeyed, and occupied the five minutes with the consideration what he should do with her when he got her there, also in the hasty achievement of his supper. At the expiration of the time, he knocked at the door of 14, and was answered by a gentle voice, "Come in."

"The Captain says I must take you on deck, Mrs. Godfrey."

"The Captain says! Well, I don't see that you are compelled to mind him, if you don't wish to," spoke the voice again, in a slight tone of pique, like a petulant sick child.

Mr. Buckle had not thought of his words as being liable to this construction, and was much taken aback.

"Oh no!" said he, putting his shoulders as well as his head inside No. 14, "I didn't mean that! I beg you won't think so. I only intended to say—well, that I'd like to do it myself. That is, of course, if you haven't the least objection."

"Well, Sir, if you really would like to, I'll oblige you."

"But don't put yourself out, you know."

"Oh, not in the least! I'll be ready in a moment, Mr. Buckle."

After a little bustling about in the state-room, Mrs. Belle Godfrey appeared, looking a little paler, to be sure, than when they started, and exhibiting some slight tremulousness in her gait—but still, a very pretty statue of Plumpness in marble.

This time, to his great surprise, not to speak of hers, Mr. Buckle offered the lady an arm of his own accord. The floor was by this time churning up and down with that charming regularity and ease which will some day, I hope, suggest to one of our brilliant inventors the idea of filling a steamer's hold with milk, and trusting to Providence to have it arrive at the Savannah market good fresh butter. This pleasant little motion made it necessary for Mrs. Godfrey to lean closer to Mr. Buckle's manly side than is regular in the less staggering walks of good society, and gave him an opportunity to discover other facts in the Natural History of the animal.

"How much softer and rounder their arms are than ours!" thought Mr. Buckle. "I really am not sure but the sensation is pleasant."

When they reached the top of the companion-way, Mr. Buckle helped Mrs. Godfrey to a seat on the leeward quarter of the stern-deck, where the pilot-house sheltered her from a rather stiff nor'wester which was blowing.

"Please to arrange this rigolette, it's rather too much over my eyes; and my arms are pinned fast under my shawl," said Mrs. Godfrey, as she settled herself upon the bench.

Without any remarks upon the singularity of this inextricable entanglement, which had happened during the short time since she abandoned his arm, Mr. Buckle did with his arms the work of hers, and arranged the troublesome piece of raiment in such a skillful and experienced manner as to suggest that he must have acquired it about the same time that he was learning to fly. He then procured a stool for himself and occupied it, about four feet from the widow.

"Now, thanks to your kindness, I am very comfortable," said the widow, in a sweet, rich voice, which would have meant a hundred compliments to you or me more than it did to Buckle.

"Oh, don't mention it! It is only my disposition. I like to oblige," said Mr. Buckle, trusting his conversational pinions the first time for a flight in that dangerous region, his own personality.

"I think your tendency is merciful. I have reason to know it particularly."

"Indeed? Piper, I suppose? He is always saying something good about me." From the mild, half-reproachful tone of Mr. Buckle, one would have thought he meant something bad. And he did, for Piper never would stop praising him to ladies, who straightway wanted to know him—which was disagreeable in Piper, very.

"No. From actual observation. For instance, that offer of hot buttered toast when I seemed to be riding head downward in a balloon. It was well meant, though I was provoked at the time—excuse me. And it—it—well, it resulted beneficially."

"Did it indeed? I'm charmed. Shall I go after some now?"

"Ha-ha-ha! I am all the time right on the point of saying, 'You dear creature!' If I do, sometime, call it sea-sickness. I don't mean the toast, you see. I mean the mention of it. I feel much better for it. These stars are beautiful. I wish we had a moon."

"So do I!" responded Buckle, enthusiastically, dimly seeing an opening for the necessary kind of woman talk.

There was a pause for some three minutes, during which Mrs. Godfrey patted the round of the stool with her little gaiter. But ah! she did not know what gigantic struggles were going on in the bosom at her elbow! Or did she know and enjoy them? Perhaps. Women, like babies, know a great deal more than we men are apt to give them credit for.

The fact is that Buckle was thinking over his little repertoire of lunar and astral poems—the magazine whence he extracted his final weapons of defensive warfare when brought to bay by a woman, and Maud had failed. He was wondering which he would quote first—also whether he might not be obliged to go on through a whole poem if he began a stanza—also whether it were best to quote at all.

Out of this delirious state of uncertainty he plunged with all a modest man's desperate recklessness, by forcing himself to hear the sound of his own voice. This would commit him to something—reassure him also.

"Speaking of the moon, don't you like Longfellow, Mrs. Godfrey?"

"Yes, indeed—I love him."

"That's a sweet thing of his which begins

"The night has come, but not too soon," ("Wouldn't this be as good a place as any to stop at? Oh no! I haven't got the moon in yet.)

"And sinking silently,

All silently, the little moon—"

("Now I can hold up! No, I can't; there isn't any sense in it: the moon's got to do something.)

"Drops down behind the sky."

("There! she's done it.")

"Yes, I remember it very well. Do you know the rest of the lines?"

Buckle groaned in spirit; then, with bare two second intervals for breath, repeated them continuously from beginning to end.

"I am very, very much obliged to you. Don't you know something else?"

Another internal groan, followed by a recitation of "The day is done, and the darkness," etc.

"I am very, very much obliged to you. Don't you know something else?"

Groan internal No. 3, accompanied by a growing sense of resistless motion down a steep acclivity without certainty of stopping short of the bottom. This preceded the recitation of

"Oh that it were possible!"

"I am very, very much obliged to you. Don't you know something else?"

If Mr. Buckle had been compelled to recite his little verses with a similar pleasant alternative to that on which Scheharazade complied with the request, "My dear sister, if you are not asleep, relate to me one of those little narratives which you relate so well," he could not have been more thunder-struck than he was by this fourth invitation from Mrs. Godfrey. He had heard of "quizzing"—but heretofore no lady of all his slight acquaintance had ever had the hardihood to try it on him. In general ladies liked him, but with a certain feeling of unattainability—as you or I would like a coach-and-four. They did not know the solemn reality of Buckle well enough to play with it. "But," thought Buckle, remembering that he had heard of quizzing, "I wonder whether this isn't the thing?"

The expression of his face just then—seen in the pale starlight which he had been so desperately be-rhyming—was of a kind which this slender pen forbids me to portray, save by saying that it was indescribable, and that after holding in before it as long as there was any probable chance of salvation for her basque buttons, Mrs. Godfrey gave way to an uncontrollable burst of "cachinnatory silver." Silver is proper novellesque for ladies' laugh, I believe.

"Don't—you—ha-ha-ha-ha—know any thing else?" said Mrs. Godfrey.

Mr. Buckle was silent. Also hurt. Also offended. It was rude. It was the rudest thing he ever saw. It was inexplicable. (It might not have been had he been aware how that Piper had told Mrs. Godfrey that his friend knew all the poetry in the English language, and kept it to talk to ladies.)

Mrs. Godfrey reined herself up—kept Buckle company in blushing (though rather too late, as he very properly thought)—put her hand upon his arm with a timid, gliding motion, as she would propitiate her squirrel—and said,

"I do beg your pardon—I do, sincerely. I have given you a beautiful opinion of my good-breeding."

"Oh, not at all—not at all!" answered Buckle, in his flurry, more anxious to gratify his pacable tendency than to express himself complementarily.

"I am perfectly ashamed of myself," the little widow continued, in a soft and penitent voice; "but the fact is that we poor women hear so much poetry from gentlemen that we begin to believe that is the original channel of conversation between the two. Now look at me! On the honor of a lady, who, to be frank, has lived twenty-six years, I never talked poetry since I was born. I talk prose. I always have talked prose. I always expect to. I understand it."

"Bless my soul!" thought Buckle; "this creature has told me her age! I had heard they stroke. If I'd known you weren't looking after Mrs. Belle Godfrey I'd have done it myself."

"I declare! I had no idea that was the marine system of behavior! If it's all right I'll go immediately."

Buckle found his charge as the Captain feared. A faint voice answered his knock, "Come in," and summoning all his resolution, he followed the bold lead of the cabin-boy, who was just entering No. 14 to get the lamp to fill.

Nothing but a pretty little night-cap, with a pretty little, pale, hopeless face in it, like a human flower in a lace calyx, appeared to Mr. Buckle. The eyes were closed as if they would never open again, and the long, dark lashes of their lids lay on the cheeks without stir, adding fringed petals to the other vraisemblance of a blossom.

Mr. Buckle had never seen any body desperately sea-sick before, and the dreadful thought instantly struck him, "She is dead, and I never came to help her!" The boy had gone out and shut the door; Buckle was alone, and he gave vent to his fears in the startled exclamation, "Oh, Mrs. Godfrey, are you—faint?" He didn't wish to compromise himself or terrify her by saying "dead" while there was a chance to the contrary.

There was so much real pain in his tone that, although a moment before she would have thought the act impossible, Mrs. Belle opened her eyes and smiled, then shook her head and whispered,

"No—very sick."

For the first time he saw a woman suffering. He had been sick himself, though never at sea. He remembered well how dreadfully it felt. And here was a woman brought to his own familiar level, into his own range of sympathies. As creatures of whalebone, spring-steel, borage, and eternal smiles—as, in fine, he had seen them in his few timid invasions of society—they were immeasurably distant from him—quite at the other end of the volume of Zoology. But here was a woman who did not babble nothings trippingly—who could not speak at all for very weakness—who was not mad with ecstasy at fribbles, but prostrate under a real distress. And as last night her orbit had been made first to touch, then to intersect, his own, by her being sensible, now the two came instantly to coincide through her being sick. He understood her now—as the riotous Walt Whitman would say, he "included" her; and another utterly new mental phenomenon took place in Buckle—he had no fear of the once terrible creature.

A change seemed wrought in his whole nature. With as little bashfulness and the same straightforward, natural gentleness with which he would have addressed a like-suffering man, he said to her,

"Mrs. Godfrey, perhaps you would feel better for having your head bathed. I'll wet a towel and smooth your hair away from your face. It won't disturb you, will it?"

These words and their plain, manly tone were like a shock of galvanism to Mrs. Godfrey. She opened her eyes wide as in her weldest moments, lifted herself a little on her elbow, and replied, "Yes, if you please," instead of saying, "Are you Mr. Buckle?" which was on her tongue-tip.

He went to work in the most unhesitating, business-like, but at the same time most tender manner. He wet the towel, wrung it out, and proceeded to caress the widow's hair with it; then to smooth her forehead and her cheeks, which grew almost rosy (from the reaction); and finally he gave her eyes two careful little dabs—just as you or I would do to a sick wife or sister.

After arranging the ruffles of the little lace cap as deliberately and softly as if he were tending a baby, he asked if there was nothing else that he could do—nothing she would like to drink, for instance. Somehow or other Buckle's change of nature had so sharpened his perception of fitness that he never thought of proposing hot-buttered toast again.

The widow said brokenly that pounded ice and Congress water always made her feel better. Buckle would not permit any one else to pound the ice. From beginning to end he attended to the mixture—even taking the bottle out of the steward's hands and drawing the cork himself. Then he brought to his patient's berth-side the refreshing brimful tumbler, and with a tea-spoon fed it to her lump by lump, drop by drop—actually having the audacity to support her white neck with his big man's-hand.

The widow finally said she had had enough and felt better. Buckle quietly set down the tumbler, and told her in a tone of mild authority to go to sleep. He would come in every now and then to look after her.

"You would make such a good doctor!" said Mrs. Godfrey, with as grateful a smile as seasickness ever allows.

"I believe I would," replied Buckle, firmly; "I feel it in me. I ought to have been one."

Then he tucked the quilt neatly around his patient's neck—opened the bull's-eye a little way to give her air—and repeated his injunction about sleeping. Finally, he cast his eyes on the poor little helpless woman, with a look that meant all manner of sympathy, and said, loud enough for her to hear,

"Poor little thing!"

After which he retired, shutting the door gently; and it was well he did, for otherwise would he have seen such an expression of marvel on the face in the lace cap as might have speedily brought him back to his old self-consciousness.

It was not till he had reached the deck that any perception of the change wrought in him, as a change, dawned upon Buckle's mind. And then, remembering what he had been doing, and the kind of Buckle he was yesterday, he sat down in mute surprise, regarding himself like a man's first view of Niagara Falls, till breakfast.

The gale steadily blew harder. When they passed Hatteras at 11 o'clock that night it was a storm. Mr. Buckle had been all day taking the place of stewardess to Mrs. Godfrey; his labors were now increased by the giving out of sundry brothers, fathers, husbands, and sons, who having fought Neptune as long as they could stand, at last capitulated without terms and lay prostrate on their battlemented berths, reduced to feminine weakness.

He carried ladies bodily to their state-rooms—bathed their heads when he had deposited them—and brought innumerable drinks of water. He prophesied a green old age to several who were going to die—they knew they were; he tossed up pillows, smoothed quilts, and (which is the whole summing up to any mind and body acquainted with marine foul weather) totally forgot himself. But his visits were most frequent, longest, patientest, most particular, upon No. 14.

So violent was the storm that it was not until Sunday night that the Montgomery came to the wharf at Savannah. Ten miles of quiet steaming up the river resuscitated the pale denizens of all the state-room mausoleums; they leaped to their feet; blessed Heaven with a ten-Columbus fervor for the sight of land; and proved their return to vitality by thinking how they looked, for the first time in seventy-two hours.

Foremost among these appeared Mrs. Belle Godfrey, in a fresh halo of tarleton as resplendent as the one which had nestled on her little head at Mr. Buckle's first introduction—a clean traveling dress—the bewitching gaiter-boots—and that charming token of civilization close by, a parasol.

She thanked Buckle in the sweetest of voices for all his great kindness during the voyage—and leaned upon his arm, but not with that Di Vernon air of taking him by siege which had characterized their earlier acquaintance. She seemed, indeed, rather distant, Buckle thought with pain. Ah! could she be offended with that familiarity of his manner in the state-room—the “Poor little thing!” etc., etc.? Buckle sighed, and thought that was it. You and I, who, of course, know all about women, are aware that it wasn't. That, on the contrary, the fact was that Mr. Buckle's change had transposed their relations; that now, she was a little bit afraid of him.

Buckle was hurt but said nothing, being only too glad to be allowed the pleasure of getting a sensible sick woman's nine or ten little pieces of baggage out of the hold.

This operation accomplished, Mr. Buckle and the lady took carriage for the Pulaski House, where the former immediately telegraphed news to his parents which were like life from the dead—tacking on to the end of this information a request that a check on the Bank of Commerce might be instantly dispatched.

When Buckle returned to the Ladies' Parlor, Mrs. Godfrey put her purse into his hands.

“Pay for whatever we may need, keep the account yourself. We can settle hereafter, you know. I don't like to be burdened with money; it's only less troublesome than having none at all. We shall be continually wanting little things, you know—carriages—the tailor, etc.”

Mr. Buckle understood her. He was now getting punished for all the slovenly habits of his whole bachelor life by being as far from presentable as any man of his commanding appearance can be, unless he gets torn to rags in a railway collision. So, out of respect for his own feelings as well as the widow's, he retired for a season. When he returned, he was clothed and in his right mind.

“Do you stay in Savannah all winter?” he asked, in the old-timed manner, and not quite sure that he had a right to propound even that question, and so strangely polite had she become. But he felt some interest in knowing, and if he hadn't, thought he ought to ask the information to appear interested—the storm having prevented any inquiry of the sort before.

“No, Sir. I am going to Florida—to winter at St. Augustine. Not that any thing serious is the matter, but Northern cold weather is disagreeable to me. I'm sorry we must part here. When we go back don't fail to remember me to your mother.”

“No, I will not. I'm sorry too.”

Then there was a pause. When Mrs. Belle Godfrey resumed the conversation it was directed into another channel.

For three days more they punched up the lions of Savannah in every direction. That three-days' space was a climax and anti-climax of the following character.

Day 1. Mr. Buckle moody, and in his manner evidencing a return to the old congealed state of bashfulness which he had once broken through. The sensible woman still kind and lady-like, but too reserved for the terrible suspicions of Mr. Buckle not to have some cause.

Day 2. Almost perfect silence during all the drives and rides, save monosyllables, and sentences descriptive of scenery or the like. Mr. Buckle relapses quite into the old manner. The sensible woman appears not to observe it, and treats him like the kindest of distant acquaintances.

Day 3. Mr. Buckle's money comes from New York. He repays the widow with stilted thanks in the form of an oration about everlasting gratitude. At the same time he speaks of preparations for immediate return home. That afternoon Mrs. Belle Godfrey is unexpectedly seized with a violent headache, and is almost as wretched as she was on board ship. Mr. Buckle again bathes her head, holds the salts to her face, comes entirely out of himself, like a Newfoundland out of a kennel, and becomes positive, brave, forthspoken, as in the storm. Mrs. Belle Godfrey is sensible, weak, helpless, and grateful all at once. The result is, that Mr. Buckle writes home for more money to be sent on to St. Augustine. He can not think of letting “the poor little thing” travel thither alone. Besides, he had never seen the Far South, and now was a good chance.

All this he said, innocently enough, in the letter he wrote home. Father Buckle sent it over to Piper to read. How Piper roared!

stroke. If I'd known you weren't looking after Mrs. Belle Godfrey I'd have done it myself."

"I declare! I had no idea that was the marine system of behavior! If it's all right I'll go immediately."

And as last night her orbit had been made first to touch, then to intersect, his own, by her being sensible, now the two came instantly to coincide through her being sick. After arranging the ruffles of the little lace cap as deliberately and softly as if he were tending a baby, he asked if there was nothing else that he could do—nothing she would like to drink, for instance. Somehow or other Buckle's change of nature had so sharpened his perception of fitness that he never thought of proposing hot-buttered toast again.

The widow said brokenly that pounded ice and Congress water always made her feel better. Buckle would not permit any one else to pound the ice. From beginning to end he attended to the mixture—even taking the bottle out of the steward's hands and drawing the cork himself. Then he brought to his patient's berth-side the refreshing brimful tumbler, and with a tea-spoon fed it to her lump by lump, drop by drop—actually having the audacity to support her white neck with his big man's-hand.

The widow finally said she had had enough and felt better. Buckle quietly set down the tumbler, and told her in a tone of mild authority to go to sleep. He would come in every now and then to look after her.

"You would make such a good doctor!" said Mrs. Godfrey, with as grateful a smile as seasickness ever allows.

"I believe I would," replied Buckle, firmly; "I feel it in me. I ought to have been one."

Then he tucked the quilt neatly around his patient's neck—opened the bull's-eye a little way to give her air—and repeated his injunction about sleeping. Finally, he cast his eyes on the poor little helpless woman, with a look that meant all manner of sympathy, and said, loud enough for her to hear,

"Poor little thing!"

After which he retired, shutting the door gently; and it was well he did, for otherwise would he have seen such an expression of marvel on the face in the lace cap as might have speedily brought him back to his old self-consciousness.

It was not till he had reached the deck that any perception of the change wrought in him, as a change, dawned upon Buckle's mind. And then, remembering what he had been doing, and the kind of Buckle he was yesterday, he sat down in mute surprise, regarding himself like a man's first view of Niagara Falls, till breakfast.

The gale steadily blew harder. When they passed Hatteras at 11 o'clock that night it was a storm. Mr. Buckle had been all day taking the place of stewardess to Mrs. Godfrey; his labors were now increased by the giving out of sundry brothers, fathers, husbands, and sons, who having fought Neptune as long as they could stand, at last capitulated without terms and lay prostrate on their battlemented berths, reduced to feminine weakness.

He carried ladies bodily to their state-rooms—bathed their heads when he had deposited them—and brought innumerable drinks of water. He prophesied a green old age to several who were going to die—they knew they were; he tossed up pillows, smoothed quilts, and (which is the whole summing up to any mind and body acquainted with marine foul weather) totally forgot himself. But his visits were most frequent, longest, patientest, most particular, upon No. 14.

So violent was the storm that it was not until Sunday night that the Montgomery came to the wharf at Savannah. Ten miles of quiet steaming up the river resuscitated the pale denizens of all the state-room mausoleums; they leaped to their feet; blessed Heaven with a ten-Columbus fervor for the sight of land; and proved their return to vitality by thinking how they looked, for the first time in seventy-two hours.

Foremost among these appeared Mrs. Belle Godfrey, in a fresh halo of tarleton as resplendent as the one which had nestled on her little head at Mr. Buckle's first introduction—a clean traveling dress—the bewitching gaiter-boots—and that charming token of civilization close by, a parasol.

She thanked Buckle in the sweetest of voices for all his great kindness during the voyage—and leaned upon his arm, but not with that Di Vernon air of taking him by siege which had characterized their earlier acquaintance. She seemed, indeed, rather distant, Buckle thought with pain. Ah! could she be offended with that familiarity of his manner in the state-room—the “Poor little thing!” etc., etc.? Buckle sighed, and thought that was it. You and I, who, of course, know all about women, are aware that it wasn't. That, on the contrary, the fact was that Mr. Buckle's change had transposed their relations; that now, she was a little bit afraid of him.

Buckle was hurt but said nothing, being only too glad to be allowed the pleasure of getting a sensible sick woman's nine or ten little pieces of baggage out of the hold.

This operation accomplished, Mr. Buckle and the lady took carriage for the Pulaski House, where the former immediately telegraphed news to his parents which were like life from the dead—tacking on to the end of this information a request that a check on the Bank of Commerce might be instantly dispatched.

When Buckle returned to the Ladies' Parlor, Mrs. Godfrey put her purse into his hands.

“Pay for whatever we may need, keep the account yourself. We can settle hereafter, you know. I don't like to be burdened with money; it's only less troublesome than having none at all. We shall be continually wanting little things, you know—carriages—the tailor, etc.”

Mr. Buckle understood her. He was now getting punished for all the slovenly habits of his whole bachelor life by being as far from presentable as any man of his commanding appearance can be, unless he gets torn to rags in a railway collision. So, out of respect for his own feelings as well as the widow's, he retired for a season. When he returned, he was clothed and in his right mind.

“Do you stay in Savannah all winter?” he asked, in the old-timed manner, and not quite sure that he had a right to propound even that question, and so strangely polite had she become. But he felt some interest in knowing, and if he hadn't, thought he ought to ask the information to appear interested—the storm having prevented any inquiry of the sort before.

“No, Sir. I am going to Florida—to winter at St. Augustine. Not that any thing serious is the matter, but Northern cold weather is disagreeable to me. I'm sorry we must part here. When we go back don't fail to remember me to your mother.”

“No, I will not. I'm sorry too.”

Then there was a pause. When Mrs. Belle Godfrey resumed the conversation it was directed into another channel.

For three days more they punched up the lions of Savannah in every direction. That three-days' space was a climax and anti-climax of the following character.

Day 1. Mr. Buckle moody, and in his manner evidencing a return to the old congealed state of bashfulness which he had once broken through. The sensible woman still kind and lady-like, but too reserved for the terrible suspicions of Mr. Buckle not to have some cause.

Day 2. Almost perfect silence during all the drives and rides, save monosyllables, and sentences descriptive of scenery or the like. Mr. Buckle relapses quite into the old manner. The sensible woman appears not to observe it, and treats him like the kindest of distant acquaintances.

Day 3. Mr. Buckle's money comes from New York. He repays the widow with stilted thanks in the form of an oration about everlasting gratitude. At the same time he speaks of preparations for immediate return home. That afternoon Mrs. Belle Godfrey is unexpectedly seized with a violent headache, and is almost as wretched as she was on board ship. Mr. Buckle again bathes her head, holds the salts to her face, comes entirely out of himself, like a Newfoundland out of a kennel, and becomes positive, brave, forthspoken, as in the storm. Mrs. Belle Godfrey is sensible, weak, helpless, and grateful all at once. The result is, that Mr. Buckle writes home for more money to be sent on to St. Augustine. He can not think of letting “the poor little thing” travel thither alone. Besides, he had never seen the Far South, and now was a good chance.

All this he said, innocently enough, in the letter he wrote home. Father Buckle sent it over to Piper to read. How Piper roared!

IV.

For some inscrutable reason Mrs. Belle Godfrey was permitted by Providence to be in feeble health all the rest of the time in Savannah, and all the way from that port to the shell-built town where Spain first made her American houses.

Nothing seemed to do her any good. She was easier while Mr. Buckle bathed her eternally aching brow; and, in spite of that hidden malady of which Buckle was forever wishing Piper were there to make a diagnosis, her cheeks became ruddier, her eyes brighter, and the whole make-up of the terrible creature more agonizingly beautiful. Still the malady was there, and Buckle had to strain every nerve to keep it from carrying her off, which he was always sure it would do some time in the course of the next two days. As he nursed her he grew more and more audacious. When on the cross-country road between the St. John's River and St. Augustine, the thing that, for fun, they there call a carriage broke down in the middle of a swamp, Buckle actually lifted that hundred and twenty-five pounds of clear-through solid beauty, and in his manly arms carried it fifteen rods to the next dry place.

At St. Augustine Buckle found the second remittance of funds awaiting him, but did not mention the fact to his companion lest she should be alarmed by the thought that he was going to leave her in that feeble state. And a dreadful recklessness had come over Buckle—he wasn't sure when he should go home himself.

One day, as he opened his pocket-book to get some change for a darkey, he saw those abominable poetical quotations which he had got off on the dear creature when she was in health. They were on little slips of paper, as he used to carry them, representing social cartridges against the army of woman. From sheer disgust at the former Buckle he took them out, tore them in bits, and scattered them to the winds. But the last one caught his eye before it was destroyed—one which lay in a corner and had hitherto escaped his notice:

"She let concealment, like a worm i' the bud, Prey on her damask cheek—"

A thunder-bolt fell at the feet of Buckle! Lightning flashed upon his heretofore blinded eyes! Was there no way of repelling the conviction? None! It was—it was the truth!

That very evening, if opportunity offered for a feat with which he was as familiar as shaking hands with the man in the moon without a step-ladder, he would test this truth!

The evening came. Mrs. Godfrey had consented to try the invigorating effect of a little air and moonlight upon Buffington's Hotel veranda. The air was heavenly—likewise, as natural, the sky. Beneath the two bland influences they sat softening, upon neighboring chairs. "Alas that such a being should fade!" thought Buckle, looking at her beautiful face glorified by the moonlight. No one else was on the veranda. They were alone with Nature and each other. Mrs. Godfrey was more than usually frail tonight—so, perfectly on Buckle's level of prose humanity—and he was not in the least afraid of her.

"You take such kind care of me!" said the widow, sadly.

"It is in my nature, Madam—I can't help it."

"How your mother and sister must prize you, you are so thoughtful!"

"I have little thinking to do for them. They are never sick and fragile. I never took care of any body till I took care of you. I have got so accustomed to caring for somebody now, that I shall miss it very much when I go away."

Buckle meant to say this slyly; but being an unpracticed hand, felt so ashamed of himself for using the word "go" on the strength of so small a stock of intention, that his voice trembled like a green scamp trying to utter counterfeit notes.

"Ah!" replied the widow, more pensively than before. "You will soon get somebody to take care of."

An opening! Buckle commended himself to Heaven and struck out.

"So I shall. Did you know that I had been—in love?"

"No! Really?" said the widow with a start.

"Yes. And I mean very soon to get married. Only, one thing troubles me. I never had any training with women. I don't know how to propose. I should make an awful botch of it if I tried. Ten to one the lady would laugh at me."

"Not if she loved you," said Mrs. Belle, very sadly.

"Well, now I have the utmost confidence in your good taste. As I told you when I first knew you before you began to be so feeble—I say again, You are the most sensible woman I ever knew! And I'd like to ask your advice about how to go to work. I don't feel any fear in asking you; for we've been so much together in times of weakness and distress that you seem like an old friend: we understand each other."

"I think we do," said Mrs. Belle, confidently, though she knew she didn't.

"Put it in this form. Suppose I were with the lady in a quiet place, do you think it would be necessary for me to go down on my knees, when people might come out and catch me any minute?"

"Of course not. That is never done out of novels."

"Or to lay my hand upon my breast and say, 'I swear,' in a loud tone of voice that might attract people in the court-yard?"

"That would be equally uncalled for."

"Very well. And seeing I don't know how to talk sentimentally as I would if I had been trained, and wouldn't like to come out with a blunt 'Do you love me?' how do you think, looking at it sensibly, that it would do if I were to say nothing at all, but merely put my face down to hers—which is very beautiful, I assure you—and though I never did such a thing before in my life, give her a kiss?"

"She couldn't fail to understand you perfectly, if she loved you."

Mr. Buckle rose from his chair deliberately, cast his mustache over each shoulder, bent his tall form, and before the widow had the least idea what was coming, did that very thing.

V.

I saw him do it again. I was standing beside him at the time, with a pair of white kids on, and can swear to it. Though to be sure he only followed the pious example of the Rev. Dr. Bedell. He did it first. I did it afterward. And it was very nice.

Another sail on the Montgomery then succeeded.

"Bless my soul!" said the Captain, "has it come to this? I thought it would, Mrs. Belle, when you said you'd keep your eye on him."

"Dear me!" said Mr. Buckle, as we passed the Sandy Hook Light, "how little I thought the last time I saw that lantern what a mercy was my being left—no, not left, I mean! If every thing hadn't happened in just that way—if I hadn't been caught aboard—if I hadn't seen woman somewhere within range of me and no possibility of getting out—if I hadn't learned her in her little distresses—"

"And her 'fragility,'" said Mrs. Belle with a malicious twinkle.

"—I had then been a bachelor to this moment, utterly thrown away!"

"Which was kindly averted," said Mrs. Belle Buckle, "by Fate's better throw—'Thrown Together.'"

PRODIGIOUS TALKERS.

A FACETIOUS Scotchman, speaking of language as being the uniting bond between men, and at the same time, by the great variety of tongues, the means, more than aught else, of severing and estranging nations, compares it to the orang-outang, which, according to the traveling showman, "forms the connecting link which separates mankind from the human race." Bacon, from whom our Scotchman has "adapted" the first portion of his remark, says, in the Introductory Book of his "Advancement of Learning:" "The confusion of tongues, the first great judgment of God upon the ambition of man, hath chiefly imbarred the open trade and intercourse of learning and knowledge." Adelung, the author of the Mithridates, states, as the result of accurate philological investigations, that where the difficulties of intercourse are such as existed among the ancients, and as prevail still among semi-civilized populations, ignorant of the use of steam, no language can maintain itself unchanged over a space of more than one hundred and fifty thousand miles. The progress of any given form of civilization is therefore seriously checked by the diversity of tongues; and ere we can bring about that Millennial period when our civilization shall rule triumphant over all the earth, we shall have to leave languages and come to one common tongue.

Pending the solution of this, the problem of ages, an extensive knowledge of various tongues is no less valuable than remarkable; and we propose in the present article to mention a few of those whose acquirements in this line have, in their day and generation, entitled them to the name of prodigious talkers.

The ancients appear to have been insignificant as linguists. The Romans, with characteristic insolence, endeavored to impose their tongue upon all the nations which fell under their rule. The bad Greek of Roman Embassadors to the Tarentines called forth from that lively people jokes which the more polite Frenchmen of our days spare our own republican ministers. When Attila conquered Rome, taking up the Roman policy, he passed a law prohibiting the use of Latin, and even imported teachers from his own country, by whose aid to substitute his native Gothic—a wiser course than that of the bigoted Mussulmen, who, when they conquered Jerusalem, prohibited the "Christian dogs" from using the sacred language of the Koran.

The poet Ennius was so vain of his very moderate attainments that he used to boast of having "three hearts, because he was able to speak in three tongues—the Greek, the Latin, and the Oscan." Herodotus, notwithstanding his long residence in and intimate acquaintance with Egypt, was not, according to an eminent critic, familiar with Egyptian; and in all his other travels gained, if any, but a very superficial knowledge of other tongues. Xenophon is supposed to have been equally lacking as a linguist; and even Plato's knowledge of foreign languages is a matter for serious doubt. Mithridates, the poison-proof King of Pontus, stands a head and shoulders above any of the ancients as a linguist. He was able to speak thoroughly the languages of all the nations, twenty-five in number, over whom he ruled; and it is related of him that he had not a soldier in his army whom he could not address in his vernacular. Next to Mithridates comes, singularly enough, Cleopatra, of whom Plutarch relates that "there were but few of the foreign ambassadors to whom she gave audience through an interpreter." He specifies as languages which she knew—the Ethiopian, that of the Troglodytes (probably a dialect of the Coptic), the Hebrew, Syrian, Persian, and that of the Medes; but adds that she understood still others.

The study of languages was revived at the beginning of the second century A.D. by the critical investigations into the text of the Scriptures, which were then undertaken; but while we read of many eminent men who were more or less versed in several tongues, there is no record of any one displaying extraordinary lingual attainments. The Crusades gave another impetus to the study. Frederick II. spoke at least six languages; and Roderigo Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo in the thirteenth century, was able to address an audience in no less than seven, which did not include Greek or Hebrew, with which also he was probably familiar. The Italians have always been good linguists. Marco Polo and Josaphat Barbaro, the latter of whom resided sixteen years among the Tartar tribes, may be presumed to have been good linguists. Ermoloa Barbaro, another of the family, was such a purist in Greek that he is said to have consulted the devil when at a loss for the precise meaning of a phrase—with what result we are not informed. While Latin was yet to European diplomats what French is now, a Venetian Ambassador to England was capable of conversing like a native in English, French, and German. In the Venetian Republic, at that time, lingual skill was, as it should be, a necessary qualification for diplomatic appointments.

Genno Bey, who was first Dragoman to the Court of Soliman the Magnificent, spoke no less than sixteen languages—namely, ancient and modern Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Moorish, Tartar, Armenian, Russian, Hungarian, Polish, Italian, Spanish, German, and French. He was the son of a poor fisherman of Corfu, and was, while a boy, carried off by pirates, who sold him into slavery in Constantinople. He was successively sold into various countries, whose languages he rapidly made his own. He was a renegade from the Christian faith, and when he had authority, says Thevet, was solicited by some bigoted Moslems to take from the Christians a bell they had placed in their little church in Jerusalem. He hesitated, from some remnant of reverence for his former faith, but finally consented; whereupon, relates the historian, he was smitten with the loathsome disease of which King Herod died, and perished miserably in nine days after his inauspicious sacrifice.

Jonadab, a Jew of this period, who was a captive in various countries for twenty-six years, spoke no less than twenty-four languages. Giovanni Pico de la Mirandola, born 1463, was one of the greatest wonders of his age. Before he was ten he had delivered lectures in civil and canon law, remarkable alike for eloquence and learning. At the same time he was familiar with the Greek and Latin classics; and presently began the study of Hebrew and its cognate tongues. At the age of eighteen he had the reputation of knowing no less than twenty-two languages, a considerable number of which he spoke with fluency. He was master, at the same time, of the most important sciences, and had so astonishing a memory as to be able, after a single reading of a book, not only to recite its contents, but even to repeat the words of the author, and that, if required, in an inverted order. He died at the untimely age of thirty-one, master of nearly all the then known languages and sciences.

A contemporary of Pico de Mirandola, Teseo Ambrosio, constructed the first Polyglot grammar, which comprised the elements of Chaldee, Syriac, and ten other languages. He had types cast expressly for this and other projects, and himself prepared a Chaldee Psalter for the press. In the sack of Pavia by the French it was carried off among the plunder. Teseo was in despair at the loss. Passing through Ferrara toward Rome, with a sad heart, he chanced to see a quantity of paper at a charcoal-burner's just being consigned to the furnace. What was his delight to find his precious psalter among them! He began the printing of it at Ferrara without delay, but died before its completion.

Fernando de Cordova, a Spaniard, born early in the fifteenth century, was scarcely less precocious than his Italian rival, Pico de Mirandola. At ten years of age he had completed all his preliminary studies. At twenty-five he was installed doctor in all the faculties. His memory was such that he could recite three or four pages of the orations of Cicero after a single reading, could repeat the entire Bible from memory, and had at his command all the works of the most celebrated authors, ancient and modern. Besides being thoroughly familiar with all the principal European languages, he was master of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic. Also he was one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his time: played on every known musical instrument, sang exquisitely, was a most graceful dancer, an expert swordsman, and a bold and skillful rider. He was master of one particular art of fence, by which, says the chronicler of his life, he was able to defeat all adversaries. It was by springing upon them at a single bound of twenty-three or twenty-five yards! Truly a most surprising art! "In short," says the chronicler, "if you were to live a hundred years without eating or drinking, and were to give your whole time to study, you could not learn all this young man knew:" which is not unlikely.

Libertus Cominetus, a Spanish convert from Judaism in the sixteenth century, was master of fourteen languages. Father Martin del Rio, his contemporary, knew and spoke ten. Lope de Vega—besides writing his fifteen hundred versified plays, three hundred interludes and sacred dramas, ten epic poems, and eight prose novels, with a variety of essays, prefaces, dedications, and other miscellaneous pieces—found time to acquire a knowledge of Greek, Latin, Italian, Portuguese, French, and probably English! William Postel, a Frenchman, contemporary of Teseo Ambrosio, besides being the author of fifty-seven works on scientific subjects, "knew, spoke, and understood fifteen languages." He published a collection of the alphabets of twelve of these, with a slight account of each. He was a visionary, and a decidedly impractical man; and conceived the idea that he was divinely called to the mission of uniting all Christians into one community, the head of which he recognized in the person of Francis I. of France, whom he maintained to be the lineal descendant of Shem, the eldest son of Noah.

Joseph Justus Scaliger, born 1544, a contemporary and countryman of Postel, was even more remarkable and unamiable than he. In his early youth he was noted for stupidity, having spent three years in a vain but laborious attempt to master the first rudiments of the Latin language. These clouds of morning, however, were the prelude to a most brilliant day. At seventeen years he was perfect master of Hebrew, speaking it fluently, and had published his most celebrated work. He read the entire Iliad and Odyssey in the original in twenty-one days; ran through the Greek dramatists and lyric poets in four months; and, such were his powers of memory, could repeat eighty couplets of poetry after a single reading, knew every line of his own writings by heart, and never forgot any thing he had once learned. He asserts of himself that he could read by night without the aid of a light, a power of sight said also to have been possessed by Jerome Cardan. He spoke thirteen languages, which are thus curiously enumerated by his biographer: Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Spanish, German, French, Italian, Nubian, Arabic, Syriac, Persian, English, and Chaldee. He was an excessively vain and quarrelsome man; and his contemporaries, all of whom he made his enemies, said of him that there was one department of each of his languages with which he was undoubtedly familiar—its Billingsgate!

Tom Coryat, "The Odcombe Leg-stretcher," as he calls himself, belongs also to this period, and is notable as an uneducated linguist. He was familiar with Italian, Turkish, Arabic, Persian, and Hindustani, besides English, French, Latin, and Greek. The living languages he picked up during his long-continued wanderings in every part of the globe. One of his journeys, of nearly two thousand miles, he accomplished in a single pair of shoes, which he hung up as a votive offering, on his return, in the church of Odcombe. Another journey, of no less than two thousand seven hundred miles, he made at a cost of only about three pounds sterling.

The sixteenth century was prolific of linguists, for to this period belongs also that remarkable Scotchman, James Crichton, whose title, "the Admirable Crichton," has become a proverb for universality of attainments. He was born in 1561, and was really a most extraordinary man. When he was but sixteen years old he spoke in ten tongues. At the age of twenty his languages exactly equaled his years in number. He undertook to dispute in the University of Paris in any of the following twelve languages, which he must therefore have spoken readily: Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Spanish, Italian, French, English, German, Flemish, and Slavonic. Though he died at the age of twenty-two, he was master of all the knowledge and of every accomplishment of his times, from the most abstruse departments of scholarship, philosophy, and divinity, down to the mere physical gifts and graces of the musician, the athlete, the swordsman, and the cavalier. His memory was such that he could repeat verbatim, after a single hearing, the longest and most involved discourse.

Edmund Castell, born in Cambridgeshire, in 1606, and author of the Heptaglot Lexicon, though one of the noted linguists of his time—being a thorough scholar in seven Oriental languages, besides the modern tongues of Europe—is more known for his misfortunes, which Disraeli has placed upon record. In his touching appeal to Charles II. he laments the "seventeen years during which he devoted sixteen to eighteen hours a day to his labor;" and declares that he had "expended his whole inheritance [above twelve thousand pounds], as well as his health and his eyesight, upon a thankless task." When at last he came to print, the entire edition of his Lexicon remained unsold upon his hands; and out of five hundred copies which he left at his death scarce one was saved complete. "The whole load of learned rags sold for seven pounds!"

Edward Pocock (1604) spoke fluently eight languages. Simon Ockly, the earliest historian of Mohammedanism, who completed his History in the prison of Cambridge; and George Sale, the first translator of the Koran, of whom it is recorded that but too often, when he quitted his studies, he wanted a change of linen, and frequently wandered through the streets in search of some compassionate friend who might supply him with the meal of the day: both these were thorough masters of many tongues, but their misfortunes have concealed their learning.

Andrew Müller, a German, born 1630, was, like Crichton, a precocious genius. At eighteen he wrote verses freely in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Removing to England, he became so absorbed in study that it is related he would not raise his head from his books to look out of the window on occasion of Charles II.'s triumphal progress at the Restoration! He had a passion for Chinese, and was the first European scholar who, without visiting China, obtained a mastery of its language. He offered to make any one master of it in half a year. It is stated that he spoke twenty languages.

Nicolas Schmid, a poor peasant of Saxony, born 1606, worked all his life as a common farm-laborer, was first taught the alphabet in his sixteenth year, and was yet able, with his limited opportunities and time for study, to acquire a degree of knowledge which enabled him to translate the Lord's Prayer into fifty-one languages!

Within three years, from 1719 to 1721, were born, by a curious coincidence, in different countries, three children of a precociousness entirely without parallel in history. John Lewis Caudiac, born at Nismes, was able, when in his third year, to speak Latin and French. At six, he spoke also Hebrew and Greek, besides being well versed in arithmetic, geography, ancient and modern history, and heraldry. He died of water on the brain, at seven years of age. Christian Henry Heinecken, born at Lubeck, could speak at ten months; had learned all the facts in the five books of Moses when twelve months old; in another month added the balance of the Old Testament history; and at two and a half years of age spoke fluently French and Latin, besides his native German. He died in his fourth year. John Philip Baratier, born at Anspach, in Germany, was able, when only four years old, to speak Latin, French, and German; at six he spoke Greek; and at nine Hebrew. He published a lexicon of the latter language in his eleventh year. He mastered elementary mathematics in three months; qualified himself by thirteen months' study for the severe examination which entitled him to the degree of Doctor of Laws; and, though he died at the early age of nineteen, was well versed in architecture, ancient and modern literature, and antiquities; translated from the Hebrew Benjamin of Tudela's Itinerary, published a detailed and critical account of the Rabbinical Bible, and communicated to several learned societies elaborate papers on astronomical and mathematical subjects.

Ignazio de Rossi, born 1740, besides being a great Orientalist, had a most wonderful memory. Cardinal Wiseman relates that on one occasion, a line being selected at pleasure from any part of any of the four great Italian classics, Dante, Petrarca, Tasso, and Ariosto, De Rossi immediately, and without the least effort, repeated the hundred lines which followed after that which had been chosen. Surprise being expressed at this feat, which he repeated several times, he immediately recited, in their reverse order, the hundred lines immediately preceding a line selected at random by one of the company. A Jesuit, Claude Francis Menestrier (1631), was put to as severe proof as this by Queen Christina of Sweden, who made up a string of three hundred words, the oddest and most unconnected which could be devised, written down without the least order or connection. These being read over once in Menestrier's presence, he repeated them in their exact order, without a single mistake or blunder. A young Corsican, mentioned by Padre Menochio, had still more extraordinary powers of memory. He was not only able to repeat, in their regular order, a jumble of words such as is above described, but could repeat them backward, and beginning in the middle, working both ways!

Coming down to times nearer our own, we must not forget to mention Sir William Jones, son of a country schoolmaster, who, during a very busy political life, found time to acquire a knowledge, more or less considerable, of twenty-eight languages. He left behind a memorandum, from which it appears that he had studied critically eight languages: English, Latin, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit. Eight others he had studied less perfectly—but all these were intelligible to him with the help of a dictionary: Spanish, Portuguese, German, Runic, Hebrew, Bengali, Hindi, and Turkish. Other eight he had studied less perfectly: Tibetan, Pali, Palavi, Deri, Russian, Syriac, Ethiopic, Coptic, Welsh, Swedish, Dutch, and Chinese. Leyden, the successor of Sir William Jones as Professor of Hindostani at Calcutta, used modestly to say he “knew but seventy languages.” He was born of very humble parents in Scotland, in 1775; and, though his education was of the very lowest order, Sir Walter Scott says, “Before he had attained his nineteenth year he confounded the doctors of Edinburgh by the portentous mass of his acquisitions in every department of knowledge.”

A more extraordinary man than either of the last-mentioned was Richard Robert Jones, a Welshman, discovered first by Mr. Roscoe, who described him as “a poor fisherlad, as ragged as a colt, and as uncouth as any being that has a semblance of humanity.” This poor lad, in his fishing-boat, on the coast of Wales, at the age of twenty, had acquired Greek, Hebrew, and Latin; had read the Iliad, Hesiod, Theocritus, etc.; studied the refinements of Greek pronunciation, and examined the connection of that language with Hebrew! Attempts were made, but in vain, to better his condition. His habits were most filthy and disgusting: “He loved to lie on his back at the bottom of a ditch. His uncouth ways and appearance made him an object of sport to the boys of his district, and he often carried an iron pot on his head to screen him from the stones and clods they threw at him. He wore a large filthy wrapper, in the folds and pockets of which he stowed his library.” He was first discovered in 1806. In 1815 he knew, in addition to the languages before-named, French, Italian, and Chaldee. He told Dr. Parr that to learn a new tongue he carefully examined its vocabulary, ascertaining what words in it corresponded to those of any language which he already knew. Having struck out these words, he proceeded to commit to memory the remainder, as being the only ones he needed. Jones finally perished in his filth, without accomplishing any thing. Clothes furnished him were at once spoiled by lying in his ditch. When a bed was provided for him he chose to sleep, not upon it, but under it; and all his conduct bespoke the fact that, with a prodigious memory, he had but a weak intellect.

Before speaking farther of linguists, it will be of interest to view for a moment the progress of those collections of vocabularies which have resulted in Adelung's great work, the “Mithridates.” John Schildberger, a Hungarian soldier, who was thirty-two years captive among the Turks, published, in 1428, an account of his adventures, to which he appended, as a curiosity, the Lord's Prayer in the Armenian and in the Tartar language. This was the nucleus, worthless in itself, round which have gathered all subsequent accumulations. Postel, 1558, increased the collection to twelve; Conrad Gesner to twenty-two; John Baptist Gramaye, long a prisoner among the Algerines, added no less than one hundred versions, which he published in 1622. In 1715 a collection was printed at Amsterdam containing the Lord's Prayer in one hundred and fifty-two languages; and in 1748 another at Leipsic contained two hundred. At the beginning of the present century Father De Hervas published a collection including the Lord's Prayer in three hundred and seven tongues, besides hymns and other prayers in twenty-two others. About the same time the philologer Pallas compiled, under the auspices of the Empress Catharine II. of Russia, a vocabulary of two hundred and seventy-three familiar words, translated into two hundred and one languages.

The crowning work of the series was the "Mithridates" of John Christopher Adelung. This, besides being more comprehensive than any preceding collection, included, with mere specimens of languages, arranged scientifically, a catalogue of the different works which refer to and shed light upon each. But one volume of the work was published previous to the death of its author, in his seventy-third year. In the touching preface he describes it as "the youngest and probably last child of his muse," and confesses that he "has nurtured, dressed, and cherished it with all the tenderness which it is commonly the lot of the youngest child to enjoy."

In this work Adelung reckons up the number of languages and dialects of which the philological world has knowledge, as having existed or being now in use, at three thousand and sixty-four. Babi, the geographer, enumerated eight hundred and twenty-four distinct languages, of which fifty-three, according to him, belong to Europe, one hundred and fourteen to Africa, one hundred and twenty-three to Asia, four hundred and seventeen to America, and one hundred and seventeen to Oceanica. He estimated the dialects in the world at no less than five thousand.

We come at last to Cardinal Joseph Caspar Mezzofanti, born at Bologna, September 17, 1774, the most prodigious linguist the world has had any knowledge of—"the monster of languages, the Briareus of parts of speech, a walking polyglot, and more—who ought to have existed at the Tower of Babel, as universal interpreter," Byron said, taking the last idea, by-the-way, from Pope's metrical version of the second satire of Dr. Donne, where the hero is thus apostrophized:

—"You proved yourself so able,
Pity you was not druggerman [dragoman] at Babel!
For had they found a linguist half so good,
I make no question but the Tower had stood."

Like all others who have distinguished themselves as practical linguists, Mezzofanti displayed in childhood traces of his extraordinary powers. The son of a poor carpenter, he was, when not yet three years old, sent to a dame's school, more to be out of the way than for instruction. Here, while sitting upon his bench listening idly to the instructions of the other children, he astonished the mistress by reciting from memory all that had been dictated to the other scholars. He soon learned all the old dame could teach, and was then, it is related, sent to work in his father's shop. His bench was beneath the window of a room where an old priest gave lessons in Greek and Latin. Here, too, his memory enabled him to retain the sounds he heard, and one day he surprised the padre by a recitation in pure Greek.

This decided his parents to send him to school, where he made most astonishing progress, owing to the quickness of his memory. A folio volume of St. Chrysostom, in Greek, being one day put into his hands, he read a page once over, and, closing the book, repeated it entire, without a single mistake. He chose early the priesthood for his vocation, and determined, at the same time, to make languages his chief study. At fifteen he was an elegant Latinist and master of Greek. Before he had completed his nineteenth year he knew Hebrew, Arabic, and Coptic, as well as French and German. It must be borne in mind that his knowledge of these tongues was not superficial, but that, owing to a marvelous faculty of mind, he understood almost intuitively the grammatical peculiarities of each. This is shown by the manner in which he acquired Swedish. A Swedish boy, son of Italian parents, was sent to Bologna to be educated. On his arrival, speaking only his vernacular, no one understood him; and Mezzofanti, then but twenty, was sent for. But he, too, was yet ignorant of Swedish. He asked to see the books the lad had brought with him. A short examination enabled him to determine the German affinities of the new language, as well as its own peculiarities; a few short trials with the boy sufficed to familiarize him with the system of pronunciation, and in a very few days he was able not only to act as the lad's interpreter, but to speak Swedish fluently.

Two days before he was twenty-three years of age he was appointed Arabic professor in the University of Bologna. He held this honorable office but a few months. In 1798 the French took possession of Italy; and, refusing to take the new oath of allegiance, Mezzofanti was deprived of his post. He immediately took pupils to teach, and thus earned a very modest livelihood until better times came. The war brought foreign troops to Italy, and he availed himself of this to study new languages. Mr. J. T. Headley relates that Mezzofanti was one day called to confess two foreigners condemned for piracy, who were to be executed the next day. He found the criminals unable to speak any tongue but their own, which he did not understand. Determined to acquire the language before morning, he sat up all night, actually accomplished the task, and confessed them in their own tongue. Thus by speaking with and confessing the wounded and sick with whom the hospital at Bologna was filled, he acquired successively Magyar, Bohemian, Polish, the Gipsy dialect, Flemish, and Russian, the latter sufficiently well to converse fluently with the celebrated Suwarrow, that "polished barbarian," who himself spoke and wrote in seven languages.

Owing to his versatility, Mezzofanti was soon marked out as the confessario dei forestieri—"foreigner's confessor"—uniting in himself all the qualities of the large staff of priests of different countries, to whom this post is generally intrusted in Rome. "The hotel keepers," he related, "used to apprise me of the arrival of all strangers in Bologna. When any thing was to be learned I called upon them, made notes of their communications, and took instructions from them in pronunciation. I made it a rule to learn every new grammar, and to apply myself to every strange dictionary that came in my way. I was constantly filling my head with new words. I must confess, too, that it cost me but little trouble; for in addition to an excellent memory, God had blessed me with an incredible flexibility of the organs of speech." He taught himself the Sardinian dialect—a soft patois, composed of Latin, Italian, and Spanish—by a few hours' conversation; and this merely to confess the servant of a lady friend, and thus ease her mind. So he went on, day by day gathering knowledge, with comparative ease to be sure, owing to his peculiar powers, but yet with really vast and unremitting labor. His biographer asserts that, however much he may have owed to nature, it is certain that for all practical results of his studies and gifts he was indebted to his own patient and almost plodding industry. In his studies he was above no drudgery. With painful care he consulted grammars, dictionaries, manuals, and reading books; and through his whole career continued the toilsome practice of writing out translations from one language into another. As to his hours of labor it is difficult to speak, because his multifarious duties broke up his time; but it is certain that, in intensity of occupation, he excelled all his predecessors. Father Suarez is said to have spent seventeen hours of the twenty-four in study and prayers. Castell, to whom we have before referred, devoted at least sixteen hours to labor. Theophilus Reynaud, during his long life of eighty years, allowed himself but a quarter of an hour per day to dine, and Bynne, a Puritan divine, seldom spared time to dine at all. The actual labor of Mezzofanti probably equaled any of these. It is related that, during his prime, he slept but three hours per night; and, besides being singularly abstemious in eating and drinking, never used a fire during the long nights of severe winter which he devoted to study. This last may serve as a hint to other students. Let the fire of enthusiasm suffice to warm both the body and soul of the seeker after knowledge.

When he was thirty years old, Mezzofanti spoke fluently twenty-four languages, and was, as all who tried him testify, more or less well read in the literature of each. This, indeed, was necessary for his system of study; for it is certain that he was not merely an extraordinary parrot, but, in every sense of the word, an extraordinary linguist. The numberless trials to which he was put prove at least this.

During 1813 he studied Mexican, and acquired sufficient from the scant resources at his command to read two interesting papers "on the symbolic paintings of the Mexicans." In the succeeding year he mastered the language and literature of Wallachia; and in 1816 was able to deliver a paper on the dialect of the Sette Comuni at Vicenza—a remarkable community, descendants of stragglers from the invading army of the Cimbri and Teutones which crossed the Alps in the year of Rome 640, and which presents at this day the singular phenomenon of a foreign race and language preserved unmixed in the midst of another people and another tongue, for a space of nearly two thousand years. But this does not include all his acquisitions, for in 1817 he was acquainted with forty languages, of which the last studied at that time was Welsh.

The space devoted to a Magazine article forbids our following out in detail his various studies, interesting as this would be. He was now a celebrity, and every stranger who visited Italy saw Mezzofanti, and put his powers to the test. To show his singular knowledge, not only of languages, but of dialects and local idioms, Lord Byron relates: "I tried him in every language in which I knew a single oath, or adjuration to the gods against post-boys, savages, Tartars, boatmen, sailors, pilots, gondoliers, muleteers, camel-drivers, vetturini, postmasters, post-houses, post every thing, and egad! he astounded me—even to my English!" It is related, indeed, that when Byron got through with his vocabulary of English slang Mezzofanti quietly asked,

"And is that all?"

"I can go no farther," said the poet, "unless I coin words for the purpose."

"Pardon me, my lord," said the priest; and proceeded to repeat to him a variety of the refinements of London slang, till then unknown to his astonished visitor.

In 1819 Francis I. of Austria visited Bologna, and, having secretly surrounded himself with persons speaking the various languages used in his dominions, had Professor Mezzofanti called to him. The astonished linguist was addressed in turn in German, Magyar, Bohemian, Wallachian, Illyrian, and Polish; but although somewhat startled, replied with wonderful readiness to each in his own tongue, and all bore witness to the remarkable correctness and readiness of his language and pronunciation. Indeed, he had before this been taken by strangers for a native German; while an English lady, whom he addressed in her native tongue, refused to believe that he was not a native of Albion—till she was told he was Mezzofanti.

In 1831 he visited Pope Gregory XVI., and in concurrence with the repeated requests of his Holiness consented to settle himself in Rome. It was on this occasion he said, in reply to some kind words of the Pope, "Holy Father, people say that I can speak a great many languages. In no one of them, nor in them all, can I find words to express how deeply I feel this mark of your Holiness's regard." One of his first visits in Rome was, of course, to the Propaganda—that Polyglot College where, it would seem, he should feel most at home. Entering, he was introduced to a Turkish student, whom he at once addressed in his own tongue. He changed rapidly to Romaic, and from that to English. Presently a crowd surrounded him, each speaking in his own language, and receiving an immediate answer. Dr. O'Connor, the present Roman Bishop of Pittsburgh, who was then a student, describes the scene as most extraordinary, and adds, as a farther exemplification of the linguist's wonderful memory, that during many after-visits to the same place, Mezzofanti never once forgot the language of any student he had once met, nor once failed to address each in his native tongue.

In 1832 he took advantage of a visit to the Chinese College at Naples to begin the study of Chinese; and now a singular mishap befell him. He applied himself so zealously to the acquisition of this most difficult of languages that his overtasked powers succumbed, and he was prostrated with a brain fever. During his sickness, it is said, he was delirious, and talked in an odd mixture of all his fifty languages. Returning consciousness brought with it a total suspension of memory. He completely forgot all his philologic lore. His mind returned to its first uneducated condition of thought. As he recovered strength, however, his powers returned to him unimpaired; and the following year he was enabled to complete his mastery of Chinese. That he did so with his accustomed minuteness of knowledge is evident from an anecdote related of him some years afterward. He was called to speak with a gentleman who had resided for some years at Whampoa and Hong Kong. On making a trial, he found this person to possess but a very superficial knowledge of Chinese; "but," said he, "we spoke long enough for me to discover that he used the Canton dialect."

Shortly after Mezzofanti's permanent return to Rome the Pope prepared for him a surprise which most fully tested his wonderful powers. This was a regular linguistic tournament. A number of the Propaganda students were placed in ambush along the line of walk in the Vatican gardens where His Holiness was wont to take his afternoon exercise. When all was arranged, the great linguist was invited to accompany the Pope; and engaged in cheerful conversation the two proceeded down the appointed path. At a given signal the youths rushed out, and, making their obeisance to the Pope, at once addressed themselves to his companion, each in his own tongue, and that with such abundance of words and volubility of tone, that, in the jargon of dialects, it was almost impossible to distinguish any separate sound. With the promptness and command of his knowledge which was not the least marvelous quality of Mezzofanti's powers, he immediately took them up, one by one, "and answered each," says one of the students present, "in his own language, and with such spirit and elegance as surprised all."

When, in 1838, the Professor was made Cardinal, another surprise awaited him. A party of fifty-three, comprising all the languages and nationalities represented at that time in the Propaganda, waited upon him to offer their polyglot congratulations. He was much touched and gratified; but took care to answer each in his own tongue, with his usual spirit and precision.

In 1839 occurred an odd scene—the polyglot Cardinal was completely at fault. M. Antoine D'Abbadie returned to Rome, from Abyssinia, accompanied by two natives of that country, who spoke only the Amarinna language, and by a Galla servant, whose native and only language was the Ilmorma—a tongue at that time almost unknown even by name in Europe. Mezzofanti, opening the conversation when he met these persons, asked in Arabic, in what language they should speak. M. D'Abbadie proposed the Basque, of which the Cardinal was forced to confess his ignorance. He then asked what African language M. D'A. would use. The latter answered in Amarinna—a language of which also the great linguist was ignorant; he therefore replied in Giz or Ethiopic. Neither could he speak at all with the natives who accompanied M. D'A. Two years afterward the Cardinal was able to converse in the Amarinna with some Abyssinians then in Rome; and had also acquired the Basque—a language so complicated that it has been called "the impossible." Some idea of its difficulty may be formed from the number and names of the moods of the Basque verb, which are no less than eleven: the Indicative, Consuetudinal, Potential, Voluntary, Necessary, Coactive, Imperative, Subjunctive, Optative, Plenitudinary, and Infinitive.

Trials of skill he had almost every day after he took up his residence in Rome; but no other such failure as the above is on record. He continued his favorite studies up to his last year, ever finding time, amidst other pressing duties, to investigate a new tongue, or to perfect himself in one whose system he had already mastered. Thus, at his death, which occurred on March 15, 1848, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, he was acquainted with no less than one hundred and fourteen languages and dialects. Of these he spoke thirty with rare excellence, as was proven by frequent tests. Twenty others he spoke fluently, but more rarely; eight he spoke imperfectly, and fourteen he had mastered from books. To this list of languages must be added a number of dialects, which make up a total of 114, and with which he was in every case thoroughly familiar. Among these tongues are many the names of which even are unknown to the general reader; such as the Tepohuana, the Emabellada, the Pampanga, one of the languages of the Philippine Islands, and the Quichua. Comparing this list with the attainments of celebrated linguists, such as Mithridates, who knew twenty-five, or Sir William Jones who had twenty-eight languages, with Sir John Bowring, who is said to be more or less acquainted with twenty, or Elihu Burrit, for whom is claimed a knowledge of eighteen tongues, the powers of Cardinal Mezzofanti appear miraculous. God had indeed given him, as he said, "a good memory and a quick ear." Withal, he was a most modest man. "What am I," he used to say, "but an ill-bound dictionary?" quoting, too, the words of Catherine de Medici, when told that Scaliger knew twenty languages: "That is twenty words for one idea! For my part, I would rather have twenty ideas for one word."

When asked once to explain the quickness and certainty with which he turned from one tongue to another, without confusion of words or ideas, he asked: "Have you ever tried on a pair of green spectacles? while you wore those every thing looked green to you. Even so, while I am speaking, for instance, Russian, I put on my Russian spectacles, and they color every thing Russian for me: I see all my ideas in that language alone. Passing to another language is merely to change the spectacles."

CHAPTER IX.

A CONVIVIAL MEETING.

ON the whole Mr. Dockwrath was satisfied with the results of his trip to Groby Park, and was in a contented frame of mind as he was driven back to Leeds. No doubt it would have been better could he have persuaded Mr. Mason to throw over Messrs. Round and Crook, and put himself altogether into the hands of his new adviser; but this had been too much to expect. He had not expected it, and had made the suggestion as the surest means of getting the best terms in his power, rather than with a hope of securing the actual advantage named. He had done much toward impressing Mr. Mason with an idea of his own sharpness, and perhaps something also toward breaking the prestige which surrounded the names of the great London firm. He would now go to that firm and make his terms with them. They would probably be quite as ready to acquiesce in the importance of his information as had been Mr. Mason.

Before leaving the inn after breakfast he had agreed to join the dinner in the commercial room at five o'clock, and Mr. Mason's hot lunch had by no means induced him to alter his purpose. "I shall dine here," he had said when Mr. Moulder was discussing with the waiter the all-important subject of dinner. "At the commercial table, Sir?" the waiter had asked, doubtfully. Mr. Dockwrath had answered boldly in the affirmative, whereat Mr. Moulder had growled; but Mr. Kantwise had expressed his satisfaction. "We shall be extremely happy to enjoy your company," Mr. Kantwise had said, with a graceful bow, making up by his excessive courtesy for the want of any courtesy on the part of his brother-traveler. With reference to all this Mr. Moulder said nothing: the stranger had been admitted into the room, to a certain extent even with his own consent, and he could not now be turned out; but he resolved within his own mind that for the future he would be more firm in maintaining the ordinances and institutes of his profession.

On his road home Mr. Dockwrath had encountered Mr. Kantwise going to Groby Park, intent on his sale of a drawing-room set of the metallic furniture; and when he again met him in the commercial room he asked after his success. "A wonderful woman that, Mr. Dockwrath," said Mr. Kantwise, "a really wonderful woman; no particular friend of yours I think you say?"

"None in the least, Mr. Kantwise."

"Then I may make bold to assert that for persevering sharpness she beats all that I ever met, even in Yorkshire;" and Mr. Kantwise looked at his new friend over his shoulder, and shook his head as though lost in wonder and admiration. "What do you think she's done now?"

"She didn't give you much to eat, I take it."

"Much to eat! I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Dockwrath, my belief is that that woman would have an absolute pleasure in starving a Christian; I do indeed. I'll tell you what she has done; she has made me put her up a set of them things at twelve, seventeen, six! I needn't tell you that they were never made for the money."

"Why, then, did you part with them at a loss?"

"Well; that's the question. I was soft, I suppose. She got round me, badgering me, till I didn't know where I was. She wanted them as a present for the curate's wife, she said. Whatever should induce her to make a present!"

"She got them for twelve, seventeen, six; did she?" said Dockwrath, thinking that it might be as well to remember this, if he should feel inclined to make a purchase himself.

"But they was strained, Mr. Dockwrath; I must admit they was strained—particularly the loo."

"You had gone through your gymnastics on it a little too often?" asked the attorney. But this Mr. Kantwise would not acknowledge. The strength of that table was such that he could stand on it forever without injury to it; but nevertheless, in some other way, it had become strained, and therefore he had sold the set to Mrs. Mason for £12 17s. 6d., that lady being minded to make a costly present to the wife of the curate of Groby.

When dinner-time came Mr. Dockwrath found that the party was swelled to the number of eight, five other undoubted commercials having brought themselves to anchor at the Bull Inn during the day. To all of these Mr. Kantwise introduced him. "Mr. Gape, Mr. Dockwrath," said he, gracefully moving toward them the palm of his hand, and eying them over his shoulder. "Mr. Gape is in the stationery line," he added, in a whisper to the attorney, "and does for Cumming and Jibber, of St. Paul's Churchyard.

Mr. Johnson, Mr. Dockwrath. Mr. J. is from Sheffield. Mr. Snengkeld, Mr. Dockwrath;" and then he imparted in another whisper the necessary information as to Mr. Snengkeld. "Soft goods, for Brown Brothers, of Snow Hill," and so on, through the whole fraternity. Each member bowed as his name was mentioned; but they did not do so very graciously, as Mr. Kantwise was not a great man among them. Had the stranger been introduced to them by Moulder—Moulder the patriarch—his reception among them would have been much warmer. And then they sat down to dinner, Mr. Moulder taking the chair as president, and Mr. Kantwise sitting opposite to him, as being the longest sojourner at the inn. Mr. Dockwrath sat at the right hand of Kantwise, discreetly avoiding the neighborhood of Moulder, and the others ranged themselves according to fancy at the table. "Come up alongside of me, old fellow," Moulder said to Snengkeld. "It ain't the first time that you and I have smacked our lips together over the same bit of roast beef." "Nor won't, I hope, be the last by a long chalk, Mr. Moulder," said Snengkeld, speaking with a deep, hoarse voice, which seemed to ascend from some region of his body far below his chest. Moulder and Snengkeld were congenial spirits; but the latter, though the older man, was not endowed with so large a volume of body or so highly dominant a spirit. Brown Brothers, of Snow Hill, were substantial people, and Mr. Snengkeld traveled in strict accordance with the good old rules of trade which Moulder loved so well.

The politeness and general good manners of the company were something very pretty to witness. Mr. Dockwrath, as a stranger, was helped first, and every courtesy was shown to him. Even Mr. Moulder carved the beef for him with a loving hand, and Mr. Kantwise was almost subservient in his attention. Mr. Dockwrath thought that he had certainly done right in coming to the commercial table, and resolved on doing so on all occasions of future journeys. So far all was good. The commercial dinner, as he had ascertained, would cost him only two shillings, and a much inferior repast eaten by himself elsewhere would have stood in his bill for three. So far all was good; but the test by which he was to be tried was now approaching him.

When the dinner was just half over—Mr. Moulder well knew how to mark the time—that gentleman called for the waiter, and whispered an important order into that functionary's ears. The functionary bowed, retired from the room, and reappeared again in two minutes, bearing a bottle of sherry in each hand; one of these he deposited at the right hand of Mr. Moulder, and the other at the right hand of Mr. Kantwise.

"Sir," said Mr. Moulder, addressing himself with great ceremony to Mr. Dockwrath, "the honor of a glass of wine with you, Sir," and the president, to give more importance to the occasion, put down his knife and fork, leaned back in his chair, and put both his hands upon his waistcoat, looking intently at the attorney out of his little eyes.

Mr. Dockwrath was immediately aware that a crisis had come upon him which demanded an instant decision. If he complied with the president's invitation he would have to pay his proportion of all the wine bill that might be incurred that evening by the seven commercial gentlemen at the table, and he knew well that commercial gentlemen do sometimes call for bottle after bottle with a reckless disregard of expense. But to him, with his sixteen children, wine at a hotel was terrible. A pint of beer and a glass of brandy-and-water were the luxuries which he had promised himself, and with manly fortitude he resolved that he would not be coerced into extravagance by any president or any Moulder.

"Sir," said he, "I'm obliged by the honor, but I don't drink wine to my dinner." Whereupon Mr. Moulder bowed his head very solemnly, winked at Snengkeld, and then drank wine with that gentleman.

"It's the rule of the room," whispered Mr. Kantwise into Mr. Dockwrath's ear; but Mr. Dockwrath pretended not to hear him, and the matter was allowed to pass by for the time.

But Mr. Snengkeld asked him for the honor, as also did Mr. Gape, who sat at Moulder's left hand; and then Mr. Dockwrath began to wax angry. "I think I remarked before that I don't drink wine to my dinner," he said; and then the three at the president's end of the table all looked at each other very solemnly, and they all winked; and after that there was very little conversation during the remainder of the meal, for men knew that the goddess of discord was in the air.

The cheese came, and with that a bottle of port wine, which was handed round, Mr. Dockwrath of course refusing to join in the conviviality; and then the cloth was drawn, and the decanters were put before the president. "James, bring me a little brandy-and-water," said the attorney, striving to put a bold face on the matter, but yet speaking with diminished voice.

"Half a moment, if you please, Sir," said Moulder; and then he exclaimed, with stentorian voice, "James, the dinner bill." "Yes, Sir," said the waiter, and disappeared without any thought toward the requisition for brandy-and-water from Mr. Dockwrath.

For the next five minutes they all remained silent, except that Mr. Moulder gave the Queen's health as he filled his glass and pushed the bottles from him. "Gentlemen, the Queen," and then he lifted his glass of port up to the light, shut one eye as he looked at it, and immediately swallowed the contents as though he were taking a dose of physic. "I'm afraid they'll charge you for the wine," said Mr. Kantwise, again whispering to his neighbor. But Mr. Dockwrath paid no apparent attention to what was said to him. He was concentrating his energies with a view to the battle.

James, the waiter, soon returned. He also knew well what was about to happen, and he trembled as he handed in the document to the president. "Let's have it, James," said Moulder, with much pleasantry, as he took the paper in his hand. "The old ticket, I suppose; five bob a head." And then he read out the bill, the total of which, wine and beer included, came to forty shillings. "Five shillings a head, gentlemen, as I said. You and I can make a pretty good guess as to the figure—eh, Snengkeld?" And then he put down his two half-crowns on the waiter, as also did Mr. Snengkeld, and then Mr. Gape, and so on till it came to Mr. Kantwise.

"I think you and I will leave it, and settle at the bar," said Kantwise, appealing to Dockwrath, and intending peace if peace were still possible.

"No," shouted Moulder, from the other end of the table; "let the man have his money now, and then his troubles will be over. If there's to be any fuss about it, let's have it out. I like to see the dinner-bill settled as soon as the dinner is eaten. Then one gets an appetite for one's supper."

"I don't think I have the change," said Kantwise, still putting off the evil day.

"I'll lend it you," said Moulder, putting his hand into his trowsers-pockets. But the money was forthcoming out of Mr. Kantwise's own proper repositories, and with slow motion he put down the five shillings one after the other.

And then the waiter came to Mr. Dockwrath. "What's this?" said the attorney, taking up the bill and looking at it. The whole matter had been sufficiently explained to him, but nevertheless Mr. Moulder explained it again. "In commercial rooms, Sir, as no doubt you must be well aware, seeing that you have done us the honor of joining us here, the dinner-bill is divided equally among all the gentlemen as sit down. It's the rule of the room, Sir. You has what you like, and you calls for what you like, and conviviality is thereby encouraged. The figure generally comes to five shillings, and you afterward gives what you like to the waiter. That's about it, ain't it, James?"

"That's the rule, Sir, in all commercial rooms as I ever see," said the waiter.

The matter had been so extremely well put by Mr. Moulder, and that gentleman's words had carried with them so much conviction, that Dockwrath felt himself almost tempted to put down the money: as far as his sixteen children and general ideas of economy were concerned he would have done so; but his legal mind could not bear to be beaten. The spirit of litigation within him told him that the point was to be carried. Moulder, Gape, and Snengkeld together could not make him pay for wine he had neither ordered nor swallowed. His pocket was guarded by the law of the land, and not by the laws of any special room in which he might chance to find himself. "I shall pay two shillings for my dinner," said he, "and sixpence for my beer;" and then he deposited the half crown.

"Do you mean us to understand," said Moulder, "that after forcing your way into this room, and sitting down along with gentlemen at this table, you refuse to abide by the rules of the room?" And Mr. Moulder spoke and looked as though he thought that such treachery must certainly lead to most disastrous results. The disastrous result which a stranger might have expected at the moment would be a fit of apoplexy on the part of the worthy president.

"I neither ordered that wine nor did I drink it," said Mr. Dockwrath, compressing his lips, leaning back in his chair, and looking up into one corner of the ceiling.

"The gentleman certainly did not drink the wine," said Kantwise, "I must acknowledge that; and as for ordering it, why that was done by the president, in course."

"Gammon!" said Mr. Moulder, and he fixed his eyes steadfastly upon his Vice. "Kantwise, that's gammon. The most of what you says is gammon."

"Mr. Moulder, I don't exactly know what you mean by that word gammon, but it's objectionable. To my feelings it's very objectionable. I say that the gentleman did not drink the wine, and I appeal to the gentleman who sits at the gentleman's right, whether what I say is not correct. If what I say is correct, it can't be—gammon. Mr. Busby, did the gentleman drink the wine, or did he not?"

"Not as I see," said Mr. Busby, somewhat nervous at being thus brought into the controversy. He was a young man just commencing his travels, and stood in awe of the great Moulder.

"Gammon!" shouted Moulder, with a very red face. "Every body at the table knows he didn't drink the wine. Every body saw that he declined the honor when proposed, which I don't know that I ever saw a gentleman do at a commercial table till this day, barring that he was a teetotaler, which is gammon too. But it's P. P. here, as every commercial gentleman knows, Kantwise as well as the best of us."

"P. P., that's the rule," growled Snengkeld, almost from under the table.

"In commercial rooms, as the gentleman must be aware, the rule is as stated by my friend on my right," said Mr. Gape. "The wine is ordered by the president or chairman, and is paid for in equal proportions by the company or guests," and in his oratory Mr. Gape laid great stress on the word "or." "The gentleman will easily perceive that such a rule as this is necessary in such a society; and unless—"

But Mr. Gape was apt to make long speeches, and therefore Mr. Moulder interrupted him. "You had better pay your five shillings, Sir, and have no jaw about it. The man is standing idle there."

"It's not the value of the money," said Dockwrath, "but I must decline to acknowledge that I am amenable to the jurisdiction."

"There has clearly been a mistake," said Johnson from Sheffield, "and we had better settle it among us; any thing is better than a row." Johnson from Sheffield was a man somewhat inclined to dispute the supremacy of Moulder from Houndsditch.

"No, Johnson," said the president. "Any thing is not better than a row. A premeditated infraction of our rules is not better than a row."

"Did you say premeditated?" said Kantwise. "I think not premeditated."

"I did say premeditated, and I say it again."

"It looks uncommon like it," said Snengkeld.

"When a gentleman," said Gape, "who does not belong to a society—"

"It's no good having more talk," said Moulder, "and we'll soon bring this to an end. Mr. —; I haven't the honor of knowing the gentleman's name."

"My name is Dockwrath, and I am a solicitor."

"Oh, a solicitor, are you? and you said last night you was commercial! Will you be good enough to tell us, Mr. Solicitor—for I didn't just catch your name, except that it begins with a dock—and that's where most of your clients are to be found, I suppose—"

"Order, order, order!" said Kantwise, holding up both his hands.

"It's the chair as is speaking," said Mr. Gape, who had a true Englishman's notion that the chair itself could not be called to order.

"You shouldn't insult the gentleman because he has his own ideas," said Johnson.

"I don't want to insult no one," continued Moulder; "and those who know me best, among whom I can't as yet count Mr. Johnson, though hopes I shall some day, won't say it of me." "Hear—hear—hear!" from both Snengkeld and Gape; to which Kantwise added a little "hear—hear" of his own, of which Mr. Moulder did not quite approve. "Mr. Snengkeld and Mr. Gape, they're my old friends, and they knows me. And they knows the way of a commercial room—which some gentlemen don't seem as though they do. I don't want to insult no one; but as chairman here at this convivial meeting, I asks that gentleman who says he is a solicitor whether he means to pay his dinner bill according to the rules of the room, or whether he don't?"

"I've paid for what I've had already," said Dockwrath, "and I don't mean to pay for what I've not had."

"James," exclaimed Moulder—and all the chairman was in his voice as he spoke—"my compliments to Mr. Crump, and I will request his attendance for five minutes;" and then James left the room, and there was silence for a while, during which the bottles made their round of the table.

"Hadn't we better send back the pint of wine which Mr. Dockwrath hasn't used?" suggested Kantwise.

"I'm d—— if we do!" replied Moulder, with much energy; and the general silence was not again broken till Mr. Crump made his appearance; but the chairman whispered a private word or two to his friend Snengkeld. "I never sent back ordered liquor to the bar yet, unless it was bad; and I'm not going to begin now."

And then Mr. Crump came in. Mr. Crump was a very clean-looking person, without any beard, and dressed from head to foot in black. He was about fifty, with grizzly gray hair, which stood upright on his head, and his face at the present moment wore on it an innkeeper's smile. But it could also assume an innkeeper's frown, and on occasions did so—when bills were disputed, or unreasonable strangers thought that they knew the distance in posting miles round the neighborhood of Leeds better than did he, Mr. Crump, who had lived at the Bull Inn all his life. But Mr. Crump rarely frowned on commercial gentlemen, from whom was derived the main stay of his business and the main prop of his house.

"Mr. Crump," began Moulder, "here has occurred a very unpleasant transaction."

"I know all about it, gentlemen," said Mr. Crump. "The waiter has acquainted me, and I can assure you, gentlemen, that I am extremely sorry that any thing should have arisen to disturb the harmony of your dinner-table."

"We must now call upon you, Mr. Crump," began Mr. Moulder, who was about to demand that Dockwrath should be turned bodily out of the room.

"If you'll allow me one moment, Mr. Moulder," continued Mr. Crump, "and I'll tell you what is my suggestion. The gentleman here, who I understand is a lawyer, does not wish to comply with the rules of the commercial room."

"I certainly don't wish or intend to pay for drink that I didn't order and haven't had," said Dockwrath.

"Exactly," said Mr. Crump. "And therefore, gentlemen, to get out of the difficulty, we'll presume, if you please, that the bill is paid."

"The lawyer, as you call him, will have to leave the room," said Moulder.

"Perhaps he will not object to step over to the coffee-room on the other side," suggested the landlord.

"I can't think of leaving my seat here under such circumstances," said Dockwrath.

"You can't," said Moulder. "Then you must be made, as I take it."

"Let me see the man that will make me," said Dockwrath.

Mr. Crump looked very apologetic and not very comfortable. "There is a difficulty, gentlemen; there is a difficulty, indeed," he said. "The fact is, the gentleman should not have been showed into the room at all;" and he looked very angrily at his own servant, James.

"He said he was 'mercial," said James. "So he did. Now he says as how he's a lawyer. What's a poor man to do?"

"I'm a commercial lawyer," said Dockwrath.

"He must leave the room, or I shall leave the house," said Moulder.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen!" said Crump. "This kind of thing does not happen often, and on this occasion I must try your kind patience. If Mr.

MR. DOCKWRATH SOLUS.

Moulder would allow me to suggest that the commercial gentlemen should take their wine in the large drawing-room up stairs this evening, Mrs. C. will do her best to make it comfortable for them in five minutes. There of course they can be private."

There was something in the idea of leaving

Mr. Dockwrath alone in his glory which appeased the spirit of the great Moulder. He had known Crump, moreover, for many years, and was aware that it would be a dangerous, and probably an expensive proceeding to thrust out the attorney by violence. "If the other gentlemen are agreeable, I am," said he. The other gentlemen were agreeable, and, with the exception of Kantwise, they all rose from their chairs.

"I must say I think you ought to leave the room as you don't choose to abide by the rules," said Johnson, addressing himself to Dockwrath.

"That's your opinion," said Dockwrath.

"Yes, it is," said Johnson. "That's my opinion."

"My own happens to be different," said Dockwrath; and so he kept his chair.

"There, Mr. Crump," said Moulder, taking half a crown from his pocket, and throwing it on the table. "I sha'n't see you at a loss."

"Thank you, Sir," said Mr. Crump; and he very humbly took up the money.

"I keep a little account for charity at home," said Moulder.

"It don't run very high, do it?" asked Snengkeld, jocosely.

"Not out of the way, it don't. But now I shall have the pleasure of writing down in it that I paid half a crown for a lawyer who couldn't afford to settle his own dinner bill. Sir, we have the pleasure of wishing you a good-night."

"I hope you'll find the large drawing-room up stairs quite comfortable," said Dockwrath.

And then they all marched out of the room, each with his own glass—Mr. Moulder leading the way with stately step. It was pleasant to see them as they all followed their leader across the open passage of the gate-way, in by the bar, and so up the chief staircase. Mr. Moulder walked slowly, bearing the bottle of port and his own glass, and Mr. Snengkeld and Mr. Gape followed in line, bearing also their own glasses, and maintaining the dignity of their profession under circumstances of some difficulty.

"Gentlemen, I really am sorry for this little accident," said Mr. Crump, as they were passing the bar; "but a lawyer, you know—"

"And such a lawyer, eh, Crump?" said Moulder.

"It might be five-and-twenty pound to me to lay a hand on him!" said the landlord.

When the time came for Mr. Kantwise to move, he considered the matter well. The chances, however, as he calculated them, were against any profitable business being done with the attorney, so he also left the room. "Good-night, Sir," he said as he went. "I wish you a very good-night."

"Take care of yourself," said Dockwrath; and then the attorney spent the rest of the evening alone.

CHAPTER X.

MR., MRS., AND MISS FURNIVAL.

I WILL now ask my readers to come with me up to London, in order that I may introduce them to the family of the Furnivals. We shall see much of the Furnivals before we reach the end of our present undertaking, and it will be well that we should commence our acquaintance with them as early as may be done.

Mr. Furnival was a lawyer—I mean a barrister—belonging to Lincoln's Inn, and living at the time at which our story is supposed to commence in Harley Street. But he had not been long a resident in Harley Street, having left the less fashionable neighborhood of Russell Square only two or three years before that period. On his marriage he had located himself in a small house in Keppel Street, and had there remained till professional success, long waited for, enabled him to move further west, and indulge himself with the comforts of larger rooms and more servants. At the time of which I am now speaking Mr. Furnival was known, and well known, as a successful man; but he had struggled long and hard before that success had come to him, and during the earliest years of his married life had found the work of keeping the wolf from his door to be almost more than enough for his energies.

Mr. Furnival practiced at the common law bar, and early in life had attached himself to the home circuit. I can not say why he obtained no great success till he was nearer fifty than forty years of age. At that time I fancy that barristers did not come to their prime till a period of life at which other men are supposed to be in their decadence. Nevertheless, he had married on nothing, and had kept the wolf from the door. To do this he had been constant at his work in season and out of season, during the long hours of day and the long hours of night. Throughout his term times he had toiled in court, and during the vacations he had toiled out of court. He had reported volumes of cases, having been himself his own short-hand writer—as it is well known to most young lawyers, who as a rule always fill an upper shelf in their law libraries with Furnival and Staples's seventeen volumes in calf. He had worked for the booksellers, and for the newspapers, and for the attorneys—always working, however, with reference to the law; and though he had worked for years with the lowest pay, no man had heard him complain. That no woman had heard him do so, I will not say; as it is more than probable that into the sympathizing ears of Mrs. Furnival he did pour forth complaints as to the small wages which the legal world meted out to him in return for his labors. He was a constant, hard, patient man, and at last there came to him the full reward of all his industry. What was the special case by which Mr. Furnival obtained his great success no man could say. In all probability there was no special case. Gradually it began to be understood that he was a safe man, understanding his trade, true to his clients, and very damaging as an opponent. Legal gentlemen are, I believe, quite as often bought off as bought up. Sir Richard and Mr. Furnival could not both be required on the same side, seeing what a tower of strength each was in himself; but then Sir Richard would be absolutely neutralized if Mr. Furnival were employed on the other side. This is a system well understood by attorneys, and has been found to be extremely lucrative by gentlemen leading at the bar.

Mr. Furnival was now fifty-five years of age, and was beginning to show in his face some traces of his hard work. Not that he was becoming old, or weak, or worn; but his eye had lost its fire—except the fire peculiar to his profession; and there were wrinkles in his forehead and cheeks; and his upper lip, except when he was speaking, hung heavily over the lower; and the loose skin below his eye was forming itself into saucers; and his hair had become grizzled; and on his shoulders, except when in court, there was a slight stoop. As seen in his wig and gown he was a man of commanding presence, and for ten men in London who knew him in this garb hardly one knew him without it. He was nearly six feet high, and stood forth prominently, with square, broad shoulders and a large body. His head also was large; his forehead was high, and marked strongly by signs of intellect; his nose was long and straight, his eyes were very gray, and capable to an extraordinary degree both of direct severity and of concealed sarcasm. Witnesses have been heard to say that they could endure all that Mr. Furnival could say to them, and continue in some sort to answer all his questions, if only he would refrain from looking at them. But he would never refrain; and therefore it was now well understood how great a thing it was to secure the services of Mr. Furnival. "Sir," an attorney would say to an unfortunate client doubtful as to the expenditure, "your witnesses will not be able to stand in the box if we allow Mr. Furnival to be engaged on the other side." I am inclined to think that Mr. Furnival owed to this power of his eyes his almost unequalled perfection in that peculiar branch of his profession. His voice was powerful, and not unpleasant when used within the precincts of a court, though it grated somewhat harshly on the ears in the smaller compass of a private room. His flow of words was free and good, and seemed to come from him without the slightest effort. Such at least was always the case with him when standing wigged and gowned before a judge. Latterly, however, he had tried his eloquence on another arena, and not altogether with equal success. He was now in Parliament, sitting as member for the Essex Marshes, and he had not as yet carried either the country or the House with him, although he had been frequently on his legs. Some men said that with a little practice he would yet become very serviceable as an honorable and learned member; but others expressed a fear that he had come too late in life to these new duties.

I have spoken of Mr. Furnival's great success in that branch of his profession which required from him the examination of evidence, but I would not have it thought that he was great only in this, or even mainly in this. There are gentlemen at the bar, among whom I may perhaps notice my old friend Mr. Chaffanbrass as the most conspicuous, who have confined their talents to the brow-beating of witnesses—greatly to their own profit, and no doubt to the advantage of society. But I would have it understood that Mr. Furnival was by no means one of these. He had been no Old Bailey lawyer, devoting himself to the manumission of murderers, or the security of the swindling world in general. He had been employed on abstruse points of law, had been great in will cases, very learned as to the rights of railways, peculiarly apt in enforcing the dowries of married women, and successful above all things in separating husbands and wives whose lives had not been passed in accordance with the recognized rules of Hymen. Indeed there is no branch of the Common Law in which he was not regarded as great and powerful, though perhaps his proficiency in damaging the general characters of his opponents has been recognized as his especial forte. Under these circumstances I should grieve to have him confounded with such men as Mr. Chaffanbrass, who is hardly known by the profession beyond the precincts of his own peculiar court in the City. Mr. Furnival's reputation has spread itself wherever stuff gowns and horse-hair wigs are held in estimation.

Mr. Furnival, when clothed in his forensic habiliments, certainly possessed a solemn and severe dignity which had its weight even with the judges. Those who scrutinized his appearance critically might have said that it was in some respects pretentious; but the ordinary jurymen of this country are not critical scrutinizers of appearance, and by them he was never held in light estimation. When in his addresses to them, appealing to their intelligence, education, and enlightened justice, he would declare that the property of his clients was perfectly safe in their hands, he looked to be such an advocate as a litigant would fain possess when dreading the soundness of his own cause. Any cause was sound to him when once he had been feed for its support, and he carried in his countenance his assurance of this soundness—and the assurance of unsoundness in the cause of his opponent. Even he did not always win; but on the occasion of his losing, those of the uninitiated who had heard the pleadings would express their astonishment that he should not have been successful.

When he was divested of his wig his appearance was not so perfect. There was then a hard, long, straightness about his head and face, giving to his countenance the form of a parallelogram, to which there belonged a certain meanness of expression. He wanted the roundness of forehead, the short lines, and the graceful curves of face which are necessary to unadorned manly comeliness. His whiskers were small, grizzled, and ill-grown, and required the ample relief of his wig. In no guise did he look other than a clever man; but in his dress as a simple citizen he would perhaps be taken as a clever man in whose tenderness of heart and cordiality of feeling one would not at first sight place implicit trust.

As a poor man Mr. Furnival had done his duty well by his wife and family—for as a poor man he had been blessed with four children. Three of these had died as they were becoming men and women; and now, as a rich man, he was left with one daughter, an only child. As a poor man Mr. Furnival had been an excellent husband, going forth in the morning to his work, struggling through the day, and then returning to his meagre dinner and his long evenings of unremitting drudgery. The bodily strength which had supported him through his work in those days must have been immense, for he had allowed himself no holidays. And then success and money had come—and Mrs. Furnival sometimes found herself not quite so happy as she had been when watching beside him in the days of their poverty.

The equal mind—as mortal Delius was bidden to remember, and as Mr. Furnival might also have remembered had time been allowed him to cultivate the classics—the equal mind should be as sedulously maintained when things run well as well as when they run hardly; and perhaps the maintenance of such equal mind is more difficult in the former than in the latter stage of life. Be that as it may, Mr. Furnival could now be very cross on certain domestic occasions, and could also be very unjust. And there was worse than this—much worse behind. He, who in the heyday of his youth would spend night after night poring over his books, copying out reports, and never asking to see a female habiliment brighter or more attractive than his wife's Sunday gown—he, at the age of fifty-five, was now running after strange goddesses! The member for the Essex Marshes, in these his latter days, was obtaining for himself, among other successes, the character of a Lothario; and Mrs. Furnival, sitting at home in her genteel drawing-room near Cavendish Square, would remember with regret the small dingy parlor in Keppel Street.

Mrs. Furnival, in discussing her grievances, would attribute them mainly to port wine. In his early days Mr. Furnival had been essentially an abstemious man. Young men who work fifteen hours a day must be so. But now he had a strong opinion about certain Portuguese vintages, was convinced that there was no port wine in London equal to the contents of his own bin, saving always a certain green cork appertaining to his own club, which was to be extracted at the rate of thirty shillings a cork. And Mrs. Furnival attributed to these latter studies not only a certain purple hue which was suffusing his nose and cheeks, but also that unevenness of character and those supposed domestic improprieties to which allusion has been made. It may, however, be as well to explain that Mrs. Ball, the old family cook and housekeeper, who had ascended with the Furnivals in the world, opined that made-dishes did the mischief. He dined out too often, and was a deal too particular about his dinner when he dined at home. If Providence would see fit to visit him with a sharp attack of the gout, it would—so thought Mrs. Ball—be better for all parties.

Whether or no it may have been that Mrs. Furnival at fifty-five—for she and her lord were of the same age—was not herself as attractive in her husband's eyes as she had been at thirty, I will not pretend to say. There can have been no just reason for any such change in feeling, seeing that the two had grown old together. She, poor woman, would still have been quite content with the attentions of Mr. Furnival, though his hair was grizzled and his nose was blue; nor did she ever think of attracting to herself the admiration of any swain whose general comeliness might be more free from all taint of age. Why, then, should he wander afield—at the age of fifty-five? That he did wander afield, poor Mrs. Furnival felt in her agony convinced; and among those ladies whom on this account she most thoroughly detested was our friend Lady Mason of Orley Farm. Lady Mason and the lawyer had first become acquainted in the days of the trial, now long gone by, on which occasion Mr. Furnival had been employed as the junior counsel; and that acquaintance had ripened into friendship, and now flourished in full vigor—to Mrs. Furnival's great sorrow and disturbance.

Mrs. Furnival herself was a stout, solid woman, sensible on most points, but better adapted, perhaps, to the life in Keppel Street than that to which she had now been promoted. As Kitty Blacker she had possessed feminine charms which would have been famous had they been better known. Mr. Furnival had fetched her from farther East—from the region of Great Ormond Street and the neighborhood of Southampton Buildings. Her cherry cheeks, and her round eye, and her full bust, and her fresh lip, had conquered the hard-tasked lawyer; and so they had gone forth to fight the world together. Her eye was still round, and her cheek red, and her bust full—there had certainly been no falling off there; nor will I say that her lip had lost all its freshness. But the bloom of her charms had passed away, and she was now a solid, stout, motherly woman, not bright in converse, but by no means deficient in mother-wit, recognizing well the duties which she owed to others, but recognizing equally well those which others owed to her. All the charms of her youth—had they not been given to him, and also all her solicitude, all her anxious fighting with the hard world? When they had been poor together, had she not patched and turned and twisted, sitting silently by his side into the long nights, because she would not ask him for the price of a new dress? And yet now, now that they were rich—? Mrs. Furnival, when she put such questions within her own mind, could hardly answer this latter one with patience. Others might be afraid of the great Mr. Furnival in his wig and gown; others might be struck dumb by his power of eye and mouth; but she, she, the wife of his bosom, she could catch him without his armor. She would so catch him, and let him know what she thought of all her wrongs. So she said to herself many a day; and yet the great deed, in all its explosiveness, had never yet been done. Small attacks of words there had been many; but hitherto the courage to speak out her griefs openly had been wanting to her.

I can now allow myself but a small space to say a few words of Sophia Furnival, and yet in that small space must be confined all the direct description which can be given of one of the principal personages of this story. At nineteen Miss Furnival was in all respects a young woman. She was forward in acquirements, in manner, in general intelligence, and in powers of conversation. She was a handsome, tall girl, with expressive gray eyes and dark-brown hair. Her mouth, and hair, and a certain motion of her neck and turn of her head, had come to her from her mother, but her eyes were those of her father: they were less sharp perhaps, less eager after their prey; but they were bright as his had been bright, and sometimes had in them more of absolute command than he was ever able to throw into his own.

Their golden days had come on them at a period of her life which enabled her to make a better use of them than her mother could do. She never felt herself to be struck dumb by rank or fashion, nor did she in the drawing-rooms of the great ever show signs of an Eastern origin. She could adapt herself without an effort to the manners of Cavendish Square—ay, and if need were, to the ways of more glorious squares even than that. Therefore was her father never ashamed to be seen with her on his arm in the houses of his new friends, though on such occasions he was willing enough to go out without disturbing the repose of his wife. No mother could have loved her children with a warmer affection than that which had warmed the heart of poor Mrs. Furnival; but under such circumstances as these was it singular that she should occasionally become jealous of her own daughter?

Sophia Furnival was, as I have said, a clever, attractive girl, handsome, well-read, able to hold her own with the old as well as with the young, capable of hiding her vanity if she had any, mild and gentle to girls less gifted, animated in conversation, and yet possessing an eye that could fall softly to the ground, as a woman's eye always should fall upon occasions.

Nevertheless she was not altogether charming. "I don't feel quite sure that she is real," Mrs. Orme had said of her, when on a certain occasion Miss Furnival had spent a day and a night at The Cleeve.

CHAPTER XI.

MRS. FURNIVAL AT HOME.

LUCIUS MASON on his road to Liverpool had passed through London, and had found a moment to call in Harley Street. Since his return from Germany he had met Miss Furnival both at home at his mother's house—or rather his own —and at the Cleeve. Miss Furnival had been in the neighborhood, and had spent two days with the great people at the Cleeve, and one day with the little people at Orley Farm. Lucius Mason had found that she was a sensible girl, capable of discussing great subjects with him; and had possibly found some other charms in her. Therefore he had called in Harley Street.

On that occasion he could only call as he passed through London without delay; but he received such encouragement as induced him to spend a night in town on his return, in order that he might accept an invitation to drink tea with the Furnivals. "We shall be very happy to see you," Mrs. Furnival had said, backing the proposition which had come from her daughter without any very great fervor; "but I fear Mr. Furnival will not be at home. Mr. Furnival very seldom is at home now." Young Mason did not much care for fervor on the part of Sophia's mother, and therefore had accepted the invitation, though he was obliged by so doing to curtail by some hours his sojourn among the guano stores of Liverpool.

It was the time of year at which few people are at home in London, being the middle of October; but Mrs. Furnival was a lady of whom at such periods it was not very easy to dispose. She could have made herself as happy as a queen even at Margate, if it could have suited Furnival and Sophia to be happy at Margate with her. But this did not suit Furnival or Sophia. As regards money, any or almost all other autumnal resorts were open to her, but she could be contented at none of them because Mr. Furnival always pleaded that business—law business or political business—took him elsewhere. Now Mrs. Furnival was a woman who did not like to be deserted, and who could not, in the absence of those social joys which Providence had vouchsafed to her as her own, make herself happy with the society of other women such as herself. Furnival was her husband, and she wanted him to carve for her, to sit opposite to her at the breakfast-table, to tell her the news of the day, and to walk to church with her on Sundays. They had been made one flesh and one bone, for better and worse, thirty years since; and now in her latter days she could not put up with disseveration and dislocation.

She had gone down to Brighton in August, soon after the House broke up, and there found that very handsome apartments had been taken for her—rooms that would have made glad the heart of many a lawyer's wife. She had, too, the command of a fly, done up to look like a private brougham, a servant in livery, the run of the public assembly-rooms, a sitting in the centre of the most fashionable church in Brighton—all that the heart of woman could desire. All but the one thing was there; but that one thing being absent she came moodily back to town at the end of September. She would have exchanged them all with a happy heart for very moderate accommodation at Margate, could she have seen Mr. Furnival's blue nose on the other side of the table every morning and evening as she sat over her shrimps and tea.

Men who had risen in the world as Mr. Furnival had done do find it sometimes difficult to dispose of their wives. It is not that the ladies are in themselves more unfit for rising than their lords, or that if occasion demanded they would not as readily adapt themselves to new spheres. But they do not rise, and occasion does not demand it. A man elevates his wife to his own rank, and when Mr. Brown, on becoming solicitor-general, becomes Sir Jacob, Mrs. Brown also becomes my lady. But the whole set among whom Brown must be more or less thrown do not want her ladyship. On Brown's promotion she did not become part of the bargain. Brown must henceforth have two existences—a public and a private existence; and it will be well for Lady Brown, and well also for Sir Jacob, if the latter be not allowed to dwindle down to a minimum.

If Lady B. can raise herself also, if she can make her own occasion, if she be handsome and can flirt, if she be impudent and can force her way, if she have a daring mind and can commit great expenditure, if she be clever and can make poetry, if she can in any way create a separate glory for herself, then, indeed, Sir Jacob with his blue nose may follow his own path, and all will be well. Sir Jacob's blue nose seated opposite to her will not be her summum bonum.

But worthy Mrs. Furnival—and she was worthy—had created for herself no such separate glory, nor did she dream of creating it; and therefore she had, as it were, no footing left to her. On this occasion she had gone to Brighton, and had returned from it sulky and wretched, bringing her daughter back to London at the period of London's greatest desolation. Sophia had returned uncomplaining, remembering that good things were in store for her. She had been asked to spend her Christmas with the Staveleys at Noningsby—the family of Judge Staveley, who lives near Alston, at a very pretty country place so called. Mr. Furnival had been for many years acquainted with Judge Staveley—had known the judge when he was a leading counsel; and now that Mr. Furnival was a rising man, and now that he had a pretty daughter, it was natural that the young Staveleys and Sophia Furnival should know each other. But poor Mrs. Furnival was too ponderous for this mounting late in life, and she had not been asked to Noningsby.

She was much too good a mother to repine at her daughter's promised gayety. Sophia was welcome to go; but by all the laws of God and man it would behoove her lord and husband to eat his mince-pie at home.

"Mr. Furnival was to be back in town this evening," the lady said, as though apologizing to young Mason for her husband's absence, when he entered the drawing-room, "but he has not come, and I dare say will not come now."

Mason did not care a straw for Mr. Furnival.

"Oh! won't he?" said he. "I suppose business keeps him."

"Papa is very busy about politics just at present," said Sophia, wishing to make matters smooth in her mother's mind. "He was obliged to be at Romford in the beginning of the week, and then he went down to Birmingham. There is some congress going on there, is there not?"

"All that must take a great deal of time," said Lucius.

"Yes; and it is a terrible bore," said Sophia. "I know papa finds it so."

"Your papa likes it, I believe," said Mrs. Furnival, who would not hide even her grievances under a bushel.

"I don't think he likes being so much from home, mamma. Of course he likes excitement, and success. All men do. Do they not, Mr. Mason?"

"They all ought to do so, and women also."

"Ah! but women have no sphere, Mr. Mason."

"They have minds equal to those of men," said Lucius, gallantly, "and ought to be able to make for themselves careers as brilliant."

"Women ought not to have any spheres," said Mrs. Furnival.

"I don't know that I quite agree with you there, mamma."

"The world is becoming a great deal too fond of what you call excitement and success. Of course it is a good thing for a man to make money by his profession, and a very hard thing when he can't do it," added Mrs. Furnival, thinking of the olden days. "But if success in life means rampaging about, and never knowing what it is to sit quiet over his own fireside, I for one would as soon manage to do without it."

"But, mamma, I don't see why success should always be rampageous."

"Literary women who have achieved a name bear their honors quietly," said Lucius.

"I don't know," said Mrs. Furnival. "I am told that some of them are as fond of gadding as the men. As regards the old maids, I don't care so much about it; people who are not married may do what they like with themselves, and nobody has any thing to say to them. But it is very different for married people. They have no business to be enticed away from their homes by any success."

"Mamma is all for a Darby and Joan life," said Sophia, laughing.

"No, I am not, my dear; and you should not say so. I don't advocate any thing that is absurd. But I do say that life should be lived at home. That is the best part of it. What is the meaning of home if it isn't that?"

Poor Mrs. Furnival! she had no idea that she was complaining to a stranger of her husband. Had any one told her so she would have declared that she was discussing general world-wide topics; but Lucius Mason, young as he was, knew that the marital shoe was pinching the lady's domestic corn, and he made haste to change the subject.

"You know my mother, Mrs. Furnival?"

Mrs. Furnival said that she had the honor of acquaintance with Lady Mason; but on this occasion also she exhibited but little fervor.

"I shall meet her up in town to-morrow," said Lucius. "She is coming up for some shopping."

"Oh! indeed," said Mrs. Furnival.

"And then we go down home together. I am to meet her at the chemist's at the top of Chancery Lane."

Now this was a very unnecessary communication on the part of young Mason, and also an unfortunate one. "Oh! indeed," said Mrs. Furnival again, throwing her head a little back. Poor woman! she could not conceal what was in her mind, and her daughter knew all about it immediately. The truth was this. Mr. Furnival had been for some days on the move, at Birmingham and elsewhere, and had now sent up sudden notice that he should probably be at home that very night. He should probably be at home that night, but in such case would be compelled to return to his friends at Birmingham on the following afternoon. Now if it were an ascertained fact that he was coming to London merely with the view of meeting Lady Mason, the wife of his bosom would not think it necessary to provide for him the warmest possible welcome. This of course was not an ascertained fact; but was there not terrible grounds of suspicion? Mr. Furnival's law-chambers were in Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, close to Chancery Lane, and Lady Mason had made her appointment with her son within five minutes' walk of that locality. And was it not in itself a strange coincidence that Lady Mason, who came to town so seldom, should now do so on the very day of Mr. Furnival's sudden return? She felt sure that they were to meet on the morrow, but yet she could not declare even to herself that it was an ascertained fact.

"Oh! indeed," she said; and Sophia understood all about it, though Lucius did not.

Then Mrs. Furnival sank into silence; and we need not follow, word for word, the conversation between the young lady and the young gentleman. Mr. Mason thought that Miss Furnival was a very nice girl, and was not at all ill pleased to have an opportunity of passing an evening in her company; and Miss Furnival thought—What she thought, or what young ladies may think generally about young gentlemen, is not to be spoken openly; but it seemed as though she also were employed to her own satisfaction, while her mother sat moody in her own arm-chair. In the course of the evening the footman in livery brought in tea, handing it round on a big silver salver, which also added to Mrs. Furnival's unhappiness. She would have liked to sit behind her tea-tray as she used to do in the good old hard-working days, with a small pile of buttered toast on the slop-bowl, kept warm by hot water below it. In those dear old hard-working days, buttered toast had been a much-loved delicacy with Furnival; and she, kind woman, had never begrudged her eyes, as she sat making it for him over the parlor fire. Nor would she have begrudged them now, neither her eyes nor the work of her hands, nor all the thoughts of her heart, if he would have consented to accept of her handiwork; but in these days Mr. Furnival had learned a relish for other delicacies.

She also had liked buttered toast, always, however, taking the pieces with the upper crust, in order that the more luscious morsels might be left for him; and she had liked to prepare her own tea leisurely, putting in slowly the sugar and cream—skimmed milk it had used to be, dropped for herself with a sparing hand, in order that his large breakfast-cup might be whitened to his liking; but though the milk had been skimmed and scanty, and though the tea itself had been put in with a sparing hand, she had then been mistress of the occasion. She had had her own way, and in stinting herself had found her own reward. But now—the tea had no flavor now that it was made in the kitchen and brought to her, cold and vapid by a man in livery whom she half feared to keep waiting while she ministered to her own wants.

And so she sat moody in her arm-chair, cross and sulky, as her daughter thought. But yet there was a vein of poetry in her heart as she sat there, little like a sibyl as she looked. Dear old days, in which her cares and solicitude were valued; in which she could do something for the joint benefit of the firm into which she had been taken as a partner! How happy she had been in her struggles, how piteously had her heart yearned toward him when she thought that he was struggling too fiercely, how brave and constant he had been; and how she had loved him as he sat steady as a rock at his grinding work! Now had come the great success of which they had both dreamed together, of which they had talked as arm in arm they were taking the exercise that was so needful to him, walking quickly round Russell Square, quickly round Bloomsbury Square and Bedford Square, and so back to the grinding work in Keppel Street. It had come now—all of which they had dreamed, and more than all they had dared to hope. But of what good was it? Was he happy? No; he was fretful, bilious, and worn with toil which was hard to him because he ate and drank too much; he was ill at ease in public, only half understanding the political life which he was obliged to assume in his new ambition; and he was sick in his conscience—she was sure that must be so: he could not thus neglect her, his loving, constant wife, without some pang of remorse. And was she happy? She might have reveled in silks and satins, if silks and satins would have done her old heart good. But they would do her no good. How she had joyed in a new dress, when it had been so hard to come by, so slow in coming, and when he would go with her to the choosing of it! But her gowns now were hardly of more interest to her than the joints of meat which the butcher brought to the door with the utmost regularity. It behooved the butcher to send good beef and the milliner to send good silk, and there was an end of it.

Not but what she could have been ecstatic about a full skirt on a smart body if he would have cared to look at it. In truth she was still soft and young enough within, though stout, and solid, and somewhat aged without. Though she looked cross and surly that night, there was soft poetry within her heart. If Providence, who had bountifully given, would now by chance mercifully take away those gifts, would she not then forgive every thing and toil for him again with the same happiness as before? Ah! yes; she could forgive every thing, any thing, if he would only return and be contented to sit opposite to her once again. "Oh, mortal Delius, dearest lord and husband!" she exclaimed within her own breast, in language somewhat differing from that of the Roman poet, "why hast thou not remembered to maintain a mind equal in prosperity as it was always equal and well-poised in adversity? Oh! my Delius, since prosperity has been too much for thee, may the Lord bless thee once more with the adversity which thou canst bear—which thou canst bear, and I with thee!" Thus did she sing sadly within her own bosom—sadly, but with true poetic cadence; while Sophia and Lucius Mason, sitting by, when for a moment they turned their eyes upon her, gave her credit only for the cross solemnity supposed to be incidental to obese and declining years.

And then there came a ring at the bell and a knock at the door, and a rush along the nether passages, and the lady knew that he of whom she had been thinking had arrived. In olden days she had ever met him in the narrow passage, and, indifferent to the maid, she had hung about his neck and kissed him in the hall. But now she did not stir from her chair. She could forgive him all and run again at the sound of his footstep, but she must first know that such forgiveness and such running would be welcome.

"That's papa," said Sophia.

"Don't forget that I have not met him since I have been home from Germany," said Lucius. "You must introduce me."

In a minute or two Mr. Furnival opened the door and walked into the room. Men when they arrive from their travels nowadays have no strippings of great-coats, no deposits to make of thick shawls and double gloves, no absolutely necessary changes of raiment. Such had been the case when he had used to come back cold and weary from the circuits; but now he had left Birmingham since dinner by the late express, had enjoyed his nap in the train for two hours or so, and walked into his own drawing-room as he might have done had he dined in his own dining-room.

"How are you, Kitty?" he said to his wife, handing to her the forefinger of his right hand by way of greeting. "Well, Sophy, my love;" and he kissed his daughter. "Oh! Lucius Mason. I am very glad to see you. I can't say I should have remembered you unless I had been told. You are very welcome in Harley Street, and I hope you will often be here."

"It's not very often he'd find you at home, Mr. Furnival," said the aggrieved wife.

"Not so often as I could wish just at present; but things will be more settled, I hope, before very long. How's your mother, Lucius?"

"She's pretty well, thank you, Sir. I've to meet her in town to-morrow, and go down home with her."

There was then silence in the room for a few seconds, during which Mrs. Furnival looked very sharply at her husband. "Oh! she's to be in town, is she?" said Mr. Furnival, after a moment's consideration. He was angry with Lady Mason at the moment for having put him into this position. Why had she told her son that she was to be up in London, thus producing conversation and tittle-tattle which made deceit on his part absolutely necessary? Lady Mason's business in London was of a nature which would not bear much open talking. She herself, in her earnest letter summoning Mr. Furnival up from Birmingham, had besought him that her visit to his chambers might not be made matter of discussion. New troubles might be coming on her, but also they might not; and she was very anxious that no one should know that she was seeking a lawyer's advice on the matter. To all this Mr. Furnival had given in his adhesion; and yet she had put it into her son's power to come to his drawing-room and chatter there of her whereabouts. For a moment or two he doubted; but at the expiration of those moments he saw that the deceit was necessary. "She's to be in town, is she?" said he. The reader will of course observe that this deceit was practiced, not as between husband and wife with reference to an assignation with a lady, but between the lawyer and the outer world with reference to a private meeting with a client. But then it is sometimes so difficult to make wives look at such matters in the right light.

"She's coming up for some shopping," said Lucius.

"Oh! indeed," said Mrs. Furnival. She would not have spoken if she could have helped it, but she could not help it; and then there was silence in the room for a minute or two, which Lucius vainly endeavored to break by a few indifferent observations to Miss Furnival. The words, however, which he uttered would not take the guise of indifferent observations, but fell flatly on their ears, and at the same time solemnly, as though spoken with the sole purpose of creating sound.

"I hope you have been enjoying yourself at Birmingham," said Mrs. Furnival.

"Enjoyed myself! I did not exactly go there for enjoyment."

"Or at Romford, where you were before?"

"Women seem to think that men have no purpose but amusement when they go about their daily work," said Mr. Furnival; and then he threw himself back in his arm-chair, and took up the last Quarterly.

Lucius Mason soon perceived that all the harmony of the evening had in some way been marred by the return of the master of the house, and that he might be in the way if he remained; he therefore took his leave.

"I shall want breakfast punctually at half past eight to-morrow morning," said Mr. Furnival, as soon as the stranger had withdrawn. "I must be in chambers before ten;" and then he took his candle and withdrew to his own room.

Sophia rang the bell and gave the servant the order; but Mrs. Furnival took no trouble in the matter whatever. In the olden days she would have bustled down before she went to bed and, have seen herself that every thing was ready, so that the master of the house might not be kept waiting. But all this was nothing to her now.

CHAPTER XII.

MR. FURNIVAL'S CHAMBERS.

MR. FURNIVAL'S chambers were on the first floor in a very dingy edifice in Old Square, Lincoln's Inn. This square was always dingy, even when it was comparatively open and served as the approach from Chancery Lane to the Lord Chancellor's Court; but now it has been built up with new shops for the Vice-Chancellor, and to my eyes it seems more dingy than ever.

He there occupied three rooms, all of them sufficiently spacious for the purposes required, but which were made oppressive by their general dinginess and by a smell of old leather which pervaded them. In one of them sat at his desk Mr. Crabwitz, a gentleman who had now been with Mr. Furnival for the last fifteen years, and who considered that no inconsiderable portion of the barrister's success had been attributable to his own energy and genius. Mr. Crabwitz was a genteel-looking man, somewhat over forty years of age, very careful as to his gloves, hat, and umbrella, and not a little particular as to his associates. As he was unmarried, fond of ladies' society, and presumed to be a warm man in money matters, he had his social successes, and looked down from a considerable altitude on some men who from their professional rank might have been considered as his superiors. He had a small bachelor's box down at Barnes, and not unfrequently went abroad in the vacations. The door opening into the room of Mr. Crabwitz was in the corner fronting you on the left-hand side as you entered the chambers. Immediately on your left was a large waiting-room, in which an additional clerk usually sat at an ordinary table. He was not an authorized part of the establishment, being kept only from week to week; but nevertheless, for the last two or three years he had been always there, and Mr. Crabwitz intended that he should remain, for he acted as fag to Mr. Crabwitz. This waiting-room was very dingy, much more so than the clerk's room, and boasted of no furniture but eight old leathern chairs and two old tables. It was surrounded by shelves which were laden with books and dust, which by no chance were ever disturbed. But to my ideas the most dingy of the three rooms was that large one in which the great man himself sat; the door of which directly fronted you as you entered. The furniture was probably better than that in the other chambers, and the place had certainly the appearance of warmth and life which comes from frequent use; but nevertheless, of all the rooms in which I ever sat I think it was the most gloomy. There were heavy curtains to the windows, which had once been ruby but were now brown; and the ceiling was brown, and the thick carpet was brown, and the books which covered every portion of the wall were brown, and the painted wood-work of the doors and windows was of a dark brown. Here, on the morning with which we have now to deal, sat Mr. Furnival over his papers from ten to twelve, at which latter hour Lady Mason was to come to him. The holidays of Mr. Crabwitz had this year been cut short in consequence of his patron's attendance at the great congress which was now sitting, and although all London was a desert, as he had piteously complained to a lady of his acquaintance whom he had left at Boulogne, he was there in the midst of the desert, and on this morning was sitting in attendance at his usual desk.

Why Mr. Furnival should have breakfasted by himself at half past eight in order that he might be at his chambers at ten, seeing that the engagement for which he had come to town was timed for twelve, I will not pretend to say. He did not ask his wife to join him, and consequently she did not come down till her usual time. Mr. Furnival breakfasted by himself, and at ten o'clock he was in his chambers. Though alone for two hours he was not idle, and exactly at twelve Mr. Crabwitz opened his door and announced Lady Mason.

When we last parted with her after her interview with Sir Peregrine Orme, she had resolved not to communicate with her friend the lawyer—at any rate, not to do so immediately. Thinking on that resolve she had tried to sleep that night; but her mind was altogether disturbed, and she could get no rest. What if after twenty years of tranquillity all her troubles must now be recommenced? What if the battle were again to be fought—with such termination as the chances of war might send to her? Why was it that she was so much greater a coward now than she had been then? Then she had expected defeat, for her friends had bade her not to be sanguine; but in spite of that she had borne up and gone gallantly through the ordeal. But now she felt that if Orley Farm were hers to give she would sooner abandon it than renew the contest. Then, at that former period of her life, she had prepared her mind to do or die in the cause. She had wrought herself up for the work, and had carried it through. But having done that work, having accomplished her terrible task, she had hoped that rest might be in store for her.

As she rose from her bed on the morning after her interview with Sir Peregrine, she determined that she would seek counsel from him in whose counsel she could trust. Sir Peregrine's friendship was more valuable to her than that of Mr. Furnival, but a word of advice from Mr. Furnival was worth all the spoken wisdom of the baronet, ten times over. Therefore she wrote her letter, and proposed an appointment; and Mr. Furnival, tempted as I have said by some evil spirit to stray after strange goddesses in these his blue-nosed days, had left his learned brethren at their congress in Birmingham, and had hurried up to town to assist the widow. He had left that congress, though the wisest Rustums of the law from all the civilized countries of Europe were there assembled, with Boanerges at their head, that great, old, valiant, learned, British Rustum, inquiring with energy, solemnity, and caution, with much shaking of ponderous heads and many sarcasms from those which were not ponderous, whether any and what changes might be made in the modes of answering that great question, "Guilty or not guilty?" and that other equally great question, "Is it meum or is it tuum?" To answer which question justly should be the end and object of every lawyer's work. There were great men there from Paris, very capable, the Ulpian, Tribonian, and Papinian of the new empire, armed with the purest sentiments expressed in antithetical and magniloquent phrases, ravishing to the ears, and armed also with a code which, taken in its integrity, would necessarily, as the logical consequence of its clauses, drive all injustice from the face of the earth. And there were great practitioners from Germany, men very skilled in the use of questions, who profess that the tongue of man, if adequately skillful, may always prevail on guilt to disclose itself; who believe in the power of their own craft to produce truth, as our forefathers believed in torture; and sometimes with the same result. And of course all that was great on the British bench, and all that was famous at the British bar was there—men very unlike their German brethren, men who thought that guilt never should be asked to tell of itself—men who were customarily but unconsciously shocked whenever unwary guilt did tell of itself. Men these were, mostly of high and noble feeling, born and bred to live with upright hearts and clean hands, but taught by the peculiar tenets of their profession to think that that which was high and noble in their private intercourse with the world need not also be so esteemed in their legal practice. And there were Italians there, good-humored, joking, easy fellows, who would laugh their clients in and out of their difficulties; and Spaniards, very grave and serious, who doubted much in their minds whether justice might not best be bought and sold; and our brethren from the United States were present also, very eager to show that in this country, law, and justice also, were clouded and nearly buried beneath their wig and gown.

All these and all this did Mr. Furnival desert for the space of twenty-four hours in order that he might comply with the request of Lady Mason. Had she known what it was that she was calling on him to leave, no doubt she would have borne her troubles for another week—for another fortnight—till those Rustums at Birmingham had brought their labors to a close. She would not have robbed the English bar of one of the warmest supporters of its present mode of practice, even for a day, had she known how much that support was needed at the present moment.

But she had not known; and Mr. Furnival, moved by her woman's plea, had not been hard enough in his heart to refuse her.

When she entered the room she was dressed very plainly, as was her custom, and a thick veil covered her face; but still she was dressed with care. There was nothing of the dowdiness of the lone, lorn woman about her; none of that lanky, washed-out appearance which sorrow and trouble so often give to females. Had she given way to dowdiness, or suffered herself to be, as it were, washed out, Mr. Furnival, we may say, would not have been there to meet her—of which fact Lady Mason was perhaps aware.

"I am so grateful to you for this trouble," she said, as she raised her veil, and while he pressed her hand between both his own. "I can only ask you to believe that I would not have troubled you unless I had been greatly troubled myself."

Mr. Furnival, as he placed her in an arm-chair by the fireside, declared his sorrow that she should be in grief, and then he took the other arm-chair himself, opposite to her, or rather close to her—much closer to her than he ever now seated himself to Mrs. F. "Don't speak of my trouble," said he; "it is nothing if I can do any thing to relieve you." But though he was so tender, he did not omit to tell her of her folly in having informed her son that she was to be in London. "And have you seen him?" asked Lady Mason.

"He was in Harley Street with the ladies last night. But it does not matter. It is only for your sake that I speak, as I know that you wish to keep this matter private. And now let us hear what it is. I can not think that there can be any thing which need really cause you trouble." And he again took her hand—that he might encourage her. Lady Mason let him keep her hand for a minute or so, as though she did not notice it; and yet as she turned her eyes to him it might appear that his tenderness had encouraged her.

Sitting there thus, with her hand in his—with her hand in his during the first portion of the tale—she told him all that she wished to tell. Something more she told now to him than she had done to Sir Peregrine. "I learned from her," she said, speaking about Mrs. Dockwrath and her husband, "that he had found out something about dates which the lawyers did not find out before."

"Something about dates," said Mr. Furnival, looking with all his eyes into the fire. "You do not know what about dates?"

"No; only this; that he said that the lawyers in Bedford Row—"

"Round and Crook."

"Yes; he said that they were idiots not to have found it out before; and then he went off to Groby Park. He came back last night; but of course I have not seen her since."

By this time Mr. Furnival had dropped the hand, and was sitting still, meditating, looking earnestly at the fire while Lady Mason was looking earnestly at him. She was trying to gather from his face whether he had seen signs of danger, and he was trying to gather from her words whether there might really be cause to apprehend danger. How was he to know what was really inside her mind; what were her actual thoughts and inward reasonings on this subject; what private knowledge she might have which was still kept back from him? In the ordinary intercourse of the world, when one man seeks advice from another, he who is consulted demands in the first place that he shall be put in possession of all the circumstances of the case. How else will it be possible that he should give advice? But in matters of law it is different. If I, having committed a crime, were to confess my criminality to the gentleman engaged to defend me, might he not be called on to say: "Then, O my friend, confess it also to the judge; and so let justice be done. Ruat cœlum, and the rest of it?" But who would pay a lawyer for counsel such as that?

In this case there was no question of payment. The advice to be given was to a widowed woman from an experienced man of the world; but nevertheless he could only make his calculations as to her peculiar case in the way in which he ordinarily calculated. Could it be possible that any thing had been kept back from him? Were there facts unknown to him, but known to her, which would be terrible, fatal, damning to his sweet friend if proved before all the world? He could not bring himself to ask her, but yet it was so material that he should know! Twenty years ago, at the time of the trial, he had at one time thought—it hardly matters to tell what, but those thoughts had not been favorable to her cause. Then his mind had altered, and he had learned—as lawyers do learn—to believe in his own case. And when the day of triumph had come, he had triumphed loudly, commiserating his dear friend for the unjust suffering to which she had been subjected, and speaking in no low or modified tone as to the grasping, greedy cruelty of that man of Groby Park. Nevertheless, through it all, he had felt that Round and Crook had not made the most of their case.

And now he sat, thinking, not so much whether or no she had been in any way guilty with reference to that will, as whether the counsel he should give her ought in any way to be based on the possibility of her having been thus guilty. Nothing might be so damning to her cause as that he should make sure of her innocence, if she were not innocent; and yet he would not ask her the question. If innocent, why was it that she was now so much moved, after twenty years of quiet possession?

"It was a pity," he said, at last, "that Lucius should have disturbed that fellow in the possession of his fields."

"It was; it was!" she said. "But I did not think it possible that Miriam's husband should turn against me. Would it be wise, do you think, to let him have the land again?"

"No, I do not think that. It would be telling him, and telling others also, that you are afraid of him. If he have obtained any information that may be considered of value by Joseph Mason, he can sell it at a higher price than the holding of these fields is worth."

"Would it be well—?" She was asking a question and then checked herself.

"Would what be well?"

"I am so harassed that I hardly know what I am saying. Would it be wise, do you think, if I were to pay him any thing, so as to keep him quiet?"

"What; buy him off, you mean?"

"Well, yes—if you call it so. Give him some sum of money in compensation for his land; and on the understanding, you know—" And then she paused.

"That depends on what he may have to sell," said Mr. Furnival, hardly daring to look at her.

"Ah; yes," said the widow. And then there was another pause.

"I do not think that that would be at all discreet," said Mr. Furnival. "After all, the chances are that it is all moonshine."

"You think so?"

"Yes; I can not but think so. What can that man possibly have found among the old attorney's papers that may be injurious to your interests?"

"Ah! I do not know; I understand so little of these things. At the time they told me—you told me that the law might possibly go against my boy's rights. It would have been bad then, but it would be ten times more dreadful now."

"But there were many questions capable of doubt then which were definitively settled at the trial. As to your husband's intellect on that day, for instance."

"There could be no doubt as to that."

"No; so it has been proved; and they will not raise that point again. Could he possibly have made a later will?"

"No; I am sure he did not. Had he done so it could not have been found among Mr. Usbech's papers; for, as far as I remember, the poor man never attended to any business after that day."

"What day?"

"The 14th of July, the day on which he was with Sir Joseph."

It was singular, thought the barrister, with how much precision she remembered the dates and circumstances. That the circumstances of the trial should be fresh on her memory was not wonderful; but how was it that she knew so accurately things which had occurred before the trial—when no trial could have been expected? But as to this he said nothing.

"And you are sure he went to Groby Park?"

"Oh, yes; I have no doubt of it. I am quite sure."

"I do not know that we can do any thing but wait. Have you mentioned this to Sir Peregrine?" It immediately occurred to Lady Mason's mind that it would be by no means expedient, even if it were possible, to keep Mr. Furnival in ignorance of any thing that she really did ; and she therefore explained that she had seen Sir Peregrine. "I was so troubled at the first moment that I hardly knew where to turn," she said.

"You were quite right to go to Sir Peregrine."

"I am so glad you are not angry with me as to that."

"And did he say any thing—any thing particular?"

"He promised that he would not desert me, should there be any new difficulty."

"That is well. It is always good to have the countenance of such a neighbor as he is."

"And the advice of such a friend as you are." And she again put out her hand to him.

"Well, yes. It is my trade, you know, to give advice," and he smiled as he took it.

"How should I live through such troubles without you?"

"We lawyers are very much abused nowadays," said Mr. Furnival, thinking of what was going on down at Birmingham at that very moment ; "but I hardly know how the world would get on without us."

"Ah! but all lawyers are not like you."

"Some perhaps worse, and a great many much better. But, as I was saying, I do not think I would take any steps at present. The man Dockwrath is a vulgar, low-minded, revengeful fellow ; and I would endeavor to forget him."

"Ah, if I could!"

"And why not? What can he possibly have learned to your injury?" And then as it seemed to Lady Mason that Mr. Furnival expected some reply to this question, she forced herself to give him one. "I suppose that he can not know any thing."

"I tell you what I might do," said Mr. Furnival, who was still musing. "Round himself is not a bad fellow, and I am acquainted with him. He was the junior partner in that house at the time of the trial, and I know that he persuaded Joseph Mason not to appeal to the Lords. I will contrive, if possible, to see him. I shall be able to learn from him at any rate whether any thing is being done."

"And then if I hear that there is not, I shall be comforted."

"Of course ; of course."

"But if there is—"

"I think there will be nothing of the sort," said Mr. Furnival, leaving his seat as he spoke.

"But if there is—I shall have your aid?" and she slowly rose from her chair as she spoke.

Mr. Furnival gave her a promise of this, as Sir Peregrine had done before ; and then with her handkerchief to her eyes she thanked him. Her tears were not false, as Mr. Furnival well saw ; and seeing that she wept, and seeing that she was beautiful, and feeling that in her grief and in her beauty she had come to him for aid, his heart was softened toward her, and he put out his arms as though he would take her to his heart—as a daughter. "Dearest friend," he said, "trust me that no harm shall come to you."

"I will trust you," she said, gently stopping the motion of his arm. "I will trust you altogether. And when you have seen Mr. Round, shall I hear from you?"

At this moment, as they were standing close together, the door opened, and Mr. Crabwitz introduced another lady—who indeed had advanced so quickly toward the door of Mr. Furnival's room that the clerk had been hardly able to reach it before her.

"Mrs. Furnival, if you please, Sir," said Mr. Crabwitz.

MARGARET FULLER OSSOLI.

NOTWITHSTANDING all that has been written on this eminent woman, we think that her life and genius are not yet exhausted of their import or their interest.

Few of our readers need to be informed who Margaret Fuller was, but for the sake even of these few, we give a sketch of her biography.

She was born on May 23, 1810, at Cambridgeport, near Boston. Her father, Timothy Fuller, was a man of various acquirements. He was able at the bar, was estimable as a member of Congress, and particularly, though unostentatiously, distinguished as a classical scholar. "My father," says Margaret, "was a lawyer and a politician. He was a man largely endowed with that sagacious energy which the state of New England society for the last half century has been well fitted to develop." "My father," she says again, "was a man of business, even in literature ; he had been a high scholar at college, and was warmly attached to all he had learned there, both from the pleasure he had derived in the exercise of his faculties and the associated memories of success and good repute. He was well read in French literature, and in English a Queen Anne's man. He hoped to make me the heir of all he knew, and of as much more as the income of his profession enabled him to give me the means of acquiring." Naturally, therefore, she became an early student, and progressively, a reflective thinker and reader. As a thinker, she entered into the spirit of modern philosophy ; as a reader, she mastered, in their respective languages, the earlier and the later literatures. When about twenty-five years of age she lost her father. The cares of life then, for herself and kindred, came thick upon her, and with a laborious head and a loving heart she undertook them. Nobly, most faithfully, she undertook them and fulfilled them. She first labored as a teacher in Boston, then in Providence, Rhode Island, and last of all, she took to literature for a living. She contributed to periodicals, translated from German, and held learned prelections, which in Boston, then the centre of the so-called transcendentalists, were called "Conversations." Conversations indeed! Two persons, we suppose, are needed to a contract, a bargain, a marriage, and a conversation! But in these high talkings no person spoke but Margaret herself, and no one else durst, or at least, cared to interrupt her.

Her principal contributions to periodical literature were furnished to the Dial in 1840, and afterward to the New York Tribune. Her department in each was that of æsthetic thought and criticism. Perhaps it is a blunder to mark this as a department in the Dial, where it may be said to have made the whole. We modify the statement, therefore, and say, she popularized philosophy in the Dial, and philosophized on literature in the Tribune. Yet her writings in the Tribune were broad and simple compared with her writings in the Dial. Still, as compared with the matter and manner of a daily newspaper, her Tribune articles seem to have a recluse and learned air. The only complete volumes which she published consisted of "Summer on the Lakes," and "Woman in the Nineteenth Century."

She left New York for Europe in the spring of 1846. She was in England received with confidence and hospitality into the best literary society of London and Paris. Her letters show, that while she was generously alive to the worth of the eminent persons with whom she associated, she was not blinded by their brilliancy or insensible to their defects—their defects, we mean, as authors, artists, or public characters; for she holds in sacred regard that privacy of personal and domestic life of which no stranger, friend, or guest is entitled to take notes, much less to print them. After a sojourn in London and Paris she journeyed on through Italy, and settled finally in Rome. The whole of her life after this period becomes in every sense a romance, closing in a most desolate and dismal romance. In the confusion of a Roman crowd coming out from vespers at St. Peters, a young stranger, the Marquis Ossoli, rescued her from struggle and embarrassment. Having seen her home, an acquaintance began, which from quick sympathy soon deepened into love, and love was made complete in marriage. The marriage took place December, 1847, and for family reasons, on the side of the young nobleman, the marriage was kept secret. The result was the birth of a son.

In the mean while the revolution of 1848 broke out. It became rapidly European. No European people embraced it with more ardor than the Italians; an ardor that, in Rome, arose to the most determined and daring enthusiasm. Margaret Fuller was a Roman nature; now, by marriage, she was a Roman matron; and no Roman matron of old and heroic times could have excelled her in devotion to the cause of Roman glory, liberty, and independence. Her husband shared her spirit, but could not possibly transcend it. Contrary to the temper and tradition of his family, he threw himself into the movement with all his might; and, of course, suffered all the loss which, in the reaction, came to the defeated liberals. As Ossoli did all that man and strength could do, Margaret did all that woman and heart could do, ay, and head likewise. She nursed in the hospitals, she comforted, she counseled—nay, though fondest of mothers, she was willing for a time even to forget her sucking child. She seemed to fear no danger, to shrink from no labor, and in risk or toil was as unpretending as she was brave. At length all the grand and mighty hopes of the patriots were beaten down, and in their place came disappointments and despondency. Courage had done its utmost, but force and counter-revolution left courage now no more that it could do, except it might be to prophesy and wait. If Margaret foresaw and prophesied, she was not destined to behold any approach to fulfillment.

After leaving Rome, she spent, with her husband and child, a winter in Florence. Toward spring she began, with many sad and strange forebodings, to arrange for the passage to America. Her letters about this time are full of hesitation, doubt, and melancholy. She alludes frequently to losses at sea and shipwrecks. But having, at length, decided to venture herself and treasures in the bark Elizabeth, she writes: "Safety is not to be secured by the wisest foresight. I shall embark more composedly in our merchant ship, praying fervently, indeed, that it may not be my lot to lose my boy at sea, either by unsolaced illness or amidst the howling waves; or if so, that Ossoli, Angelo, and I may go together, and that the anguish may be brief." Once again she writes: "I have a vague expectation of some crisis—I know not what. But it has long seemed that, in the year 1850, I should stand on a plateau in the ascent of life, where I should be allowed to pause for a while and take more clear and commanding views than ever before. Yet my life proceeds as regularly as the fates of a Greek tragedy, and I can but accept the pages as they turn."

Still uncertain and desponding, she, with her husband, child, and a young Italian girl, on the 17th of May, 1850, entered the ship Elizabeth, commanded by Captain Hasty. Early in the passage the captain died of small-pox. The child caught the disease, and was for a time in mortal danger. The weather was tempestuous—at Gibraltar there was delay—thenceforward, struggle and slow sailing. At length the vessel reached America, only to be broken on the coast of Fire Island beach, Long Island—within a few fathoms of the shore—and almost within hand-reach of numbers who were too busy with their work of inhuman plunder to think of any plan for saving their perishing fellow-creatures. The ship struck about 4 o'clock on the morning of July 19th, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon all was over. The catastrophe of Margaret's Greek tragedy was complete in the shattered ship amidst the boiling waves—it was as grand as grief and gloom could make it; and if broken hearts and broken hopes can move to pity, no ideal tragedy had ever a catastrophe more pathetic than this actual one.

There are wonderful touches of tenderness and bravery in this twelve-hours' drama of agony.

"We must die," said Horace Sumner and Mrs. Hasty to each other, meeting in the cabin and clasping hands; "let us die calmly, then." "I hope so, Mrs. Hasty," said Mr. Sumner. "At first, Nino, alarmed at the uproar, the darkness, and the rushing water, while shivering with the wet, cried passionately; but soon his mother, wrapping him in such garments as were at hand and folding him to her bosom, sang him to sleep. Celeste, too, was in an agony of terror till Ossoli, with soothing words and a long and fervent prayer, restored her to self-control and trust. Then calmly they rested side by side, exchanging kindly partings, and sending messages to friends, if any should survive to be their bearer."

Generous efforts were made to persuade Margaret to try the chances of safety to which some had trusted, and which had been successful. But she would take no merely individual chance. She must have surety for life or death with those who were near and dear to her. She would not risk even the possibility of separation: in life or death they must be all united. At last the steward grasped Angelino, and tried to save him, but both were thrown dead upon the beach. In the final crash, Ossoli and Celeste clung for a while in the rigging, but Margaret sank at once. "When last seen, she had been seated at the foot of the foremast, still clad in her white night-dress, with her hair fallen loose upon her shoulders." "It was a touching coincidence," observes a writer, "that the only one of Margaret's treasures which reached the shore was the lifeless body of Angelino. When the body, stripped of every rag by the waves, was rescued from the surf, a sailor took it reverently in his arms, and wrapping it in his neckcloth, bore it to the nearest house. There, when washed and dressed in a child's frock, found in Margaret's trunk, it was laid upon a bed; and as the rescued seamen gathered round their late play-fellow and pet, there were few dry eyes in the circle. Several of them mourned for Nino as if he had been their own; and even the callous wreckers were softened for the moment by a sight so full of pathetic beauty." And with this child of her blood went also into oblivion the child of her brain—her book on Italy, in which we should have had the maturest product of her genius. And this great loss, we have, probably, to charge, not on the ravage of the sea, but on the cruel greed of men. The miscreants that rifled her trunk were those, it is likely, who destroyed her manuscripts, which might serve as evidence against them in a prosecution for robbery.

In closing our brief narrative of these impressive events, we have only one remark to make on the pathetic consistency of fate which belonged to all that concerned this very extraordinary woman. The word "fragmentary" seems best to characterize all that related to her. Her early education was severe yet not harmonious. Her self-culture was earnest and deep, yet it does not appear to have been systematic or continuous. She had constant interruptions in all her pursuits and purposes; she was taxed and over-taxed with responsibility and toil. She had no time to mature, compact, or concentrate her powers. She had to think from hand to mouth, and from day to day. Accordingly, her compositions are but broken and detached efforts. It is really painful to read her modest but longing desires for an income of six hundred dollars a year, that she might remain in Italy in order to perfect herself in the study of its art and literature, and to know that her wishes could not be gratified. The pain is increased when we consider that persons of both sexes, incomparably her inferiors, could gather as many thousands easily as the hundreds which she vainly coveted. Had she lived and taken to the rostrum as women are now doing—as they have a full right to do, if so they choose—she might have had dollars to her heart's content, for Margaret was a born orator; and there is no Lyceum talker, big or little, male or female, white, black, or brown, that she would not, with the genius of her surprising eloquence, have shot beyond as a rifle does a pop-gun. Her time was frittered, and, worst of all, it was not, even as to money, profitably frittered. And her great heart, too, battling long amidst conflicting aspirations, was at last silenced, when it had found its highest action and its noblest rest. She coveted love with immeasurable desire; she met with love, she gave it the magnitude of her own massive and impassioned character; and before satiety, or deception, or the loss of glorious illusions came to disappoint her, she died and disappeared—died and disappeared amidst the roaring breakers and the tossing pieces of the sea-torn ship. The tragedy had an appropriate catastrophe.

The after-drama corresponds with the doom of Margaret's life and death. She has had a fragmentary biography. It is a "thing of shreds and patches"—part of it by herself, and portions by her friends. Instead of thus sharing the work, some one writer should have singly done it. It was a grievous mistake to deal thus with her noble memory; it was a sad coincidence that affection and admiration should seem to deal with her living spirit as the pitiless waves did with her mortal frame. The work ought not to have been done piece-meal, but in the unity and completeness of intelligence and love. The story was a "simple story," and should have been simply told. Then we would have had the distinct and clear personality of an admirable woman's soul, and not a broken life commemorated in a broken monument. We lay no blame to the writers. All of them held Margaret in their choicest thoughts; but the method was a mistake, and we trust it may never be imitated.

Though of mature years, Margaret's life was incomplete—her genius undeveloped. Up to the time of her marriage she was restless, uncertain, undecided, vague, and visionary: she had not yet attained to the peace which brings forth ripest power. We do not, therefore, know her, as, had she lived, we should probably have known her. Her efforts had been little more than preparatory exercises. In her work on Italy we should have had the first elaborate effort of her genius; and this, it is likely, would have been the beginning of her real literary life. These are considerations which the critic, who judges Margaret fairly, must keep in mind: he must decide on her genius, not so much by what it accomplished as by what it promised. This may seem an unreasonable demand in respect to an author that did not die young; but to those who estimate justly the circumstances in which she lived and wrote it will not appear so: especially, it will not appear so to those who must have noticed in Margaret's advancing course a growing calmness of character and of force.

The first time the writer ever met Margaret is connected in his mind with memorable associations. It was nearly twenty years ago. Charles Dickens was on a visit to America. We were invited to a large party in Boston, of which he was the foremost guest—"the mould of form, the glass of fashion, and the observed of all observers." We had a word, or, it may be, a few words with the genial hero of the evening, and then we were introduced to Miss Fuller. She sat dreamily and quietly in a corner, with head half bent and drooping eyes. We took a chair near her. She simply permitted it. We said a few ordinary words. She quietly replied. Her mood was cool; her tones were low; her phrases were formal; and, to say the least, her influence on us was not exciting or encouraging. And yet it was, in some unexplainable way, attractive. At that time we were young and strange in Boston society, and knew nothing of its celebrities. We were, therefore, entirely ignorant of Miss Fuller's local and literary distinction. But we were not long ignorant that we were in the presence of one whose "mind her kingdom was." From word to word she grew warmer and warmer, until her whole spirit seemed to burn and to shine. Still her manner was quiet, her voice subdued. She did not so much converse as "think aloud." It was more monologue than dialogue—for we were all but silent. "Things old and new" were brought out easily from a wonderfully rich treasury, and the old things and the new were made with a subtle enchantment to fit each other. The results of reading in all great literatures and philosophies melted in, naturally and unpedantically, with the news of the day or the suggestion of the moment. There was no loudness, no impetuosity, no obtrusive urgency, no aggressive emphasis; but there was what seemed to us almost a miracle of utterance in such a play of thought, fancy, feeling, learning, and imagination as we had never heard before—as we never hope to hear again. Yet we had heard fine talkers. We had, ourselves, in a small way, obtained some credit for that sort of exercise. But this was of such surpassing power as not only to humble our vanity but to dispel the glory of our memories. It was at first strange and startling, but before it ended it was a delight as well as a marvel: it was the most complete union of surprise and pleasure that our experience can recall.

Shortly after this we were, on a Sunday evening, in a friend's drawing-room conversing quietly with the lady of the house. Miss Fuller came in unexpectedly. She had been to hear Father Taylor, the famous sailor-preacher of Boston. She began at once to describe the sermon, and went on for half an hour in a continued strain of rapture. If the preacher were as eloquent as his reporter was, it is a pity that the sermon is lost to the world. But though there were only three of us, we had not from her the slightest recognition. We were neither wounded nor offended, but attributed the seeming neglect to absence of mind or peculiarity of character. Occasionally, once or twice, we met her in the society of New York. We did not converse with her, but observed that, without sacrificing any of her mental or moral independence, she appeared to cultivate more and more the spirit of patience and of conciliation. The last time we met her was in one of the New York streets. She stopped us of her own accord, and was gracious and gentle exceedingly. She told us she was going to Europe; and knowing that we had some relations with England, inquired, in the kindest manner, in what way she could there do us service. Never again did we see her with the seeing of the eye, though much we heard of her with the hearing of the ear.

The general idea of Margaret Fuller, so far as we could learn it from her friends or critics, has been that of a person distinguished by surprising intellectuality. This, we confess, has not been our idea. We admit that Margaret Fuller had a fine intellect; for without vigor of intellect there can be no impressive power of any kind. But as compared with the higher order of minds—and this is the only comparison which would be just to a thinker of her rank—her pre-eminence is not in the intellect. We think that belongs to her moral nature. In saying this we consider that we award her superlative praise. At all events, in saying it we express our honest opinion and conviction.

She had a profound consciousness of the moral life in all its worth and its reality. This consciousness was not a mere ethical apprehension of right and wrong, and a formal admission of the claims of duty. It was in her a spiritual conviction, was inseparable from her faith in the infinite and the immortal, and was as deep as her own deep nature. This characteristic appeared very early in the terrible remorse which she experienced for the commission of a childish fault. The bitterness of her repentance showed the depth of her moral feeling; and the permanent change which followed her contrition proved that it was radical and thorough. That moral inspiration—nourished by mystical philosophy and religious sentiment—was the force which worked the most deeply in her character we have decisive evidence, alike in her conduct and in her writings.

As that which is deep is also strong, so was it with Margaret Fuller. Her nature was not only one of earnestness and purpose, it was also one of power and of passion. These, as was well for society and her own womanhood, took the side of goodness, of humanity, and of the right. By temperament vehement, intense, and fearless, she gave herself with all her might to whatever she considered to be the cause of truth or of justice. She had formed the ideal of a true life with an aspiring elevation of soul; she loved the ideal with all her heart, and with the sincere purpose of a vigorous will she endeavored to bring the actual of her own life into correspondence with her ideal. In all this there was no sentimentalism, but principle and reality. It was with her no matter of cheap rhetoric, or of fine declamation; it was a matter of conscience and of practice. She was always thoroughly in earnest, and hated compromise and concealment. What she thought she ought to do, she did; what she thought she ought to say, she said. She did not falsify with herself or others. Her genuine motive she put into her actions and her words. She had to earn bread for herself and others; but she would herself starve, or let them starve, sooner than she would be untrue. She was, accordingly, by that social body which thinks itself the "body representative" of all common sense, voted "singular," "odd," "arrogant," "self-sufficient," "self-conceited," "the leader of strong-minded individuals," who wore blue stockings and female vesture. This by such she was considered to be, and nothing more. The verdict was practically an ostracism from the drawing-room "House of Ladies," and the dancing-room "House of Commons"—if we take the liberty to conceive of a female fashionable parliament in America analogous to the masculine political parliament in England. But though Margaret did not underrate the drawing-room, and was meet to be the highest peeress there—though she idealized dancing, and rhapsodized on it most eloquently—she would not have given up a whit of her real personality to have been the empress of the salon or the idol of the ball. She lived her own life as best she could, and in living it she endeavored to live the right. She told the truth when and where she considered she ought to tell it; and come what might, she acted out the conduct to which her conscience urged her. We do not in these statements make ourselves in the least accountable for her ideas of ethics or action; we simply give our impressions of her own worth of character.

Few words in our language are so full of significance as the term "honesty," yet from most of us it has, practically, the poorest and the most superficial interpretation. It seems as if, generally, it meant no more than so much avoidance of lying and stealing as saves people from social ignominy or from legal penalties. But the import of the word "honesty" coincides with the whole of the moral life—not less to inward motive than to outward action—not more to deeds and dealings than to thoughts and words. The saying, therefore, of Hamlet to Polonius—"To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand"—has in it much humiliating suggestiveness. What the ratio may be in respect to women we can not venture critically to determine. Taking, however, the whole average of human character, and the best meaning of the term, we believe that the honesty of women indefinitely surpasses that of men. We say this in spite of all that ancient satires and modern sneers would imply to the contrary. And yet a woman who dares to be herself has more to fear from women than a man who dares to be himself has to fear from men. Such is the fact. If we cared, and if space allowed, we could state the reason; but we leave our readers with their own philosophy to find it out. Margaret Fuller dared always to be herself, and with a complete integrity of character and of personality, she was honest with the truest honesty of man or woman. We have said that much was fragmentary in the circumstances, culture, and authorship of Margaret Fuller; but in her moral life there was perfect unity. So we observe it to have been in her work-day world-life, and in her ideal and literary life. In this latter, particularly, there was that which writers do not seem always to consider a portion of the moral code—we mean intellectual honesty. Writing was not with her a trade, but a mission. Mr. Charles Reade would consider this very ridiculous; yet we believe that to be sent into the world to bring forth imaginings and thinkings, noble aspirations and generous incitements, deserves some other designation than that which applies to making boots, making books, or even making money. In this view of her vocation, Margaret begins by being honest with herself. She may not, in this respect, have been humble, but she was strictly honest. She made an estimate of her faculties and talents. Some consider it an overestimate. Perhaps it was. Still, it was made with singleness of mind, and with no deceivingness that selfishness inspired. If, as we have learned to know Margaret Fuller, the "ME" sometimes appears offensively prominent, let us, before we condemn, consider the manner in which we have received the impression. In the first place, we have it from secret journals, which, it is probable, were never meant for the public; and, secondly, we have it from the exposure of confidential correspondence and the reports of intimate conversations. Inelegant and indiscreet as it may have been to have exposed many crude and exaggerated ideas of herself, it yet shows us the very honesty of the woman. She set down thoughts of herself as candidly as she did thoughts of others; she spoke of herself as candidly as she spoke of others; and if the judgment was frequently on her own side rather than on theirs, the judgment may also have been true. If it was frequently an error, it was an error for which not many have any right to condemn her. Had Margaret lived, she would, we apprehend, have had reason to alter several of her earlier self-judgments. As it was, she grew in humility with the growth of years, of experience, and of self-knowledge. But, after all, is it a great sin for a big soul to have a consciousness of its bigness? It may be ungentle; it may be unpolite; it may be a want of Christian meekness; it may be, as Mrs. Partington would say, positively wicked to speak out the consciousness; but it is none the less there. It is better and wiser, indeed, to keep silent on the matter, and simply make it manifest in works. There will be no fear then that others will mistake. Nobody will mistake Tom Thumb in regimentals for a grenadier in the Guards. Yet throw daylight into the spiritual interior of the smallest soul, and you will see that it appears to itself equal to the biggest. It was in such an illusion that an unfortunate frog, in ancient story, fancying that he had within him the natural dimensions of an ox, burst his carcass in the endeavor to develop them. Fortunately, mental wind or gas can not shatter souls as physical inflation can bodies, or there would be an alarming number of intellectual explosions.

Margaret had none of that pride which apes humility. She felt that she had a superior mind, and she did not pretend to conceal her feeling. But if she gave more than due value to talent in herself or in others, she made no mistake as to the true and honorable uses to which talent should be consecrated. No writings more than hers show a more vital identity of literary composition with individual character and conviction. She appears to have had none of that art which, in the department of letters, is not uncommon—to have one opinion, and to say another. The idea which was in her mind she gave, according to her manner, exactly in words. Nothing can be in purpose more truthful than her compositions, in letter or in spirit. We could not find in the whole of them a single instance of aught that is mean, personal, rancorous, or spiteful. The pen, as her candid and courageous spirit moved it, was a wand of glorious enchantment; it was an instrument of conjuration to whatever is humane, beautiful, just, and good. Very decisively, indeed, she praised and blamed: but in her praise there was naught that was fulsome or ignoble; in her blame there was naught that was sardonic or malignant. What she thought of the character or the subject, that she said; and yet, whether she eulogized or denounced, she seemed always to be guided in her judgments by intellectual truthfulness and a loving heart. Those whom she most admired she could censure with a brave decision; those whom she disliked she applauded when applaud honestly she could. To her truthfulness in spirit, word, and deed, her whole life bears witness. It might seem enough to refer to this, as recorded by others and embodied in her writings. Still, it is pleasant to read in distinct form the decision of one noble mind on another noble mind. For the sake of such pleasure, as well as for the testimony which they bear to Margaret's worth, we quote a few passages from the contribution which Mr. Emerson made to her composite biography.

"Margaret," he writes, "crowned all her talents and virtues with a love of truth and the power to speak it. In great and small matters she was a woman of her word, and gave those who conversed with her the unspeakable comfort which flows from plain dealing." As was natural to such a character, Margaret's moral courage was equal to her honesty and truthfulness. "I have had from an eye-witness," says Mr. Emerson, "a note of a little scene that passed in Boston at the Academy of Music. A party had gone early and taken an excellent place to hear one of Beethoven's symphonies. Just behind them were soon seated a young lady and two gentlemen, who made incessant buzzing in spite of bitter looks cast on them by the whole neighborhood and destroyed all the musical comfort. After all was over, Margaret leaned across one seat and, catching the eye of this girl, who was pretty and well dressed, said in her blindest, gentlest voice: 'May I speak with you one moment?' 'Certainly,' said the young lady, with a fluttered, pleased look, bending forward. 'I only wish to say,' said Margaret, 'that I trust, that, in the whole course of your life, you will not suffer so great a degree of annoyance as you have inflicted on a large party of lovers of music this evening.' 'On graver occasions,' as Mr. Emerson observes, 'the same habit was only more stimulated; and I can not,' he says, 'remember certain passages which called it into play without new regrets at the costly loss which our community sustains in the loss of this brave and eloquent soul.' 'Margaret,' he again remarks, 'suffered no vice to insult her presence, but called the offender to instant account when the law of right or beauty was violated.....Others might abet a crime by silence if they pleased; she chose to clear herself of all complicity by calling the act by its right name.' We agree here, in the main, with Mr. Emerson; yet we can not but think that her admiration for the genius of Madame Sand, and the fascination which that wonderful woman's presence and conversation exercised over her gave a bias to her judgment in estimating Madame Sand's character. In just and impartial moral estimates genius and fame are to be left out in the decision. The gifted and the glorious are not to be accused or justified but on the same ethical conditions, fairly applied, as would be the unfavored and the obscure. Where the lowly would be condemned the exalted must not be acquitted. Madame Sand, Margaret intimates, 'might have loved one man, if she could have found one contemporary with her who could interest and command her whole range; but there was hardly a possibility of that for such a person. Thus she has naturally changed the objects of her affections—and several times.' Now this passage, to say the least, is very ambiguous; and but for Margaret's own purity of soul, parts of it are susceptible of very coarse interpretation. Madame Sand may be right or wrong in changing lovers according to her needs, but she has no claim to do so because of her genius. If she can do so with impunity, so can any woman: if other women come under penalty in doing so, she likewise should be subject to similar punishment. If she claims to be right by her need of change so can they; for they as well as she have their several individual and peculiar needs. If she requires "no defense, but only to be understood—because," as Margaret says, "she has bravely acted out her nature, and always with good intentions"—neither do they require any defense; for who ever heard of a woman changing husband or lover that did not complain that she was "not understood?" that did not assert that she was bravely acting out her nature? as no doubt she was; and that did not assert that she had the very best intentions—as, indeed, in reference to her own views, inclinations, purposes, and passions, she had? Let such a woman have no splendor of genius or of fame around her, then we all know what name society would consider the right one for her. We do not pretend here to decide the question, to dogmatize on it, or even to argue it. But we would be impartial. The ungifted should not be victims, if the powerful are to be idols; the lowly are not to be outcasts, banned and banished with an excommunication that is scornful and hopeless, if the exalted are to be enthroned and worshiped. If we hang the ragged rascal, we must not applaud the bedazzled one. We admit and admire the genius of Madame Sand; we acknowledge her many good and generous personal qualities; and, had not the desire to treat the whole of our subject equitably compelled us, we would not have connected her name with this moral criticism. It is one of the few instances in which we have to disagree with Margaret's estimate of character—an instance in which, at least, she fails to be impartial. In this case there were, however, grand talents, and with them much that was magnanimous and humane; but had the faults been those of a base disposition, then no mental power would have saved the individual from Margaret's condemnation and contempt. Like every woman true to womanhood, she was a natural hater and despiser of those who disgraced humanity by mean, cowardly, or cruel vices. Wherever there was that kind of evil to which she could not be indulgent her presence to characters affected by it was like a beguiling fate. "Like moths about a lamp," writes Mr. Emerson, "her victims voluntarily came to judgment; conscious persons, encumbered with egotism; vain persons, bent on concealing some mean vice; arrogant reformers, with some halting of their own; compromisers, who wished to reconcile right and wrong; and all came and held out their palms to the wise woman to read their fortunes, and they were truly told. Many anecdotes have come to my ear which show how useful the glare of her lamp proved in private circles, and what dramatic situations it created. But these can not be told. The valor for dragging the accused spirits among his acquaintance to the stake is not in the heart of the present writer. The reader must be content to learn that she knew how, without loss of temper, to speak with unmis-takable plainness to any party when she felt that truth or right was injured."

All this, we confess, was very unconventional, and what refined people, with "rose-water" for blood, might be tempted even to call rude. It was a dangerous power, to be used with as much mercy as discretion, or the individual in possession of it, instead of being a reformer to correct and to improve society, might become a tyrant to be feared and shunned. But with all its risks the need of it may often be noticed in various places and assemblies; to rebuke the fierce, to check the insolent, to humiliate the haughty, to punish the cruel and the coarse. In Margaret the power was duly modified and moderated by her many gentle qualities; for, notwithstanding her firmness of purpose, her decision of manner and of mind, she was not hard or harsh, but as merciful as just. She was full of all tenderness and pity; though stern to the unruly strong, she was meek to the helpless and the feeble; though unsparing to the proudly guilty, she was to those whom penitence had humbled, or to those whom sin had loaded with the burden of its heavy retribution, compassionate and consolatory, with all Christian, all womanly forbearance and sympathy. This was especially the case in respect to the sinful or the suffering of her own sex. She was no fastidious dilettante. Her sense of humanity was earnest and profound; even her interest in literature and art was in the degree that literature and art uttered this sense and embodied it. Her love of art and letters was not so much a feeling of taste as an affection for her kind. The result was, that her charity deepened her culture, and her culture quickened her charity. She delighted, therefore, to go among the unfortunate, and she was not frightened from the vilest. She did not shrink from any toil or task to which suffering humanity called her, whether in the military hospitals of Rome or in the wretched dwellings of the lowest poor in her own country; but it was when the dark tragedy of lost, degraded, desolated womanhood moved her that in her charity she becomes sublime. When connected with the New York Tribune she took heart-felt interest in female culprits; and she who, by her discourses, used to enchant the rich and educated womanhood of Boston, had an enchantment still more potent over the ignorant and vicious womanhood of Sing Sing and Blackwell's Island. In reference to the latter place: "It was," writes William Henry Channing, "while walking among the beds of the lazar-house—mis-called 'hospital'—which then, to the disgrace of the city, was the cess-pool of its filth, that an incident occurred as touching as it was surprising to herself. A woman was pointed out who bore a very bad character, as hardened, sulky, and impenetrable. She was in bad health, and rapidly failing. Margaret requested to be left alone with her; and to her question, 'Are you willing to die?' the woman answered, 'Yes,' adding, with her usual bitterness, 'Not on religious grounds, though.' 'That is well, to understand yourself,' was Margaret's rejoinder. She then began to talk with her about her health and her few comforts, until the conversation deepened in interest. At length, as Margaret rose to go, she said: 'Is there not any thing I can do for you?' The woman replied: 'I should be glad if you will pray with me.'

Margaret, too, was generous, with the noblest generosity, and also after the fashion of a woman. She was, from her large-mindedness, as all large-minded people are, tolerant and unsectarian. For the true mind of any creed she had a spiritual affection. Enough for her it was that they sought after the highest with aspiring sincerity, and loved the best as best they knew it. With the head she was as largely generous as the noblest man; but with the heart she was generous as only can be women, and the elect of women. Sympathy is the gift of woman, and Margaret had it in its holiest manner. It was for those who had no claim on her. Sympathy with individuals in their most deserted hours is also the choicest grace of woman; and Margaret had this in its most feminine kindness. In exertion to relieve a helpless man or woman, who made on her any suggestive impression, she seemed willing to spend and to be spent. To such she gave her thought, her toil, her time, and, what she could the least spare, she gave her money. "There was," says Mr. Emerson, "at New York a poor adventurer, half patriot, half author, a miserable man, always in such depths of distress, with such squadrons of enemies that no charity could relieve and no intervention could save him. He believed Europe banded for his destruction, and America corrupted to connive at it. Margaret listened to these woes with such patience and mercy that she drew five hundred dollars which had been invested for her in a safe place, and put them into those hapless hands, where, of course, the money was only the prey of a new rapacity to be bewailed by new reproaches. When one of her friends had occasion to allude to this long afterward, she replied: 'In answer to what you say of — I wish, indeed, the little effort I made for him had been wiselier applied. Yet these are not things one regrets. It will not do to calculate too closely with the affectionate human impulse. We must consent to make many mistakes, or we should move too slow to help our brothers much.'"

The moral side of this noble nature has so moved us that we have hardly the requisite coolness to criticise the intellectual side of it; and we have, moreover, already occupied so much of our available space that we must of necessity, in what we say of Margaret's mental qualities, content ourselves with abrupt indications of opinion. We would willingly and pleasurably give a thorough and consecutive analysis of her power as a thinker, a critic, and a writer; but to do so our small remnant of space forbids.

We can not have written thus far without leaving the impression on our readers that we hold Margaret Fuller Ossoli's intellect in considerable esteem. A narrow or feeble intellect could not have belonged to one who had so large and strong a moral nature. The human faculties are never with one another so out of measure. The faculty which we peculiarly call intellect is in vital harmony with the faculties which we call emotions and the will; and as the quality and direction of the faculties determine the good or evil of character, the energy and reach of them determine its compass, grade, and order. Extraordinary character is not the associate of ordinary intellect. But in the aggregate of faculties which we term "the mental" as distinguished from "the moral," we include fancy and imagination as well as intellect. Margaret had a bold and vigorous intellect, in which the element of memory seems to have been of uncommon force; in quickness, fullness, variety, and retentiveness. This was a faithful and ready servant of her mind in its thinking; but it was a more zealous, earnest, and willing servant of her mind in its imagining and fancying. In Margaret's mind the tendency was more to color and combine than to discriminate and analyze. She did not want imagination, but we consider that fancy and memory dominated among her mental qualities. Her mind was, therefore, not analytic but analogical. Neither was it inductive. In a word, it was not logical. It was deficient in that sustained and consecutive meditation which discerns or discovers those hidden or unobvious relations that bind facts into systems or ideas into laws, and that connect the links of chains vastly extended in scientific or speculative reasoning. It may be objected, however, that to do this belongs only to highest order of masculine thinkers. We admit it; but we class Margaret with the highest order of female minds: and this defect, if defect it is, does no intellectual discredit to her, since she shares it not only with women in general, but with women of genius. Exceptions there are—but exceptions, as it has been always said, prove the rule; and the rule will stand until facts disprove it. If such a result would be to the gain of woman—if in the attainment of it she would not lose more of her own real superiority—we would be among the first to hail her victory. Upon such conditions we wish her good-speed, and may she go on to conquer. But as yet the ratiocinative process has not been strikingly observable in the productions of women, and least of all in the productions of those who claim it most. It is not distinctive in the writings of Madame Ossoli, although she, we believe, has been cited as an instance of it. But this, we repeat, is no impeachment of her general mental power, since the deficiency of one quality may be more than compensated by a surplus of better qualities. Reasoning is not truth or knowledge; neither is it the only method by which nature or genius arrives at truth or knowledge; and logic is often but the instrument of sophistry and craft. If, therefore, there is not in Madame Ossoli's writings much of syllogistic sequence, there is no want of genuine mental and moral revelation. She was most livingly susceptible to all the higher influences of outward nature, of social life, and to all that was individual or original, whether in character or genius. Æsthetic sensibility was a prevailing element in her temperament. She loved the beautiful with passion; her craving after it was almost morbid. But it seemed to act most powerfully on her as it was through art shaped to her through the plastic imagination. She was not, therefore, a good observer of mere external objects or phenomena. She was too subjective to be so; too much tempted to live within herself, and to wander among the richly garnished chambers of her own memory, and brood over her own suggestive ideas. She was, on this account, not a poet, a critic, or a describer of the worlds of objects or of life—as entirely separated from the human. Nature does impress her divinely, and gives her an inward rapture; but this comes from a sense of its spiritual influence, and from a sense of its infinite mystery and grandeur. Little of this pleasure belongs to accurate notations of the senses, and none of it to considerations of science. Her narratives of travel, whether at home or abroad, are mostly the records of experiences and impressions, and not much the result of outward observation or of a sympathy with the picturesque. In “Summer on the Lakes” she is amidst the solitudes of nature; but though we read here and there a splendid passage inspired by the scenery, we read continually her reflections on “Books and Men.” In her letters from Italy—full of brave and heroic beauty—we still read more of Italian struggles and Italian life than we do of Italian landscapes and Italian skies. But when the beautiful comes into Art, then it comes not only into communion with her æsthetic emotion, but also into communion with her human sympathies, and with that impassioned admiration which she had lovingly and learnedly cultivated with all classical nations and literatures. She is therefore an eloquent writer upon art; and how original she was in her broad and human views of art is proved by the fact that such had been her ideas before John Ruskin was ever heard of, though John Ruskin has become the apostle of the true and simple doctrine that “Man is not made for art, but that art is made for man.”

Margaret, we have said, is not a great logician, not even a middling one, but for all that, she gets in her own way at many a profound truth. Her book on “Woman in the Nineteenth Century” has much in it that is one-sided, inconsequent, and inconsistent; but none the less it is a work of deeply suggestive teaching, and is full of learning, fancy, eloquence, and enthusiasm. There are mistakes in it—which have been since swelled out in the wordy and declamatory exaggerations of inferior minds—but behind the mistakes there is also true wisdom. Many of these mistakes her subsequent experience would have taught her to correct. She would have learned that all the grossness, the injustice, the cruelty, the antagonism of which demagogues in petticoats accuse man in his relations to woman have no real evidence in fact, and have no possibility in nature. As a general matter, men must have tender and affectionate relations with a sex which gives them their mothers and sisters, their wives and daughters. Taking the differences of circumstances into account, this remark is comparatively as true of the savage condition of humanity as of the civilized. Any other condition would imply a permanent monstrosity, at which reason and sentiment revolt; which Nature contradicts in all the laws of animal existence, and in the simple continuance of races. The prevailing relation between the sexes throughout the animal kingdom is that of reciprocal aids and affections; there is also between them something like an equal balance of compensations. This law rules over man as over all living creatures, and, taking the whole of human life into view, the violations of it must be considered only as anomalies. To make such anomalies a ground for a revolutionary change in the social or intellectual relations of the sexes is as wild and strange as it would be to insist on changing the physical relations of the sexes. Margaret Fuller approached to no such extremes. She had too earnest a character and too massive an understanding to follow out speculations which would lead to such absurdities. She may have been sometimes “zealous overmuch” for woman; but she kept her zeal within the natural bounds of womanhood. We make these strictures with no insensibility to any social or legal disadvantages to which woman may be subject, and we give all due credit to those of either sex who labor for their removal by real improvements and by reasonable changes. We would have the range of woman's life enlightened and enlarged; we would not restrict her honorable freedom, or her just personal independence; we would give the utmost security to her legal rights; we would open many departments of employment and activity from which she has been practically excluded; and we think that, quietly and gradually, such is the tendency of advancing civilization and of educated experience. But, at the same time, man is no selfish and tyrannical monopolist of work, even in that sort of work in which woman might be his competitor; because for the one of the feminine sex whom he may exclude, two or three of that sex usually depend on his labor and share his earnings. On the other hand, we do not agree with those who maintain that the demand of woman on man for deference and defense virtually ignores her claim for equality. Equality, in respect to moral and intelligent beings, is not a measurable coincidence, as in material things, but the possession of spiritual qualities which, though diverse in manner or degree, are, when interchangeably compared, of similar dignity and worth; or it may be, as in crime and sin, of similar depravity and baseness. Equality of this kind does not exclude distinct relations, with appropriate charities and duties. After all, theories do not repeal the laws of nature, and to the end of time men will be men, and women will be women; and so it will appear, in mind as well as body, in work and play, in public and private, in infancy, youth, maturity, and age.

We should like to give our estimate thoroughly of her as a critic; but we must prepare to close. Every work of power, whether in letters or in art, seemed to set her mind on fire, and to put her whole nature into flame. The effect of this is, that the reader loses thought of the work in the passion, the enthusiasm, and the eloquence of the reviewer. Every one must have felt this in the perusal of her articles on Miss Barrett, on Robert Browning, on "The Modern British Poets," on "Goethe," on "Mr. Alston's Pictures," and on "The Great Musical Composers." She kindles and she heats us; but when we have done reading, we find that with the life which she has awakened we have been brought into deep communion with her subjects, and have learned to think of them with interest and insight. This power of feeling into her subject, of feeling with it, and of communicating her feeling to others, is, to our apprehension, her special peculiarity as a critic. She wants concentration, and the faculty of strict analysis; she does not confine herself to an examination of a work within its own contents and character, but by the energy and fullness of her fancy she loses herself in labyrinths of analogies, and by the rapid suggestiveness of her learning and memory she is tempted into illustrative disquisition; yet such is the vital force of her mind, that though she may not hold to the unity of her theme, she commands and compels the unity of attention. We may not think very highly of her critical opinion, or bow to her critical decrees, but we can not deny or resist her eloquence in expounding and maintaining them. We always feel, too, that the opinion is really hers, and that it is sincerely hers. Her criticism illustrates all the moral and mental qualities which, in the course of this article, we have claimed for her. It was boldly honest. If she was not an infallible judge, she was a fearless and an incorruptible one. So she was a liberal critic. She had a most generous catholicity of taste; had pleasure in great varieties of excellence, and gave them severally their due measures of cordial praise. Then, withal, she was ever in earnest, and with a moral earnestness which did not allow any artistic enthusiasm to prefer the beautiful to the true or to the good. The æsthetic was with her, as it always ought to be, subordinate to the ethical. Such critic was she; and mentally, she was in correspondence with her moral tendencies. She had grand ideas—and one of the grandest was, that of the dignity which belongs to Literature, Art, and to those who worthily exercise their functions. She had keen mental observance; habits of great mental industry, and of constant meditation and reflection. She had collected ample stores of knowledge, especially within the region of those studies which concern the history and the life of man. She was habitually thoughtful, and had a serious purpose in all her writings. She seemed to regard self-culture, and all culture, with a sense of duty and a sentiment of religion. Her high imagination gave her sympathy with all that is transcendent in goodness, truth, or beauty; her fancy invested all she wrote and spoke with ornament, which sparkled through her meaning and illumined it with a living light: enthusiasm was her life, and the spirit of poetry the soul of her enthusiasm.

On her style we can not venture many words; yet we can not wholly pass it by in silence. We can not write with much decisiveness, because we do not think that Madame Ossoli's style had reached its maturity. Still we must judge it as we have it. It is not easy, graceful, fluent, or idiomatic. Above all, it is strange that the style of a woman who so passionately loved music should be defective in melody. It is frequently eloquent; yet its eloquence is too often formalized into rhetoric. It has but rarely that which springs out of familiar thought, and rises gradually into the sublime of idea, imagination, and passion. Still it is genuine, sincere, noble; rich with thought and knowledge, and has constantly bursts of lofty power. Occasionally it has a certain mannerism—partly of the individual, partly of a circle—that gave a technical and esoteric meaning to common words, and had also new terms for our inner life, which was to be distinguished from ordinary experience. It is natural to think that the stern realities which she had passed through, and which possibly she would have had still to pass through, would have corrected in her later style whatever had been amiss in her earlier, and that the latter would have no more resembled the former than the style of Johnson in "The Lives of the Poets" resembles his style in "Rasselas" or "The Rambler."

Such is our estimate of Margaret Fuller Ossoli. It is, so far as we can know ourselves, impartial and independent. We had with the subject of it only the slightest acquaintance; and we have read nothing concerning her but what we found in her own writings and in her biography. We have had neither the provocation to be severe, nor the temptation to be indulgent. We have thought according to our light; we have written according to our thought; and now that our task is done, we claim credit for nothing but our sincerity in the doing of it.

ENA.

HE is of the earth, earthy—a clod; she, with Psyche-wings folded as in a chrysalis, and already tremulous with a higher life. And they stand at the marriage altar. Ah, what strange infatuation is on the maiden! Is there no soul of a diviner essence to mate with hers, that she gives to this man the sacred rights of a husband?

We turn from the fair and radiant face, and our thought goes onward to that inevitable future which proves all things. Alas! alas! No rainbow lifts an arch of promise against the gathering blackness. Poor Psyche! When thy wings unfold there will be no sunshine nor soft south airs, perfume-laden, in which thou shalt disport thyself, but wintry winds and sleety rain.

How many such marriages there are! Daily we see pure essences mating with stolid sensuality; truth with hypocrisy; aspiring souls with the mean and groveling. What sad, sad perversions! Happiness is not born of these conjunctions; but oftenest strife, disgust, anguish—a living death! Oh bitter, bitter years that follow—what hand is firm enough to write your histories? Every shore is wreck-strewn; on this side and on that, as we pass through life, are way-marks of disaster; white warning crosses standing in mournful significance above the places where love died in a last, fierce, murderous struggle. But who takes heed! Every day the marriage bell sounds; every day orange blossoms rest above pure white brows and shadow loving eyes; and every day souls, already beginning to feel the heaven-aspiring impulses of an immortal nature, fetter themselves to clods of the valley.

Oh, the wild strifes; the bitter repentances; the fierce consuming hates that burn in secret; the masks that deceive only the wearers; the struggles that end in death! Here, in a few brief words, is the history of thousands. But who takes heed?

"He is of the earth, earthy—a clod; she, with Psyche-wings folded as in a chrysalis, and already tremulous with a higher life. And they stand at the marriage altar!"

We pass on. A year has intervened. The clod and the soul are struggling against each other. Psyche has found her wings, and they are fluttering in the air; but fluttering in vain. She is bound to a clod! God help her! God comfort her! God give her patience to wait her time! to keep the eternal fire burning ever upon her heart-altar! His permissions never let the human soul get beyond the reach of Divine love, and in this love is eternal blessedness; and so we may have hope for our Psyche, even though married to a clod. But she must not struggle in tearful impotence, or blind anger, with her chains; must not bruise her soft tissue wings against insensate rock or prison bar. The hurt would be all her own. If she would rise into the pure atmospheres of heaven, she must keep herself pure—pride, selfish passion, anger, hate, mad impatience—these are born from beneath and gravitate downward. She must be meek, and loving, and true—she must let the celestial warmth of her higher nature pass, by transfusion, into the clod to which she has bound herself, that life may be quickened in a human soul, and latent powers stir therein with an immortal prophecy. She must lift a blind, gross, groveling, spirit upward, so that it may feel the warmth of a sun that shines in higher atmospheres.

A year has intervened since the marriage of our Ena. We find her with weeping eyes and cold, grieving lips. Oh, whither has fled the tenderness, the sweetness, the love from her beautiful face? A few sentences, wrung out from a heart already wounded to rebellion, gives the unhappy truth. Poor Ena!

"I can not live in this atmosphere! It suffocates me! His life is all sensuous, sordid, earthly; and mine is panting for a higher development. His pleasures lie in the lowest things—in eating and drinking and the delights of sense. While I look upward and inward, he looks outward and downward. We are struggling in bonds, and I am weakest because most sensitive. He does not understand me—can not understand me. If I bring to him my precious thoughts, my pure inspirations, my dreams of spiritual beauty and perfection, he regards them coldly, or tramples them under his swinish feet!"

"Ena!"

"I can not help it. The aching heart will cry out in its pain."

"But he is your husband, Ena."

"My husband!" What repulsion in her voice!

"You said it before earthly and heavenly witnesses, Ena."

"In my blindness and ignorance I loved an ideal, and thought it embodied in him. It was not! I do not love him; I can not love him; we are opposite as the poles."

"There is one thing that you can do, Ena."

"What?"

"Be faithful as a wife."

"Where there is no love—"

"Stop, Ena! Confirmations lie in utterances. Never again permit a word against your husband to pass these lips. Struggle no longer with your bonds, if you will call them such. Be faithful, up to all dutiful, if not loving, possibilities; and so shall your higher spiritual life, that now gasps for a heavenly vitality, begin to breathe in its own pure atmosphere. Your husband is kind, thoughtful of your comfort, and proud of your personal appearance. He does not comprehend your upreaching and inreaching aspirations. His mind rests in the mere phenomenal, while yours rises into the intellectual, and pants for the spiritual. Antagonisms now spring from your intrusion of themes out of the range of his sympathy. Ena, keep back your precious things; do not uncover them to chilling frosts; do not expose them to a trampling foot; do not let your husband learn to condemn the truth and beauty which come, transformed, to his dull vision."

"And what then?"

"Strife ceases. There has been strife?"

"There has!"

"Strife ceases, Ena; will not this be something gained. Is not tranquillity better than chafing turbulence? There is good in your husband. He has integrity of character."

"Oh yes, yes." There was softness in the tones of Ena.

"And he is kind."

"If humored. But my soul revolts at the degradation of bowing to the mere humors of a gross nature." She grew hard again.

"Ena!"

"I have said it, and it is so! There is no use in argument. I am what I am; and there is no help for it."

"There is help for it, Ena."

"Where?"

"In heaven, from whence all power to rise out of our evils comes. I am what I am, and you are what you are; but our lives are in vain if there be no birth of a higher element within us. All our impulses are natural, and therefore pervaded by an evil force; this evil force must be striven against and extinguished, that a divine force may give to them a nobler direction. Your husband is kind, as I have said."

"If not opposed. If I give him his own way."

"And why not?"

"And become as nothing?—a cipher! or, worse, a slave?"

"The soul is free. He can not fetter its wings."

"He does fetter them. I am bound to a clod. No taste, no fancy, no true love of the beautiful, no aspirings after a better life; no dream of a world not appreciable by touch, taste, sight, or hearing. How can a soul like mine be free with such a chain upon its wings?"

"No soul is free, Ena, until it is made free by God. True freedom is found only when the chains of our natural selfish loves are broken. We need not tell you this—the truth was learned by you long ago—we speak to remind you of the old landmarks from which your steps seem about departing. Our life here includes but the germs of immortal completeness. We only develop at best the bud from whose mysterious bosom the leaf springs green in heaven, and the flower comes forth in beauty. The great question for you—for all of us—is, How, in the conditions of life in which we find ourselves, are we to develop this bud? By a restless, impatient, scornful rejection of duty, or by a self-denying acceptance of the work that comes to our hand? You know the way, for you have been well instructed, Ena. Let the truths that lie in your understanding come forth now and sustain you. The way may be difficult, the work hard, the sky overhead sunless, but the path of duty is the path to heaven; and every step taken heavenward is a step toward freedom—a step upward into purer atmospheres."

Ena's head, which had drawn itself into an attitude of proud defiance, bent forward in conviction. The fire went out of her eyes. Almost meekly she said,

"What is left for me to do?" Where there is no love there is no life. I am a woman, and must have love."

"You have love; the highest, the purest, the wisest love."

"God's love." There was no thrill of pleasure in Ena's voice.

"Yes, the love of Him whose love includes all pure loves. Let your thought dwell on this for a moment, Ena. If you accept this love, opening the door of your heart that it may flow in, it will be to you more than all human love."

"How shall I open the door?" She lifted her clear, strong eyes.

"By doing your duty as a wife. Remember your marriage vows."

"Love—honor—obey!" Her voice threw out the words in a sudden impulse of indignant rejection. "Impossible!"

"Not impossible kindness, Ena—kindness, gentleness, and thoughtful care of your husband's well-being and comfort. You claim to stand above him as to quality of life. So the angels stand above us—how much farther above us than you stand above him—and yet, they are ever stooping to our low estate; ever coming to us in loving ministration; ever forgetting themselves in a desire to do us good. Be an angel to your husband, Ena! Seek not only to impart natural blessing, that his daily outward life may flow on peaceful as a river, but seek his higher good. Move always before him the embodiment of heavenly graces, and you may kindle a spark that may burn through the infinite ages. If mere sensuous nature is all that now seems alive in him, be yours the heaven-commissioned task to quicken an immortal life in his soul. Oh, Ena! God has appointed you to a great work. Be true to the Divine commission; so shall you open the door of your heart, that His love may flow in."

"God's love is too high and pure—too spiritual, too divine. I want human love—soul-conjunction—my complement of life. I am a woman, and shall drag at these bonds till death!" She spoke with reviving bitterness.

"Till death?"

"Yes."

"And what then?"

"I shall find my counterpart in heaven—my soul-companion—my love—my life!"

A fine fervor glowed in Ena's countenance.

"In heaven?"

The tone and question disturbed her, but she did not answer.

"Will impatient dragging at these bonds, angry antagonisms instead of unselfish regard for your husband's well-being, idle tears in the place of loving deeds—will these perfect you for the awaiting bridegroom, the man-angel, in whose love you are to find an eternal completeness? Will he not turn from you as unworthy—as of too selfish and gross a quality? Ena, like your husband, you are still of the earth, earthy; and like him, hold in your natural life the germs of spiritual perfectness. There must be a crucifixion of this natural life before resurrection into spiritual life is possible. You must lay down your life, if you would take it up again; must lose your life, if you would find it! There is no other way given under heaven or among men. We speak in solemn warning, and pray you to heed our words.".....

A year later in the married life of Ena. There has been a change. Light has gone out of her face. The shadow of thought rests upon it. Her lips have lost something of their pulpy fullness, and lie closer together. Her eyes are softer, tenderer, calmer. There are no sharp impulses in her tones, no bitterness or rebellion in her words. You mention her husband, and she responds with a quiet smile that plays in saintly sweetness about her mouth. You see them together. How different her manner from what it was one year ago! You would never dream that respect were wanting, even though love touched no heart-chord with a vibrating finger. And yet his inferiority to Ena strikes you painfully at times. It is the clod and Psyche now, as in the beginning—now, as a year ago; but Psyche does not beat in wild impatience her airy wings, struggling in a vain effort to get free. She has folded them, in patience and a new-born hope, over her bosom. Light from a divine sun is shining down upon her, showing the true path, and giving strength to feet that halted in weakness a little while before.

And there is a change in Ena's husband as well. What is it? The clod has felt an influx of her regenerating life. The warmth of her heaven-inspired love has passed through the hard barriers of sensuality, and stirred the latent possibilities of his nature. Antagonism had begun to arouse antagonism; ill-concealed contempt, anger; alienation, selfish pride, the mother of hate. They had begun to drag on the chains that bound them together, hurting and wounding.

But that state has passed with them. The superior nature—wiser, clearer-seeing, and with a consequent higher power of self-control and self-compulsion—has stooped to the inferior; not in degradation, not in loss, not in humiliation, but as an angel might stoop. And in thus stooping she has grown wiser, purer, and more truly a woman. You see this in her countenance; you feel it in the sphere of her life. And he feels it, though his dull soul rises into no clear apprehension of its origin or meaning. He imagines her as drawing nearer and nearer to him, as loving him more and more for himself; while yet she is receding hourly and daily, and stands at a farther distance from him now than on the day their pledges were exchanged at the marriage altar. It is not a love for his quality that holds her in dutiful ministrations by his side, but a love, less of woman than of angel, that seeks his good, and bends to his low estate that she may lift him up.

And is all this but cold, unblessed duty-work, as some would say? The stern ordeal of a mere penitential life? No, no! Let that imagination pass. There is no dutiful or unselfish act that does not leave behind a state of peace—that does not open the mind inwardly, and give it new and sweeter experiences. So it has been with Ena. First, there was a repression of interior repugnances and antagonisms, united with dutiful acts toward her husband. From the beginning she felt a change in her feelings. What seemed almost impossible grew easier through daily repetitions. Self-compulsion ceased after a little while, and thought moved to action by the power of a ready will.

And yet, for all this, it pains you interiorly to see Ena and her husband together; for you know that a marriage of soul is with them impossible. That they are only bound together externally, while, as to what is internal, through which alone a true conjunction exists, they stand apart as strangers. But there is little in her manner that reveals a consciousness of this. She listens while he speaks—how low his range of thought compared with hers!—and, with respectful interest in her voice, so times her answers to his words that you see higher meanings in them than at first appeared. That she is more to him now than a year ago is seen at a glance. Her tender concessions, her gentle bearing, her care for his pleasures, her patience, her purity and truth, have inspired him with a sentiment almost akin to reverence. "He worships her." Yes, that is the sentence you hear sometimes.

And is not this better for Ena? Better than strife, anger, and the breaking of bonds? Is she not wiser and happier—more a true woman—meeter for heaven, and that eternal union with a soul winged for higher atmospheres like her own, toward which she yearns with an immortal instinct? Who will say nay?

She will not talk with you now about her husband, as in the times of her first awakening to the knowledge of a fatal error. To her the subject of marriage has become more sacred. She has lifted it from among the things of common life. A woman's delicacy veils all that is unbeautiful in her wifely relation.

And so the years move on with Ena. You see that her face grows paler and more spiritual, her eyes more abstracted and dreamy, her manner more subdued. She is waiting, waiting; hearkening onward to a low, sweet voice that comes with loving intimations; fluttering her wings, that have lain folded over her breasts so long; aspiring and moving heavenward—heavenward by the way of earthly duty.

Shall we visit her in her last time? Ena has walked steadily along the path from which there was no swerving without sin—steadily to the end. If it has been often in weariness, reluctance, and pain, it has been also in hope and purification. The true woman in her has been developed—the true, loving, unselfish woman; and her celestial quality has stirred a nobler element in the gross nature to which she had bound herself. Through her a heavenly quality has been born in him; she has saved a soul that, but for the inspiration of her life, would never have risen out of the sluggish regions of mere sensuality. And in the work of saving a soul she has wrought out a higher salvation for herself. Every human soul needs purification. There may be a finer element, but the taint of selfishness is there; and in the separation of dross from this finer element, the fiery ordeal is oftenest most severe. It was severe with Ena; but she is out of the crucible, and the time of her translation has come.....

Her husband sits in tears by the bed on which she is lying, pale and wasted, yet beautiful to him as an angel. He is holding one of her small hands with a tightening grasp. Ah, has she not been growing dearer to him, and more essential to his life day by day!

"Oh, Ena! stay with me a little longer. What shall I do without you?"

A shade of tender concern falls over her tranquil face. Her soul had gone upward, but the words of her husband draw her back to earth again.

"God knows best. Oh! be patient and self-denying, and He will be more to you than all He now removes."

She rises and leans toward him, as a mother leans, yearningly, toward a child who has for years absorbed her tenderest care—as a mother or guardian spirit, not as a wife. On his forehead she lays a kiss. It is her last. Her work is done. The fetter is loosened, and Psyche has found her wings!

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XIII.

LOVE ME LOVE MY DOG.

WHILE the battle is raging, the old folks and ladies peep over the battlements to watch the turns of the combat and the behavior of the knights. To princesses in old days, whose lovely hands were to be bestowed upon the conqueror, it must have been a matter of no small interest to know whether the slim young champion with the lovely eyes on the milk-white steed should vanquish, or the dumpy, elderly, square-shouldered, squinting, carrotty whiskerando of a warrior who was laying about him so savagely; and so in this battle, on the issue of which depended the keeping or losing of poor Philip's inheritance, there were several non-combatants deeply interested. Or suppose we withdraw the chivalrous simile (as, in fact, the conduct and views of certain parties engaged in the matter were any thing but what we call chivalrous), and imagine a wily old monkey who engages a cat to take certain chestnuts out of the fire, and pussy putting her paw through the bars, seizing the nut and then dropping it? Jacko is disappointed and angry, shows his sharp teeth, and bites if he dares. When the attorney went down to do battle for Philip's patrimony, some of those who wanted it were spectators of the fight, and lurking up a tree hard by. When Mr. Bond came forward to try and seize Phil's chestnuts, there was a wily old monkey who thrust the cat's paw out, and proposed to gobble up the smoking prize.

If you have ever been at the "Admiral Byng," you know, my dear Madam, that the parlor where the club meets is just behind Mrs. Oves's bar, so that by lifting up the sash of the window which communicates between the two apartments that good-natured woman may put her face into the club-room, and actually be one of the society. Sometimes, for company, old Mr. Ridley goes and sits with Mrs. O. in her bar, and reads the paper there. He is slow at his reading. The long words puzzle the worthy gentleman. As he has plenty of time to spare, he does not grudge it to the study of his paper.

On the day when Mr. Bond went to persuade Mrs. Brandon in Thornhaugh Street to claim Dr. Firmin for her husband, and to disinherit poor Philip, a little gentleman wrapped most solemnly and mysteriously in a great cloak appeared at the bar of the "Admiral Byng," and said, in an aristocratic manner, "You have a parlor; show me to it." And being introduced to the parlor (where there are fine pictures of Oves, Mrs. O., and Spotty-nose, their favorite defunct bull-dog), sat down and called for a glass of sherry and a newspaper.

The civil and intelligent pot-boy of the "Byng" took the party The Advertiser of yesterday (which to-day's paper was in 'and), and when the gentleman began to swear over the old paper, Frederick gave it as his opinion to his mistress that the new-comer was a harbitrary gent—as, indeed, he was, with the omission, perhaps, of a single letter; a man who bullied every body who would submit to be bullied. In fact, it was our friend Talbot Twysden, Esq., Commissioner of the Powder and Pomatum Office; and I leave those who know him to say whether he is arbitrary or not.

To him presently came that bland old gentleman, Mr. Bond, who also asked for a parlor and some sherry-and-water; and this is how Philip and his veracious and astute biographer came to know for a certainty that dear uncle Talbot was the person who wished to—to have Philip's chestnuts.

Mr. Bond and Mr. Twysden had been scarcely a minute together when such a storm of imprecations came clattering through the glass-window which communicates with Mrs. Oves's bar, that I dare say they made the jugs and tumblers clatter on the shelves, and Mr. Ridley, a very modest-spoken man, reading his paper, lay it down with a scared face, and say, "Well, I never!" Nor did he often, I dare say.

This volley was fired by Talbot Twysden, in consequence of his rage at the news which Mr. Bond brought him.

"Well, Mr. Bond; well, Mr. Bond! What does she say?" he asked of his emissary.

"She will have nothing to do with the business, Mr. Twysden. We can't touch it; and I don't see how we can move her. She denies the marriage as much as Firmin does: says she knew it was a mere sham when the ceremony was performed."

"Sir, you didn't bribe her enough," shrieked Mr. Twysden. "You have bungled this business; by George you have, Sir!"

"Go and do it yourself, Sir, if you are not ashamed to appear in it," says the lawyer. "You don't suppose I did it because I liked it; or want to take that poor young fellow's inheritance from him, as you do?"

"I wish justice and the law, Sir. If I were wrongfully detaining his property I would give it up. I would be the first to give it up. I desire justice and law, and employ you because you are a law agent. Are you not?"

"And I have been on your errand, and shall send in my bill in due time; and there will be an end of my connection with you as your law agent, Mr. Twysden!" cried the old lawyer.

"You know, Sir, how badly Firmin acted to me in the last matter."

"Faith, Sir, if you ask my opinion as a law agent, I don't think there was much to choose between you. How much is the sherry-and-water?—keep the change. Sorry I'd no better news to bring you, Mr. T., and as you are dissatisfied, again recommend you to employ another law agent."

"My good Sir, I—"

"My good Sir, I have had other dealings with your family, and am no more going to put up with your highti-tightness than I would with Lord Ringwood's, when I was one of his law agents. I am not going to tell Mr. Philip Firmin that his uncle and aunt propose to ease him of his property; but if any body else does—that good little Mrs. Brandon, or that old goose Mr. Whatdyecallum, her father—I don't suppose he will be over well pleased. I am speaking as a gentleman now, not as a law agent. You and your nephew had each a half share of Mr. Philip Firmin's grandfather's property, and you wanted it all, that's the truth, and set a law agent to get it for you, and swore at him because he could not get it from its right owner. And so, Sir, I wish you a good-morning, and recommend you to take your papers to some other agent, Mr. Twysden." And with this, exit Mr. Bond. And now I ask you if that secret could be kept which was known through a trembling glass-door to Mrs. Oves of the "Admiral Byng," and to Mr. Ridley the father of J. J., and the obsequious husband of Mrs. Ridley? On that very afternoon, at tea-time, Mrs. Ridley was made acquainted by her husband (in his noble and circumlocutory manner) with the conversation which he had overheard. It was agreed that an embassy should be sent to J. J. on the business, and his advice taken regarding it; and J. J.'s opinion was that the conversation certainly should be reported to Mr. Philip Firmin, who might afterward act upon it as he should think best.

What? His own aunt, cousins, and uncle agreed in a scheme to overthrow his legitimacy, and deprive him of his grandfather's inheritance? It seemed impossible. Big with the tremendous news, Philip came to his adviser, Mr. Pendennis, of the Temple, and told him what had occurred on the part of father, uncle, and Little Sister. Her abnegation had been so noble that you may be sure Philip appreciated it; and a tie of friendship was formed between the young man and the little lady even more close and tender than that which had bound them previously. But the Twysdens, his kinsfolk, to employ a lawyer in order to rob him of his inheritance!—Oh, it was dastardly! Philip bawled and stamped, and thumped his sense of the wrong in his usual energetic manner. As for his cousin Ringwood Twysden, Phil had often entertained a strong desire to wring his neck and pitch him down stairs. As for uncle Talbot: that he is an old pump, that he is a pompous old humbug, and the queerest old sycophant, I grant you; but I couldn't have believed him guilty of this. And as for the girls—oh, Mrs. Pendennis, you who are good, you who are kind, although you hate them, I know you do—you can't say, you won't say, that they were in the conspiracy?

"But suppose Twysden was asking only for what he conceives to be his rights?" asked Mr. Pendennis. "Had your father been married to Mrs. Brandon, you would not have been Dr. Firmin's legitimate son. Had you not been his legitimate son, you had no right to a half share of your grandfather's property. Uncle Talbot acts only the part of honor and justice in the transaction. He is Brutus, and he orders you off to death with a bleeding heart."

"And he orders his family out of the way," roars Phil, "so that they mayn't be pained by seeing the execution! I see it all now. I wish somebody would send a knife through me at once, and put an end to me. I see it all now.

Do you know that for the last week I have been to Beaunash Street, and found nobody? Agnes had the bronchitis, and her mother was attending to her; Blanche came for a minute or two, and was as cool—as cool as I have seen Lady Iceberg be cool to her. Then they must go away for change of air. They have been gone these three days: while uncle Talbot and that viper of a Ringwood have been closeted with their nice new friend, Mr. Hunt. O conf——! I beg your pardon, Ma'am; but I know you always allow for the energy of my language."

"I should like to see that Little Sister, Mr. Firmin. She has not been selfish, or had any scheme but for your good," remarks my wife.

"A little angel who drops her h's—a little heart, so good and tender that I melt as I think of it," says Philip, drawing his big hand over his eyes. "What have men done to get the love of some women? We don't earn it; we don't deserve it, perhaps. We don't return it. They bestow it on us. I have given nothing back for all this love and kindness, but I look a little like my father of old days, for whom—for whom she had an attachment. And see now how she would die to serve me! You are wonderful, women are! your fidelities and your ficklenesses alike marvelous. What can any woman have found to adore in the doctor? Do you think my father could ever have been adorable, Mrs. Pendennis? And yet I have heard my poor mother say she was obliged to marry him. She knew it was a bad match, but she couldn't resist it. In what was my father so irresistible? He is not to my taste. Between ourselves, I think he is a—well, never mind what."

"I think we had best not mind what?" says my wife, with a smile.

"Quite right—quite right; only I blurt out every thing that is on my mind. Can't keep it in!" cries Phil, gnawing his mustaches. "If my fortune depended on my silence I should be a beggar, that's the fact. And, you see, if you had such a father as mine, you yourself would find it rather difficult to hold your tongue about him. But now, tell me: this ordering away of the girls and aunt Twysden, while the little attack upon my property is being carried on—isn't it queer?"

"The question is at an end," said Mr. Pendennis. "You are restored to your atavis regibus and ancestral honors. Now that uncle Twysden can't get the property without you, have courage, my boy—he may take it, along with the encumbrance."

Poor Phil had not known—but some of us, who are pretty clear-sighted when our noble selves are not concerned, had perceived that Philip's dear aunt was playing fast and loose with the lad, and when his back was turned was encouraging a richer suitor for her daughter.

Hand on heart I can say of my wife that she meddles with her neighbors as little as any person I ever knew; but when treacheries in love affairs are in question she fires up at once, and would persecute to death almost the heartless male or female criminal who would break love's sacred laws. The idea of a man or woman trifling with that holy compact awakens in her a flame of indignation. In certain confidences (of which let me not vulgarize the arcanā) she had given me her mind about some of Miss Twysden's behavior with that odious blackamoor, as she chose to call Captain Woolcomb, who, I own, had a very slight tinge of complexion; and when, quoting the words of Hamlet regarding his father and mother, I asked, "Could she on this fair mountain leave to feed, and batten on this Moor?" Mrs. Pendennis cried out that this matter was all too serious for jest, and wondered how her husband could make word-plays about it. Perhaps she has not the exquisite sense of humor possessed by some folks; or is it that she has more reverence? In her creed, if not in her church, marriage is a sacrament; and the fond believer never speaks of it without awe.

Now, as she expects both parties to the marriage engagement to keep that compact holy, she no more understands trifling with it than she could comprehend laughing and joking in a church. She has no patience with flirtations, as they are called. "Don't tell me, Sir," says the enthusiast; "a light word between a man and a married woman ought not to be permitted." And this is why she is harder on the woman than the man in cases where such dismal matters happen to fall under discussion. A look, a word from a woman, she says, will check a libertine thought or word in a man; and these cases might be stopped at once if the woman but showed the slightest resolution. She is thus more angry—(I am only mentioning the peculiarities, not defending the ethics of this individual moralist)—she is, I say, more angrily disposed toward the woman than the man in such delicate cases; and, I am afraid, considers that women are for the most part only victims because they choose to be so.

Now we had happened during this season to be at several entertainments, routs, and so forth, where poor Phil, owing to his unhappy Bohemian preferences and love of tobacco, etc., was not present—and where we saw Miss Agnes Twysden carrying on such a game with the tawny Woolcomb as set Mrs. Laura in a tremor of indignation. What though Agnes's blue-eyed mamma sat near her blue-eyed daughter, and kept her keen clear orbs perfectly wide open and cognizant of all that happened? So much the worse for her, the worse for both. It was a shame and a sin that a Christian English mother should suffer her daughter to deal lightly with the most holy, the most awful of human contracts; should be preparing her child who knows for what after misery of mind and soul. Three months ago you saw how she encouraged poor Philip, and now see her with this mulatto!

"Is he not a man, and a brother, my dear?" perhaps at this Mr. Pendennis interposes.

"Oh, for shame, Pen! no levity on this—no sneers and laughter on this the most sacred subject of all." And here, I dare say, the woman falls to caressing her own children, and hugging them to her heart as her manner was when moved. Que voulez vous? There are some women in the world to whom love and truth are all in all here below.* Other ladies there are who see the benefit of a good jointure, a town and country house, and so forth, and who are not so very particular as to the character, intellect, or complexion of gentlemen who are in a position to offer their dear girls these benefits. In fine, I say that, regarding this blue-eyed mother and daughter, Mrs. Laura Pendennis was in such a state of mind that she was ready to tear their blue eyes out.

Nay, it was with no little difficulty that Mrs. Laura could be induced to hold her tongue upon the matter, and not give Philip her opinion. "What?" she would ask, "the poor young man is to be deceived and cajoled; to be taken or left as it suits these people; to be made miserable for life certainly if she marries him; and his friends are not to dare to warn him? The cowards! The cowardice of you men, Pen, upon matters of opinion, of you masters and lords of creation, is really despicable, Sir! You dare not have opinions, or holding them you dare not declare them, and act by them. You compromise with crime every day, because you think it would be officious to declare yourself and interfere. You are not afraid of outraging morals, but of inflicting ennui upon society, and losing your popularity. You are as cynical as—as, what was the name of the horrid old man who lived in the tub—Demosthenes?—well, Diogenes, then, and the name does not matter a pin, Sir. You are as cynical, only you wear fine ruffled shirts and wristbands, and you carry your lantern dark. It is not right to 'put your oar in,' as you say in your jargon (and even your slang is a sort of cowardice, Sir, for you are afraid to speak the feelings of your heart)—it is not right to meddle and speak the truth, not right to rescue a poor soul who is drowning—of course not. What call have you fine gentlemen of the world to put your oar in? Let him perish! What did he in that galley? That is the language of the world, baby darling. And, my poor, poor child, when you are sinking, nobody is to stretch out a hand to save you!" As for that wife of mine, when she sets forth the maternal plea, and appeals to the exuberant school of philosophers, I know there is no reasoning with her. I retire to my books, and leave her to kiss out the rest of the argument over the children.

Philip did not know the extent of the obligation which he owed to his little friend and guardian, Caroline; but he was aware that he had no better friend than herself in the world; and, I dare say, returned to her, as the wont is in such bargains between man and woman—woman and man, at least—a sixpence for that pure gold treasure, her sovereign affection. I suppose Caroline thought her sacrifice gave her a little authority to counsel Philip; for she it was who, I believe, first bid him to inquire whether that engagement which he had virtually contracted with his cousin was likely to lead to good, and was to be binding upon him but not on her? She brought Ridley to add his doubts to her remonstrances. She showed Philip that not only his uncle's conduct, but his cousin's, was interested, and set him to inquire into it further.

That peculiar form of bronchitis under which poor dear Agnes was suffering was relieved by absence from London. The smoke, the crowded parties and assemblies, the late hours, and, perhaps, the gloom of the house in Beaunash Street, distressed the poor dear child; and her cough was very much soothed by that fine, cutting east wind, which blows so liberally along the Brighton cliffs, and which is so good for coughs, as we all know. But there was one fault in Brighton which could not be helped in her bad case: it is too near London. The air, that chartered libertine, can blow down from London quite easily; or people can come from London to Brighton, bringing, I dare say, the insidious London fog along with them. At any rate, Agnes, if she wished for quiet, poor thing, might have gone farther and fared better. Why, if you owe a tailor a bill, he can run down and present it in a few hours. Vulgar, inconvenient acquaintances thrust themselves upon you at every moment and corner. Was ever such a tohubohu of people as there assembles? You can't be tranquil, if you will. Organs pipe and scream without cease at your windows. Your name is put down in the papers when you arrive; and every body meets every body ever so many times a day.

On finding that his uncle had set lawyers to work, with the charitable purpose of ascertaining whether Philip's property was legitimately his own, Philip was a good deal disturbed in mind. He could not appreciate that high sense of moral obligation by which Mr. Twysden was actuated. At least, he thought that these inquiries should not have been secretly set afoot; and as he himself was perfectly open—a great deal too open, perhaps—in his words and his actions, he was hard with those who attempted to hoodwink or deceive him.

It could not be; ah! no, it never could be, that Agnes the pure and gentle was privy to this conspiracy. But then, how very—very often of late she had been from home; how very, very cold aunt Twysden's shoulder had somehow become! Once, when he reached the door, a fishmonger's boy was leaving a fine salmon at the kitchen—a salmon and a tub of ice. Once, twice, at five o'clock, when he called, a smell of cooking pervaded the hall—that hall which culinary odors very seldom visited. Some of those noble Twysden dinners were on the tapis, and Philip was not asked. Not to be asked was no great deprivation; but who were the guests? To be sure, these were trifles light as air; but Philip smelled mischief in the steam of those Twysden dinners. He chewed that salmon with a bitter sauce as he saw it sink down the area steps (and disappear with its attendant lobster) in the dark kitchen regions.

Yes; eyes were somehow averted that used to look into his very frankly; a glove somehow had grown over a little hand which once used to lie very comfortably in his broad palm. Was any body else going to seize it, and was it going to paddle in that blackamoor's unblessed fingers? Ah, fiends and tortures! a gentleman may cease to love, but does he like a woman to cease to love him? People carry on ever so long for fear of that declaration that all is over. No confession is more dismal to make. The sun of love has set. We sit in the dark. I mean you, dear Madam, and Corydon, or I and Amaryllis; uncomfortably, with nothing more to say to one another; with the night-dew falling, and a risk of catching cold, drearily contemplating the fading west, with "the cold remains of lustre gone, of fire long passed away." Sink, fire of love! Rise, gentle moon, and mists of chilly evening! And, my good Madam Amaryllis, let us go home to some tea and a fire.

So Philip determined to go and seek his cousin. Arrived at his hotel (and if it were the * * I can't conceive Philip in much better quarters), he had the opportunity of inspecting those delightful newspaper arrivals, a perusal of which has so often edified us at Brighton. Mr. and Mrs. Penfold, he was informed, continued their residence, No. 96 Horizontal Place; and it was with those guardians he knew his Agnes was staying. He speeds to Horizontal Place. Miss Twysden is out. He heaves a sigh, and leaves a card. Has it ever happened to you to leave a card at that house—that house which was once THE house—almost your own; where you were ever welcome; where the kindest hand was ready to grasp yours, the brightest eye to greet you? And now your friendship has dwindled away to a little bit of pasteboard, shed once a year, and poor dear Mrs. Jones (it is with J. you have quarreled) still calls on the ladies of your family and slips her husband's ticket upon the hall table. Oh life and time, that it should have come to this! Oh gracious powers! Do you recall the time when Arabella Briggs was Arabella Thompson! You call and talk fadaises to her (at first she is rather nervous, and has the children in); you talk rain and fine weather; the last novel; the next party; Thompson in the City? Yes, Mr. Thompson is in the City. He's pretty well, thank you. Ah! Daggers, ropes, and poisons, has it come to this? You are talking about the weather, and another man's health, and another man's children, of which she is mother, to her? Time was the weather was all a burning sunshine, in which you and she basked; or if clouds gathered, and a storm fell, such a glorious rainbow haloed round you, such delicious tears fell and refreshed you, that the storm was more ravishing than the calm. And now another man's children are sitting on her knee—their mother's knee; and once a year Mr. and Mrs. John Thompson request the honor of Mr. Brown's company at dinner; and once a year you read in the Times, "In Nursery Street, the wife of J. Thompson, Esq., of a Son." To come to the once-beloved one's door, and find the knocker tied up with a white kid glove, is humiliating—say what you will, it is humiliating.

Philip leaves his card, and walks on to the Cliff, and of course, in three minutes, meets Clinker. Indeed, who ever went to Brighton for half an hour without meeting Clinker?

"Father pretty well? His old patient, Lady Geminy, is down here with the children—what a number of them there are, to be sure! Come to make any stay? See your cousin, Miss Twysden, is here with the Penfolds. Little party at the Grigsons' last night; she looked uncommonly well; danced ever so many times with the Black Prince, Woolcomb of the Greens. Suppose I may congratulate you. Six thousand five hundred a year now, and thirteen thousand when his grandmother dies; but those negresses live forever. I suppose the thing is settled. I saw them on the pier just now, and Mrs. Penfold was reading a book in the arbor. Book of sermons it was—pious woman, Mrs. Penfold. I dare say they are on the pier still." Striding with hurried steps Philip Firmin makes for the pier. The breathless Clinker can not keep alongside of his face. I should like to have seen it when Clinker said that "the thing" was settled between Miss Twysden and the cavalry gentleman.

There were a few nursery governesses, maids, and children paddling about at the end of the pier; and there was a fat woman reading a book in one of the arbors—but no Agnes, no Woolcomb. Where can they be? Can they be weighing each other? or buying those mad pebbles, which people are known to purchase? or having their silhouettes done in black? Ha! ha! Woolcomb would hardly have his face done in black. The idea would provoke odious comparisons. I see Philip is in a dreadfully bad sarcastic humor.

Up there comes from one of those trap-doors which lead down from the pier head to the green sea-waves ever restlessly jumping below—up there comes a little Skye-terrier dog with a red collar, who, as soon as she sees Philip, sings, squeaks, whines, runs, jumps, flumps up on him, if I may use the expression, kisses his hands, and with eyes, tongue, paws, and tail shows him a thousand marks of welcome and affection. What, Brownie, Brownie! Philip is glad to see the dog, an old friend who has many a time licked his hand and bounced upon his knee.

The greeting over, Brownie, wagging her tail with prodigious activity, trots before Philip—trots down an opening, down the steps under which the waves shimmer greenly, and into quite a quiet remote corner just over the water, whence you may command a most beautiful view of the sea, the shore, the Marine Parade, and the Albion Hotel, and where, were I five-and-twenty say, with nothing else to do, I would gladly pass a quarter of an hour talking about Glaucus or the Wonders of the Deep with the object of my affections.

Here, among the labyrinth of piles, Brownie goes flouncing along till she comes to a young couple who are looking at the view just described. In order to view it better, the young man has laid his hand—a pretty little hand, most delicately gloved—on the lady's hand; and Brownie comes up and nuzzles against her, and whines and talks as much as to say, "Here's somebody," and the lady says, "Down, Brownie, miss!"

HAND AND GLOVE.

"It's no good, Agnes, that dog," says the gentleman (he has very curly, not to say woolly hair, under his natty little hat). "I'll give you a pug with a nose you can hang your hat on. I do know of one now. My man Rummins knows of one. Do you like pugs?"

"I adore them," says the lady.

"I'll give you one, if I have to pay fifty pounds for it. And they fetch a good figure, the real pugs do, I can tell you. Once in London there was an exhibition of 'em, and—"

"Brownie, Brownie, down!" cries Agnes.

The dog was jumping at a gentleman, a tall gentleman with red mustaches and beard, who advances through the checkered shade, under the ponderous beams, over the translucent sea.

"Pray don't mind, Brownie won't hurt me," says a perfectly well-known voice, the sound of which sends all the colors shuddering out of Miss Agnes's pink cheeks.

"You see I gave my cousin this dog, Captain Woolcomb," says the gentleman; "and the little slut remembers me. Perhaps Miss Twysden prefers the pug better."

"Sir!"

"If it has a nose you can hang your hat on, it must be a very pretty dog, and I suppose you intend to hang your hat on it a good deal."

"Oh, Philip!" says the lady; but an attack of that dreadful coughing stops further utterance.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONTAINS TWO OF PHILIP'S MISHAPS.

You know that, in some parts of India, infanticide is the common custom. It is part of the religion of the land, as, in other districts, widow-burning used to be. I can't imagine that ladies like to destroy either themselves or their children, though they submit with bravery, and even cheerfulness, to the decrees of that religion which orders them to make away with their own or their young ones' lives. Now, suppose you and I, as Europeans, happened to drive up where a young creature was just about to roast herself, under the advice of her family and the highest dignitaries of her church: what could we do? Rescue her? No such thing. We know better than to interfere with her, and the laws and usages of her country. We turn away with a sigh from the mournful scene; we pull out our pocket-handkerchiefs, tell coachman to drive on, and leave her to her sad fate.

Now about poor Agnes Twysden: how, in the name of goodness, can we help her? You see she is a well brought up and religious young woman of the Brahminical sect. If she is to be sacrificed, that old Brahmin her father, that good and devout mother, that most special Brahmin her brother, and that admirable girl her strait-laced sister, all insist upon her undergoing the ceremony, and deck her with flowers ere they lead her to that dismal altar flame. Suppose, I say, she has made up her mind to throw over poor Philip, and take on with some one else? What sentiment ought our virtuous bosoms to entertain toward her? Anger? I have just been holding a conversation with a young fellow in rags and without shoes, whose bed is commonly a dry arch, who has been repeatedly in prison, whose father and mother were thieves, and whose grandfathers were thieves; are we to be angry with him for following the paternal profession? With one eye brimming with pity, the other steadily keeping watch over the family spoons, I listen to his artless tale. I have no anger against that child; nor toward thee, Agnes, daughter of Talbot the Brahmin.

For though duty is duty, when it comes to the pinch it is often hard to do. Though dear papa and mamma say that here is a gentleman with ever so many thousands a year, an undoubted part in So-and-So-shire, and whole islands in the western main, who is wildly in love with your fair skin and blue eyes, and is ready to fling all his treasure at your feet; yet, after all, when you consider that he is very ignorant, though very cunning; very stingy, though very rich; very ill-tempered, probably, if faces and eyes and mouths can tell truth: and as for Philip Firmin—though actually his legitimacy is dubious, as we have lately heard, in which case his maternal fortune is ours—and as for his paternal inheritance, we don't know whether the doctor is worth thirty thousand pounds or a shilling; yet, after all—as for Philip—he is a man; he is a gentleman; he has brains in his head, and a great honest heart of which he has offered to give the best feelings to his cousin; I say, when a poor girl has to be off with that old love, that honest and fair love, and be on with the new one, the dark one, I feel for her; and though the Brahmins are, as we know, the most genteel sect in Hindostan, I rather wish the poor child could have belonged to some lower and less rigid sect. Poor Agnes! to think that he has sat for hours, with mamma and Blanche or the governess, of course, in the room (for, you know, when she and Philip were quite wee wee things dear mamma had little amiable plans in view); has sat for hours by Miss Twysden's side pouring out his heart to her, has had, mayhap, little precious moments of confidential talk—little hasty whispers in corridors, on stairs, behind window-curtains, and—and so forth in fact. She must remember all this past; and can't, without some pang, listen on the same sofa, behind the same window-curtains, to her dark suitor pouring out his artless tales of barracks, boxing, horse-flesh, and the tender passion. He is dull, he is mean, he is ill-tempered, he is ignorant, and the other was.....; but she will do her duty: oh yes! she will do her duty! Poor Agnes! C'est à fendre le cœur. I declare I quite feel for her.

When Philip's temper was roused, I have been compelled, as his biographer, to own how very rude and disagreeable he could be; and you must acknowledge that a young man has some reason to be displeased, when he finds the girl of his heart hand in hand with another young gentleman in an occult and shady recess of the wood-work of Brighton Pier. The green waves are softly murmuring: so is the officer of the Life-Guards Green. The waves are kissing the beach. Ah, agonizing thought! I will not pursue the simile, which may be but a jealous man's mad fantasy. Of this I am sure, no pebble on that beach is cooler than polished Agnes. But, then, Philip drunk with jealousy is not a reasonable being like Philip sober. "He had a dreadful temper," Philip's dear aunt said of him afterward—"I trembled for my dear, gentle child, united forever to a man of that violence. Never, in my secret mind, could I think that their union could be a happy one. Besides, you know, the nearness of their relationship. My scruples on that score, dear Mrs. Candor, never, never could be got quite over." And these scruples came to weigh whole tons when Mangrove Hall, the house in Berkeley Square, and Mr. Woolcomb's West India island were put into the scale along with them.

Of course there was no good in remaining among those damp, reeking timbers now that the pretty little tête-à-tête was over. Little Brownie hung fondling and whining round Philip's ankles, as the party ascended to the upper air. "My child, how pale you look!" cries Mrs. Penfold, putting down her volume. Out of the captain's opal eyeballs shot lurid flames, and hot blood burned behind his yellow cheeks. In a quarrel, Mr. Philip Firmin could be particularly cool and self-possessed. When Miss Agnes rather piteously introduced him to Mrs. Penfold, he made a bow as polite and gracious as any performed by his royal father. "My little dog knew me," he said, caressing the animal. "She is a faithful little thing, and she led me down to my cousin; and—Captain Woolcomb, I think, is your name, Sir!"

As Philip curls his mustache and smiles blandly, Captain Woolcomb pulls his and scowls fiercely. "Yes, Sir," he mutters, "my name is Woolcomb." Another bow and a touch of the hat from Mr. Firmin. A touch?—a gracious wave of the hat; acknowledged by no means so gracefully by Captain Woolcomb.

To these remarks Mrs. Penfold says, "Oh!" In fact, "Oh!" is about the best thing that could be said under the circumstances.

"My cousin, Miss Twysden, looks so pale because she was out very late dancing last night. I hear it was a very pretty ball. But ought she to keep such late hours, Mrs. Penfold, with her delicate health? Indeed, you ought not, Agnes! Ought she to keep late hours, Brownie? There—don't, you little foolish thing! I gave my cousin the dog: and she's very fond of me—the dog is—still. You were saying, Captain Woolcomb, when I came up, that you would give Miss Twysden a dog on whose nose you could hang your.....I beg pardon?"

Mr. Woolcomb, as Philip made this second allusion to the peculiar nasal formation of the pug, ground his little white teeth together, and let slip a most improper monosyllable. More acute bronchial suffering was manifested on the part of Miss Twysden. Mrs. Penfold said, "The day is clouding over. I think, Agnes, I will have my chair and go home."

"May I be allowed to walk with you as far as your house?" says Philip, twiddling a little locket which he wore at his watch-chain. It was a little gold locket, with a little pale hair inside. Whose hair could it have been that was so pale and fine? As for the pretty, hieroglyphical A. T. at the back, those letters might indicate Alfred Tennyson, or Anthony Trollope, who might have given a lock of their golden hair to Philip, for I know he is an admirer of their works.

Agnes looked guiltily at the little locket. Captain Woolcomb pulled his mustache so, that you would have thought he would have pulled it off; and his opal eyes glared with fearful confusion and wrath.

"Will you please to fall back and let me speak to you, Agnes? Pardon me, Captain Woolcomb, I have a private message for my cousin; and I came from London expressly to deliver it."

"If Miss Twysden desires me to withdraw, I fall back in one moment," says the captain, clenching the little lemon-colored gloves.

"My cousin and I have lived together all our lives, and I bring her a family message. Have you any particular claim to hear it, Captain Woolcomb?"

"Not if Miss Twysden don't want me to hear it..... D—— the little brute."

"Don't kick poor little harmless Brownie! He sha'n't kick you, shall he, Brownie?"

"If the brute comes between my shins, I'll kick her!" shrieks the captain. "Hang her, I'll throw her into the sea!"

"Whatever you do to my dog I swear I will do to you!" whispers Philip to the captain.

"Where are you staying?" shrieks the captain. "Hang you, you shall hear from me."

"Quiet—Bedford Hotel. Easy, or I shall think you want the ladies to overhear."

"Your conduct is horrible, Sir," says Agnes, rapidly, in the French language. "Mr. does not comprehend it."

"—it! If you have any secrets to talk, I'll withdraw fast enough, Miss Agnes," says Othello.

"Oh, Grenville! can I have any secrets from you? Mr. Firmin is my first-cousin. We have lived together all our lives. Philip, I—I don't know whether mamma announced to you—my—my engagement with Captain Grenville Woolcomb." The agitation has brought on another severe bronchial attack. Poor little Agnes! What it is to have a delicate throat!

The pier tosses up to the skies, as though it had left its moorings—the houses on the cliff dance and reel, as though an earthquake was driving them—the sea walks up into the lodging-houses—and Philip's legs are failing from under him: it is only for a moment. When you have a large, tough double tooth out, doesn't the chair go up to the ceiling, and your head come off too? But in the next instant there is a grave gentleman before you making you a bow, and concealing something in his right sleeve. The crash is over. You are a man again. Philip clutches hold of the chain pier for a minute: it does not sink under him. The houses, after reeling for a second or two, reassume the perpendicular and bulge their bow-windows toward the main. He can see the people looking from the windows, the carriages passing, Professor Spurrier riding on the cliff with eighteen young ladies, his pupils. In long after-days he remembers those absurd little incidents with a curious tenacity.

"This news," Philip says, "was not—not altogether unexpected. I congratulate my cousin, I am sure. Captain Woolcomb, had I known this for certain, I am sure I should not have interrupted you. You were going, perhaps, to ask me to your hospitable house, Mrs. Penfold?"

"Was she though?" cries the captain.

"I have asked a friend to dine with me at the Bedford, and shall go to town, I hope, in the morning. Can I take any thing for you, Agnes? Good-by:" and he kisses his hand in quite a dégage manner, as Mrs. Penfold's chair turns eastward and he goes to the west. Silently the tall Agnes sweeps along, a fair hand laid upon her friend's chair.

It's over! it's over! She has done it. He was bound, and kept his honor, but she did not: it was she who forsook him. And I fear very much Mr. Philip's heart leaps with pleasure and an immense sensation of relief at thinking he is free. He meets half a dozen acquaintances on the cliff. He laughs, jokes, shakes hands, invites two or three to dinner in the gayest manner. He sits down on that green, not very far from his inn, and is laughing to himself, when he suddenly feels something nestling at his knee—rubbing, and nestling, and whining plaintively. "What, is that you?" It is little Brownie, who has followed him. Poor little rogue!

Then Philip bent down his head over the dog, and as it jumped on him, with little bleats, and whines, and innocent caresses, he broke out into a sob, and a great refreshing rain of tears fell from his eyes. Such a little illness! Such a mild fever! Such a speedy cure! Some people have the complaint so mildly that they are scarcely ever kept to their beds. Some bear its scars forever.

Philip sate resolutely at the hotel all night, having given special orders to the porter to say that he was at home, in case any gentleman should call. He had a faint hope, he afterward owned, that some friend of Captain Woolcomb might wait on him on that officer's part. He had a faint hope that a letter might come explaining that treason—as people will have a sick, gnawing, yearning, foolish desire for letters—letters which contain nothing, which never did contain any thing—letters which, nevertheless, you— You know, in fact, about those letters, and there is no earthly use in asking to read Philip's. Have we not all read those love-letters which, after love-quarrels, come into court sometimes? We have all read them; and how many have written them? Nine o'clock. Ten o'clock. Eleven o'clock. No challenge from the captain; no explanation from Agnes. Philip declares he slept perfectly well. But poor little Brownie the dog made a piteous howling all night in the stables. She was not a well-bred dog. You could not have hung the least hat on her nose.

We compared anon our dear Agnes to a Brahmin lady, meekly offering herself up to sacrifice according to the practice used in her highly respectable caste. Did we speak in anger or in sorrow?—surely in terms of respectful grief and sympathy. And if we pity her, ought we not likewise to pity her highly respectable parents? When the notorious Brutus ordered his sons to execution, you can't suppose he was such a brute as to be pleased? All three parties suffered by the transaction: the sons, probably, even more than their austere father; but it stands to reason that the whole trio were very melancholy. At least, were I a poet or musical composer depicting that business, I certainly should make them so. The sons, piping in a very minor key indeed; the father's manly basso, accompanied by deep wind-instruments, and interrupted by appropriate sobs. Though pretty, fair Agnes is being led to execution, I don't suppose she likes it, or that her parents are happy, who are compelled to order the tragedy.

That the rich young proprietor of Mangrove Hall should be fond of her was merely a coincidence, Mrs. Twysden afterward always averred. Not for mere wealth—ah, no! not for mines of gold—would they sacrifice their darling child! But when that sad Firmin affair happened, you see it also happened that Captain Woolcomb was much struck by dear Agnes, whom he met every where. Her scape-grace of a cousin would go nowhere. He preferred his bachelor associates, and horrible smoking and drinking habits, to the amusements and pleasures of more refined society. He neglected Agnes. There is not the slightest doubt he neglected and mortified her, and his willful and frequent absence showed how little he cared for her. Would you blame the dear girl for coldness to a man who himself showed such indifference to her? "No, my good Mrs. Candor. Had Mr. Firmin been ten times as rich as Mr. Woolcomb, I should have counseled my child to refuse him. I take the responsibility of the measure entirely on myself—I, and her father, and her brother." So Mrs. Twysden afterward spoke, in circles where an absurd and odious rumor ran, that the Twysdens had forced their daughter to jilt young Mr. Firmin in order to marry a wealthy quadroon. People will talk, you know, de me, de te. If Woolcomb's dinners had not gone off so after his marriage, I have little doubt the scandal would have died away, and he and his wife might have been pretty generally respected and visited.

Nor must you suppose, as we have said, that dear Agnes gave up her first love without a pang. That bronchitis showed how acutely the poor thing felt her position. It broke out very soon after Mr. Woolcomb's attentions became a little particular; and she actually left London in consequence. It is true that he could follow her without difficulty, but so, for the matter of that, could Philip, as we have seen, when he came down and behaved so rudely to Captain Woolcomb. And before Philip came poor Agnes could plead, "My father pressed me sair," as in the case of the notorious Mrs. Robin Gray.

Father and mother both pressed her sair. Mrs. Twysden, I think I have mentioned, wrote an admirable letter, and was aware of her accomplishment. She used to write reams of gossip regularly every week to dear uncle Ringwood when he was in the country; and when her daughter Blanche married, she is said to have written several of her new son's sermons. As a Christian mother, was she not to give her daughter her advice at this momentous period of her life? That advice went against poor Philip's chances with his cousin, who was kept acquainted with all the circumstances of the controversy of which we have just seen the issue. I do not mean to say that Mrs. Twysden gave an impartial statement of the case. What parties in a lawsuit do speak impartially on their own side or their adversaries'? Mrs. Twysden's view, as I have learned subsequently, and as imparted to her daughter, was this: That most unprincipled man, Dr. Firmin, who had already attempted, and unjustly, to deprive the Twysdens of a part of their property, had commenced in quite early life his career of outrage and wickedness against the Ringwood family. He had led dear Lord Ringwood's son, poor dear Lord Cinquars, into a career of vice and extravagance which caused the premature death of that unfortunate young nobleman. Mr. Firmin had then made a marriage, in spite of the tears and entreaties of Mrs. Twysden, with her late unhappy sister, whose whole life had been made wretched by the doctor's conduct. But the climax of outrage and wickedness was, that when he—he, a low, penniless adventurer—married Colonel Ringwood's daughter he was married already, as could be sworn by the repentant clergyman who had been forced, by threats of punishment which Dr. Firmin held over him, to perform the rite! "The mind"—Mrs. Talbot Twysden's fine mind—"shuddered at the thought of such wickedness." But most of all (for to think ill of any one whom she had once loved gave her pain) there was reason to believe that the unhappy Philip Firmin was his father's accomplice, and that he knew of his own illegitimacy, which he was determined to set aside by any fraud or artifice—(she trembled, she wept to have to say this: O Heaven! that there should be such perversity in thy creatures!) And so little store did Philip set by his mother's honor, that he actually visited the abandoned woman who acquiesced in her own infamy, and had brought such unspeakable disgrace on the Ringwood family! The thought of this crime had caused Mrs. Twysden and her dear husband nights of sleepless anguish—had made them years and years older—had stricken their hearts with a grief which must endure to the end of their days. With people so unscrupulous, so grasping, so artful as Dr. Firmin and (must she say?) his son, they were bound to be on their guard; and though they had avoided Philip, she had deemed it right, on the rare occasions when she and the young man whom she must now call her illegitimate nephew met, to behave as though she knew nothing of this most dreadful controversy.

"And now, dearest child".....Surely the moral is obvious? The dearest child "must see at once that any foolish plans which were formed in childish days and under former delusions must be cast aside forever as impossible, as unworthy of a Twysden—of a Ringwood. Be not concerned for the young man himself," wrote Mrs. Twysden—"I blush that he should bear that dear father's name who was slain in honor on Busaco's glorious field. P. F. has associates among whom he has ever been much more at home than in our refined circle, and habits which will cause him to forget you only too easily. And if near you is one whose ardor shows itself in his every word and action, whose wealth and property may raise you to a place worthy of my child, need I say, a mother's, a father's blessing go with you." This letter was brought to Miss Twysden, at Brighton, by a special messenger; and the superscription announced that it was "honored by Captain Grenville Woolcomb."

Now when Miss Agnes has had a letter to this effect (I may at some time tell you how I came to be acquainted with its contents); when she remembers all the abuse her brother lavishes against Philip, as, Heaven bless some of them! dear relatives can best do; when she thinks how cold he has of late been—how he will come smelling of cigars—how he won't conform to the usages du monde, and has neglected all the decencies of society—how she often can't understand his strange rhapsodies about poetry, painting, and the like, nor how he can live with such associates as those who seem to delight him—and now how he is showing himself actually unprincipled and abetting his horrid father; when we consider mither pressing sair, and all these points in mither's favor, I don't think we can order Agnes to instant execution for the resolution to which she is coming. She will give him up—she will give him up. Good-by, Philip. Good-by the past. Be forgotten, be forgotten, fond words spoken in not unwilling ears! Be still and breathe not, eager lips, that have trembled so near to one another! Unlock, hands, and part forever, that seemed to be formed for life's long journey! Ah, to part forever is hard; but harder and more humiliating still to part without regret!

That papa and mamma had influenced Miss Twysden in her behavior my wife and I could easily imagine, when Philip, in his wrath and grief, came to us and poured out the feelings of his heart. My wife is a repository of men's secrets, an untiring consoler and comforter; and she knows many a sad story which we are not at liberty to tell, like this one of which this person, Mr. Firmin, has given us possession.

"Father and mother's orders," shouts Philip, "I dare say, Mrs. Pendennis; but the wish was father to the thought of parting, and it was for the blackamoor's parks and acres that the girl jilted me. Look here. I told you just now that I slept perfectly well on that infernal night after I had said farewell to her. Well, I didn't. It was a lie. I walked ever so many times the whole length of the cliff, from Hove to Rottingdean almost, and then went to bed afterward, and slept a little out of sheer fatigue. And as I was passing by Horizontal Terrace—I happened to pass by there two or three times in the moonlight, like a great jackass—you know those verses of mine which I have hummed here sometimes?" (hummed! he used to roar them!) "'When the locks of burnished gold, lady, shall to silver turn!' Never mind the rest. You know the verses about fidelity and old age? She was singing them on that night, to that negro. And I heard the beggar's voice say, 'Bravo!' through the open windows."

"Ah, Philip! it was cruel," says my wife, heartily pitying our friend's anguish and misfortune. "It was cruel indeed. I am sure we can feel for you. But think what certain misery a marriage with such a person would have been! Think of your warm heart given away forever to that heartless creature."

"Laura, Laura, have you not often warned me not to speak ill of people?" says Laura's husband.

"I can't help it sometimes," cries Laura, in a transport. "I try and do my best not to speak ill of my neighbors; but the worldliness of those people shocks me so that I can't bear to be near them. They are so utterly tied and bound by conventionalities, so perfectly convinced of their own excessive high-breeding, that they seem to me more odious and more vulgar than quite low people; and I am sure Mr. Philip's friend, the Little Sister, is infinitely more ladylike than his dreary aunt or either of his supercilious cousins! Upon my word, when this lady did speak her mind, there was no mistaking her meaning."

I believe Mr. Firmin took a considerable number of people into his confidence regarding this love affair. He is one of those individuals who can't keep their secrets; and when hurt he roars so loudly that all his friends can hear. It has been remarked that the sorrows of such persons do not endure very long; nor surely was there any great need in this instance that Philip's heart should wear a lengthened mourning. Ere long he smoked his pipes, he played his billiards, he shouted his songs; he rode in the Park for the pleasure of severely cutting his aunt and cousins when their open carriage passed, or of riding down Captain Woolcomb or his cousin Ringwood, should either of those worthies come in his way.

One day, when the old Lord Ringwood came to town for his accustomed spring visit, Philip condescended to wait upon him, and was announced to his lordship just as Talbot Twysden and Ringwood his son were taking leave of their noble kinsman. Philip looked at them with a flashing eye and a distended nostril, according to his swaggering wont. I dare say they on their part bore a very mean and hang-dog appearance; for my lord laughed at their discomfiture, and seemed immensely amused as they slunk out of the door when Philip came hectoring in.

"So, Sir, there has been a family row. Heard all about it: at least their side. Your father did me the favor to marry my niece, having another wife already?"

"Having no other wife already, Sir—though my dear relations were anxious to show that he had."

"Wanted your money; thirty thousand pound is not a trifle. Ten thousand apiece for those children. And no more need of any confounded pinching and scraping, as they have to do at Beaunash Street. Affair off between you and Agnes? Absurd affair. So much the better."

"Yes, Sir, so much the better."

"Have ten thousand apiece. Would have twenty thousand if they got yours. Quite natural to want it."

"Quite."

"Woolcomb a sort of negro, I understand. Fine property here, besides the West India rubbish. Violent man—so people tell me. Luckily Agnes seems a cool, easy-going woman, and must put up with the rough as well as the smooth in marrying a property like that. Very lucky for you that that woman persists there was no marriage with your father. Twysden says the doctor bribed her. Take it he's not got much money to bribe, unless you gave some of yours."

"I don't bribe people to bear false witness, my lord—and if—"

"Don't be in a huff; I didn't say so. Twysden says so—perhaps thinks so. When people are at law they believe any thing of one another."

"I don't know what other people may do, Sir. If I had another man's money, I should not be easy until I had paid him back. Had my share of my grandfather's property not been lawfully mine—and for a few hours I thought it was not—please God, I would have given it up to its rightful owners—at least my father would."

"Why, hang it all, man, you don't mean to say your father has not settled with you?"

Philip blushed a little. He had been rather surprised that there had been no settlement between him and his father.

"I am only of age a few months, Sir. I am not under any apprehension. I get my dividends regularly enough. One of my grandfather's trustees, General Baynes, is in India. He is to return almost immediately, or we should have sent a power of attorney out to him. There's no hurry about the business."

Philip's maternal grandfather, and Lord Ringwood's brother, the late Colonel Philip Ringwood, had died possessed of but trifling property of his own; but his wife had brought him a fortune of sixty thousand pounds, which was settled on their children, and in the names of trustees—Mr. Briggs, a lawyer, and Colonel Baynes, an East India officer, and friend of Mrs. Philip Ringwood's family. Colonel Baynes had been in England some eight years before; and Philip remembered a kind old gentleman coming to see him at school, and leaving tokens of his bounty behind. The other trustee, Mr. Briggs, a lawyer of considerable county reputation, was dead long since, having left his affairs in an involved condition. During the trustee's absence and the son's minority Philip's father received the dividends on his son's property, and liberally spent them on the boy. Indeed, I believe that for some little time at college, and during his first journeys abroad, Mr. Philip spent rather more than the income of his maternal inheritance, being freely supplied by his father, who told him not to stint himself. He was a sumptuous man, Dr. Firmin—open-handed—subscribing to many charities—a lover of solemn good cheer. The doctor's dinners and the doctor's equipages were models in their way; and I remember the sincere respect with which my uncle the major (the family guide in such matters) used to speak of Dr. Firmin's taste. "No duchess in London, Sir," he would say, "drove better horses than Mrs. Firmin. Sir George Warrender, Sir, could not give a better dinner, Sir, than that to which we sat down yesterday." And for the exercise of these civic virtues the doctor had the hearty respect of the good major.

"Don't tell me, Sir," on the other hand, Lord Ringwood would say; "I dined with the fellow once—a swaggering fellow, Sir; but a servile fellow. The way he bowed and flattered was perfectly absurd. Those fellows think we like it—and we may. Even at my age, I like flattery—any quantity of it; and not what you call delicate, but strong, Sir. I like a man to kneel down and kiss my shoe-strings. I have my own opinion of him afterward, but that is what I like—what all men like; and that is what Firmin gave in quantities. But you could see that his house was monstrously expensive. His dinner was excellent, and you saw it was good every day—not like your dinners, my good Maria; not like your wines, Twysden, which, hang it, I can't swallow, unless I send 'em in myself. Even at my own house, I don't give that kind of wine on common occasions which Firmin used to give. I drink the best myself, of course, and give it to some who know; but I don't give it to common fellows, who come to hunting dinners, or to girls and boys who are dancing at my balls."

"Yes; Mr. Firmin's dinners were very handsome—and a pretty end came of the handsome dinners!" sighed Mrs. Twysden.

"That's not the question; I am only speaking about the fellow's meat and drink, and they were both good. And it's my opinion that fellow will have a good dinner wherever he goes."

I had the fortune to be present at one of these feasts, which Lord Ringwood attended, and at which I met Philip's trustee, General Baynes, who had just arrived from India. I remember now the smallest details of the little dinner—the brightness of the old plate, on which the doctor prided himself, and the quiet comfort, not to say splendor, of the entertainment. The general seemed to take a great liking to Philip, whose grandfather had been his special friend and comrade in arms. He thought he saw something of Philip Ringwood in Philip Firmin's face.

"Ah, indeed!" growls Lord Ringwood.

"You ain't a bit like him," says the downright general. "Never saw a handsomer or more open-looking fellow than Philip Ringwood."

"Oh! I dare say I looked pretty open myself forty years ago," said my lord; "now I'm shut, I suppose. I don't see the least likeness in this young man to my brother."

"That is some sherry as old as the century," whispers the host; "it is the same the Prince Regent liked so at the Mansion House dinner, five-and-twenty years ago."

"Never knew any thing about wine; was always tipping liqueurs and punch. What do you give for this sherry, doctor?"

The doctor sighed, and looked up to the chandelier. "Drink it while it lasts, my good lord; but don't ask me the price. The fact is, I don't like to say what I gave for it."

"You need not stint yourself in the price of sherry, doctor," cries the general, gayly; "you have but one son, and he has a fortune of his own, as I happen to know. You haven't dipped it, master Philip?"

"I fear, Sir, I may have exceeded my income sometimes, in the last three years; but my father has helped me."

"Exceeded nine hundred a year! Upon my word! When I was a sub, my friends gave me fifty pounds a year, and I never was a shilling in debt! What are men coming to now?"

"If doctors drink Prince Regent's sherry at ten guineas a dozen, what can you expect of their sons, General Baynes?" grumbles my lord.

"My father gives you his best, my lord," says Philip, gayly; "if you know of any better, he will get it for you. Si non his utere mecum! Please to pass me that decanter, Pen!"

I thought the old lord did not seem ill pleased at the young man's freedom; and now, as I recall it, think I can remember that a peculiar silence and anxiety seemed to weigh upon our host—upon him whose face was commonly so anxious and sad.

The famous sherry, which had made many voyages to Indian climes before it acquired its exquisite flavor, had traveled some three or four times round the doctor's polished table, when Brice, his man, entered with a letter on his silver tray. Perhaps Philip's eyes and mine exchanged glances in which ever so small a scintilla of mischief might sparkle. The doctor often had letters when he was entertaining his friends; and his patients had a knack of falling ill at awkward times.

"Gracious Heavens!" cries the doctor, when he read the dispatch—it was a telegraphic message. "The poor Grand Duke!"

"What Grand Duke?" asks the surly lord of Ringwood.

"My earliest patron and friend—the Grand Duke of Gröningen! Seized this morning at eleven at Potzendorff! Has sent for me. I promised to go to him if ever he had need of me. I must go! I can save the night-train yet. General! our visit to the city must be deferred till my return. Get a portmanteau, Brice; and call a cab at once. Philip will entertain my friends for the evening. My dear lord, you won't mind an old doctor leaving you to attend an old patient? I will write from Gröningen. I shall be there on Friday morning. Farewell, gentlemen! Brice, another bottle of that sherry! I pray, don't let any body stir! God bless you, Philip, my boy!" And with this the doctor went up, took his son by the hand, and laid the other very kindly on the young man's shoulder. Then he made a bow round the table to his guests—one of his graceful bows, for which he was famous. I can see the sad smile on his face now, and the light from the chandelier over the dining-table glancing from his shining forehead, and casting deep shadows on to his cheek from his heavy brows.

The departure was a little abrupt, and of course cast somewhat of a gloom upon the company.

"My carriage ain't ordered till ten—must go on sitting here, I suppose. Confounded life doctors' must be! Called up any hour in the night! Get their fees! Must go!" growled the great man of the party.

"People are glad enough to have them when they are ill, my lord. I think I have heard that once, when you were at Ryde....."

The great man started back as if a little shock of cold water had fallen on him; and then looked at Philip with not unfriendly glances. "Treated for gout—so he did. Very well, too!" said my lord; and whispered, not inaudibly, "Cool hand, that boy!" And then his lordship fell to talk with General Baynes about his campaigning, and his early acquaintance with his own brother, Philip's grandfather.

The general did not care to brag about his own feats of arms, but was loud in praises of his old comrade. Philip was pleased to hear his grandsire so well spoken of. The general had known Dr. Firmin's father also, who likewise had been a colonel in the famous old Peninsular army. "A Tartar that fellow was, and no mistake!" said the good officer. "Your father has a strong look of him; and you have a glance of him at times. But you remind me of Philip Ringwood not a little; and you could not belong to a better man."

"Ha!" says my lord. There had been differences between him and his brother. He may have been thinking of days when they were friends. Lord Ringwood now graciously asked if General Baynes was staying in London? But the general had only come to do this piece of business, which must now be delayed. He was too poor to live in London. He must look out for a country place, where he and his six children could live cheaply. "Three boys at school, and one at college, Mr. Philip—you know what that must cost; though, thank my stars, my college boy does not spend nine hundred a year. Nine hundred! Where should we be if he did?" In fact, the days of nabobs are long over, and the general had come back to his native country with only very small means for the support of a great family.

When my lord's carriage came he departed, and the other guests presently took their leave. The general, who was a bachelor for the nonce, remained a while, and we three prattled over cheroots in Philip's smoking-room. It was a night like a hundred I have spent there, and yet how well I remember it! We talked about Philip's future prospects, and he communicated his intentions to us in his lordly way. As for practicing at the bar: "No, Sir!" he said, in reply to General Baynes's queries, he should not make much hand of that: shouldn't if he were ever so poor. He had his own money, and his father's, and he condescended to say that he might, perhaps, try for Parliament should an eligible opportunity offer. "Here's a fellow born with a silver spoon in his mouth," says the general, as we walked away together. "A fortune to begin with; a fortune to inherit. My fortune was two thousand pounds and the price of my two first commissions; and when I die my children will not be quite so well off as their father was when he began!"

Having parted with the old officer at his modest sleeping quarters near his club, I walked to my own home, little thinking that yonder cigar, off which I had shaken some of the ashes in Philip's smoking-room, was to be the last tobacco I ever should smoke there. The pipe was smoked out. The wine was drunk. When that door closed on me, it closed for the last time—at least was never more to admit me as Philip's, as Dr. Firmin's, guest and friend. I pass the place often now. My youth comes back to me as I gaze at those blank, shining windows. I see myself a boy, and Philip a child; and his fair mother; and his father, the hospitable, the melancholy, the magnificent. I wish I could have helped him. I wish somehow he had borrowed money. He never did. He gave me his often. I have never seen him since that night when his own door closed upon him.

On the second day after the doctor's departure, as I was at breakfast with my family, I received the following letter:

MY DEAR PENDENNIS,—Could I have seen you in private on Tuesday night, I might have warned you of the calamity which was hanging over my house. But to what good end? That you should know a few weeks, hours, before what all the world will ring with to-morrow? Neither you nor I, nor one whom we both love, would have been the happier for knowing my misfortunes a few hours sooner. In four-and-twenty hours every club in London will be busy with talk of the departure of the celebrated Dr. Firmin—the wealthy Dr. Firmin; a few months more and (I have strict and confidential reason to believe) hereditary rank would have been mine; but Sir George Firmin would have been an insolvent man, and his son Sir Philip a beggar. Perhaps the thought of this honor has been one of the reasons which has determined me on expatriating myself sooner than I otherwise needed to have done.

George Firmin, the honored, the wealthy physician, and his son a beggar? I see you are startled at the news! You wonder how, with a great practice, and no great ostensible expenses, such ruin should have come upon me—upon him. It has seemed as if for years past Fate has been determined to make war upon George Brand Firmin; and who can battle against Fate? A man universally admitted to be of good judgment, I have embarked in mercantile speculations the most promising. Every thing upon which I laid my hand has crumbled to ruin; but I can say with the Roman bard, "Impavidum ferient ruine." And, almost penniless, almost aged, an exile driven from my country, I seek another where I do not despair—I even have a firm belief that I shall be enabled to repair my shattered fortunes! My race has never been deficient in courage, and Philip and Philip's father must use all theirs, so as to be enabled to face the dark times which menace them. Si celeres quatit pennas Fortuna, we must resign what she gave us, and bear our calamity with unshaken hearts!

There is a man, I own to you, whom I can not, I must not face. General Baynes has just come from India, with but very small savings, I fear; and these are jeopardized by his imprudence and my most cruel and unexpected misfortune. I need not tell you that my all would have been my boy's. My will, made long since, will be found in the tortoise-shell secretaire standing in my consulting-room under the picture of Abraham offering up Isaac. In it you will see that every thing, except annuities to old and deserving servants and a legacy to one excellent and faithful woman whom I own I have wronged—my all, which once was considerable, is left to my boy.

I am now worth less than nothing, and have compromised Philip's property along with my own. As a man of business, General Baynes, Colonel Ringwood's old companion in arms, was culpably careless, and I—alas! that I must own it—deceived him. Being the only surviving trustee (Mrs. Philip Ringwood's other trustee was an unprincipled attorney who has been long dead), General B. signed a paper authorizing, as he imagined, my bankers to receive Philip's dividends, but, in fact, giving me the power to dispose of the capital sum. On my honor, as a man, as a gentleman, as a father, Pendennis, I hoped to replace it! I took it; I embarked it in speculations in which it sank down with ten times the amount of my own private property. Half-year after half-year, with straitened means and with the greatest difficulty to myself, my poor boy has had his dividend; and he at least has never known what was want or anxiety until now. Want? Anxiety? Pray Heaven he never may suffer the sleepless anguish, the racking care which has pursued me! "Post equitem sedet atra cura," our favorite poet says. Ah! how truly, too, does he remark, "Patriæ quis exul se quoque fugit?" Think you where I go grief and remorse will not follow me? They will never leave me until I shall return to this country—for that I shall return, my heart tells me—until I can reimburse General Baynes, who stands indebted to Philip through his incautiousness and my overpowering necessity; and my heart—an erring but fond father's heart—tells me that my boy will not eventually lose a penny by my misfortune.

I own, between ourselves, that this illness of the Grand Duke of Gröningen was a pretext which I put forward.

You will hear of me ere long from the place whither for some time past I have determined on bending my steps. I placed £100 on Saturday, to Philip's credit, at his banker's. I take little more than that sum with me; depressed, yet full of hope; having done wrong, yet determined to retrieve it, and vowing that ere I die my poor boy shall not have to blush at bearing the name of

GEORGE BRAND FIRMIN.

Good-by, dear Philip! Your old friend will tell you of my misfortunes. When I write again, it will be to tell you where to address me; and wherever I am, or whatever misfortunes oppress me, think of me always as your fond FATHER.

I had scarce read this awful letter when Philip Firmin himself came into our breakfast-room, looking very much disturbed.

POOR CHIPS.

"ALL hands, ahoy!"

It was my middle watch below. For a weary week and more we had been beating against the baffling sou'west winds of the Cape; but with the morning of this day came a fair northerly wind, and we were making the most of it. Contrary to the usual custom of compliment to these rough latitudes, we had not sent down our lighter spars from aloft; and so with the first breath of the favorable breeze were flying before it under a cloud of royals and stun'sails. But as the day grew the wind freshened; one by one the royals were furled and stun'sails sent in, though our Captain, whose hardihood in carrying sail had become proverbial, manfully held on every thing to the last, so that when our watch left the deck the ship was staggering under top-gallant sails, top-sails, and courses. Soon after going below we heard the other watch setting jibs and stay-sails, by which we inferred that the wind was hauling on the quarter. But I was drowsy; the creaking of the jib-sheet block overhead was soon merged in the chirping of robins round the door-way at home; in the rattling cordage I heard but the stir of autumn leaves, and the groanings of the strained masts were to my retrospective fancy but the swaying of nut-laden trees in the merry woods which we boys were wont to rifle. Thus wrapped in dreams of the past I lost all consciousness of the present until recalled to a ship's life and duty by the hoarse cry at the fore-castle hatchway, "All hands to shorten sail, ahoy!"

We were not long in getting on deck, as a sailor's toilet is soon made. He has no dainty collar to adjust, no wonderful cravat to tie; nor is he very particular as to cleansing his teeth or running the point of a marline-spike round the rims of his finger-nails, when thus hurriedly called. A growl, a shake, and he is dressed. Confusion enough was visible and audible on deck when we got there. It was "clew up!" and "clew down!" "let go halliards!" here, and "start away sheets!" there. And well they might be starting sheets, for the wind, fair when our watch went below at eight bells, had now hauled to the westward and was blowing a whole gale. The watch on deck had furled the top-gallant sails, clewed up the courses, settled away the top-sails, and were then furling the mizzen. Our watch took its accustomed station at the fore. Many hands make light work; in a few seconds the sail was lying to the yard in loose folds, and the word was given to hand it. After belaying my clew-line, I stepped to the halliards to see that they were set well taut—not deeming it necessary to go aloft, since the yard was already alive with more men than could well work—when the mate, who, after his customary fashion, had been stamping about deck and cursing the whole crew for a lubberly set of land-crabs, sung out to know who was forward. I answered.

“Lay aloft, then, you Sandy, and see why they don’t pick up that sail, and tell me if you find any skulkers in the top.”

“Ay, ay, Sir!” and I sprang cheerily into the rigging.

On getting into the top I found Chips shivering under the lee of the fore-mast head.

“Chips! Chips!” said I, “why aren’t you out on the yard there? The mate is swearing a blue streak below, and if he learns of your being stowed away here he’ll make you ship all sorts of seas!”

“Oh, Sandy!” said Chips, “I’m too weak; the wind would strip me from the spar:” and the tremors that shook the poor fellow’s frame as he clung cowering to the eyes of the rigging confirmed his words.

“Any skulkers there on the top, Sandy?” shouted the mate from below.

“Not a soul, Sir!” I sung out, cheerily, and swinging myself to the yard above, assisted as best I could in stowing the bunt of the sail; for, as I’ve already remarked, the yard was already packed with more men than could well work.

It may have been a lie that, but if no more aggravated charge of falsehood be brought against me when this watch below is out and all hands are summoned to the great quarter-deck above, my soul will rest sufficiently easy with itself on the score of truth. Singular as it may seem, I look back at the dim face of that untruth with the most perfect satisfaction; I pet its memory somewhat as one would fondle the recollection of a dear departed child. I’ve achieved volumes since, yet I regard that sentence as a more golden one than any that I’ve written. I am sure it embodies a better sentiment than men are accustomed to utter in daily and familiar conversations.

A word here to tell the reader who Chips was all this while. The name, you know, is a generic one, and applied to all ship’s carpenters. Sailors are most sensible godfathers, and always christen with an eye to the preservation of “the unities”—thus the cooper is known as Bungs, and the blacksmith as Smut. But our Chips was of a gentler humanity than the generality of these “hewers of wood,” and, of course, a favorite with the crew. Something more than a pun was meant when a frolicsome youngster swore that our Chips was of finer grain than any that ever before floated. It was in the hope of re-establishing his health, much impaired by some pulmonary disease, that he came to sea; and for a time, while cruising in the balmy tropical latitudes, it seemed as though his object would be attained. The soft, caressing breezes that wander in the courts of the sun, with the bewitching nights and refulgent days, would woo the weary soul back, if any temptation on earth could, from the very verge of the grave; for it almost seems impossible that any brighter heaven can lie beyond. But as we sailed southward, and the Southern Cross began to bend above our heads, and still southward until the Magellan Clouds poised themselves over the royal-truck, the rough winds and icy sleet which reveal themselves with these wonders proved too much for his frail constitution, and he failed rapidly. It was then that we began to speak of him as “Poor Chips;” and we spoke thus quite as much in love as in pity. It came out afterward that he had been engaged to a girl in Boston. I remember that often in his sleep he would murmur the name “Mary Haley;” and in our tropical cruises, through long hours of the night-watches, he would sit between the knight-heads or the windlass bitts humming a song of which I can only remember that the refrain was Aileen-a-Roon.

I have said that his gentle manners and unobtrusive disposition endeared him to all on ship-board. I should have said to all except the mate; but then to have the good-will of the latter was small credit to the man with whom it rested. Years have passed since I sailed with that mate, but looking back through their intervening vista, I see him before me now, as then, a perfect nightmare of meanness and ugliness. His quarter-deck name was Maxim, but in the fore-castle he was known as “Devil-bug.” Tall and snaky in build, with that unsightly curvature of spine which makes a ship what we call “hogged,” a man stoop-shouldered, the villainy of his face hedged in by a pair of brick-red whiskers, sure no man ever lived on whose whole exterior nature wrote “tyrant, coward, and scoundrel” more plainly. His arms, long, lean, and bowed, as they hung loosely by his side, might not inaptly be compared to a pair of parentheses; but it was a miserable affair of a heart that they inclosed. Indeed nature seemed aware that it was not worthy of appearing in the body of her work, and so inclosed it in brackets—a sort of postscript to a most miserably-constructed sentence. From the first he took a dislike to Chips, and never suffered an opportunity of venting it to pass unimproved. He reveled in that infernal delight which a mean nature ever has in degrading a nobler one. Was a ringbolt to be scoured, a mast slushed, or any other piece of drudgery, important or unimportant, to be done, to Chips it was appointed. Even at the time of which I write, in that rough weather of which all who have ever sailed around the Horn have had experience, while the poor fellow was so weak that in dressing himself he had to steady by laying one hand on his bunk, if not on deck as soon as the others of the watch, this ever-to-be-execrated Devil-bug would rush into the forecandle, shake him from his hold, and "freshen his way," as he termed it, up the ladder with a rope's end. Many a hand longed on these occasions to drop a handspike on the rascal's head; but discipline prevailed, and his punishment was not then.

To return now to my story.

While on the top-sail yard I noticed that the pannel-band had worked loose, and notifying the mate, he ordered me to remain and make it secure. I detained Chips with me, nominally to assist, really to keep him beyond the reach of his tormentor. Having finished the little job we went down. The balance of the men were handing the mainsail, and I stood by to attend their calls to the deck, while Chips busied himself in coiling up the loose rigging. At this moment the mate came along with a spare gasket in his hand.

"Here, you Chips, take this gasket, and lay out and stow that flying-jib snug."

Now this was merely a "work-up job," and none knew it better than myself, since I had furled the sail in question the evening previous, and at his order had taken special pains to make it secure; moreover it was a task of no inconsiderable danger to a landsman like Chips, as the ship was rearing and plunging in that fierce head-sea like a crazy colt—her jib-boom one moment pointing to the zenith, the next to the nadir, and describing in every sweep a full semicircle. Accordingly I ventured to say that I myself had furled the flying-jib before our watch went below, had taken the precaution to put extra stops about it, and would stake my interest in the voyage that it was safe.

"Ah!" said the mate, "since you are so fond of working your jaw-tackle you can lay out there too."

Of course it was not for me to reply, but to obey. It is the very gospel of the sea to go when ordered, and taking the gasket in my hand I started forward. I heard Chips beg to be excused from the work, alleging that his legs were so weak they could hardly support him about deck, and he feared he should fall overboard. I also heard the rude curse and the still ruder kick given him in reply; and the fellow came crawling out after me on the long spar which stretched like a gibbet-arm far over the water. We gained the flying jib-boom, and made rapid work of it—for really there was nothing to do of furling but to go through the form commanded by the mate—and I was passing the last turn of the gasket, when the foot-rope suddenly slackened beneath my feet, a wild cry of despair rang out on the midnight air, and I was alone on the spar. Looking downward I saw Chips clinging to a piece of rigging that dangled under the bows. My God! I shall never forget the freezing horror of that face as, lit by the phosphorescent glare of the parted waters, it looked upward for a help that my arm was powerless to give. Even now it haunts me of nights, and I often start from sleep with the cry on my lips which I then, more from instinct than volition, sent thrilling through the ship—"Man overboard!" A terrible cry that, to mingle with the whistling of the gale. For a moment only he thus hung. The ship plunged her head quivering under water, and when she again rose, shaking the spray from her hempen mane like a drenched lioness, Chips was gone. One piercing cry for help came from far to leeward, but none could be given. It would have been impossible to lower a boat in such a sea; and though the life-buoy was detached from the taffrail, it is not probable that any hand ever rose to clutch it.

With us rude sailors the name of Chips became a "household word;" and many a rough hand would wipe away a tear when it was mentioned, or when the owner looked at the empty hammock which now swung untenanted. And what said the mate?—that "the skulking scoundrel had gone where he could 'soldier' forever if he pleased."

Well, we doubled the Cape at last, and gliding along in the smooth waters of the rightly-named Pacific, soon forgot the hardships through which we had so lately passed. In the nights of brimming beauty which crown the cup of the low latitudes we drank oblivion to the manifold horrors of the Horn. One night—it was Larboline's middle-watch on deck—while bowling along at perhaps seven knots the hour, most of us lounging about deck in drowsy attitudes, Aileen-a-Roon came swelling on the air as distinctly as any human voice could give it utterance. It seemed to come from a little in advance of the ship, now dying away in plaintive melody, and anon rising in cadence, as Chips was wont to hum it. There could be no mistake about the tune; and the loungers, as by one accord, sprang to their feet to assure themselves that they were indeed awake.

"It comes from the flying-jib-boom end," quoth Old George, the Nestor of our crew. "I knew he would come again, and I know what and whom he wants."

"What's all this nonsense about?" cried the mate, angrily, coming forward, as was his wont whenever conversation drew a group together on the forecandle: he was ever fearful that the crew were hatching some conspiracy against him. He knew that he deserved to be killed, and was correspondingly suspicious that some plot might be laid to that end. Perhaps, too, he saw the shadow of his doom beckoning him on.

"Chips has come back to finish passing his gasket, Sir," said Old George. "Listen! Do you not hear him out there humming his Aileen-a-Roon?"

"Aileen-a-Roon be d—d!" said the mate; "it's the flying-jib sheet-block chafing on the topmast stay. You didn't seize that Scotchman as I told you, you old rascal. Look out for your watch below to-morrow. I'll soon clap a stop on this ghost's jaw of yours." And, taking a marline-spike in his hand, he started out on the bowsprit.

Now let no reader at this moment exult in that he has detected in his author a statement that passes the bounds of probability. None better than myself know that it is not customary for the mate of a ship to amuse himself by doing odd jobs in the rigging at night; I should never have ventured to invent such a story. But again I say, gentlemen, that the finger of Fate was in it; he was beckoned on by the shadow of his doom, and followed. Well, we watched the mate out, and, sure enough, when he seated himself crosswise on the spar, the melody ceased.

"Old Devil-bug is right about the ghost," said a merry younker; "no man once well clear of this old hulk would come back again, dead or alive!"

No one gainsayed him; and, half-ashamed of our ready superstition, we resumed our lounging postures about the deck. Time passed on, and eight bells was struck. The relief watch turned out, but where was the mate to pass the orders of the night to his second? We all saw him go out on the jib-boom, but none remembered to have seen him come in. The second mate called "Mr. Maxim!" so loudly that he woke the Captain, but no Mr. Maxim made answer. All hands were turned up, the ship hove to, and the boats lowered and sent in all directions, groping through the night, but without avail. And though we shortened sail and cruised vigilantly in that vicinity for a week no tidings came of the missing mate.

Old George shook his head and said, "I told you so." The young sailor never again laughed at the credulity of his elders.

My story is done. In all essential particulars it is true. If you doubt the assertion of the author, seek any one of the men that sailed in the whale ship Walter Scott on her cruise in '51, and see if the whole yarn does not have his corroboration. Or, granting the main facts, you may laugh and say that I have tortured a mere coincidence into a miracle; that the flying-jib-sheet hummed "Aileen-a-Roon;" that the mate fell overboard unheeded, and that the rushing waters stifled his cry for assistance. Very possibly you are right. Sailors reason by perception, landsmen by induction. Retribution came where it was richly deserved; the precise manner in which the bolt fell is scarcely worthy of argument. We undoubtedly agree as to the hand by which it was launched.

I have told you of Chips' death, and what came of it. You can draw your own conclusions. Certain it is that two women in New England wear black—the one mourns a husband that went down to sea and never returned; the other, a lover.

"MY NANNIE O."

THERE she is, looking straight down at us with those frank brown eyes.

"No, they are black!"

Begging your pardon, they are brown—hazel brown. I ought to know, for I have met their rays these thirteen years—ever since I began to think and speculate. Hazel hair too; that prettiest and oddest combination—eyes and hair to match. You can see the color in the curls there, running out over her neck; how could she ever roll it back and submit to that powdering process? Yet it's pretty. The forehead shows its clear brunette tan, the cheeks their rose, "and mouth of your own geraniums red," in brighter contrast for those soft white puffs above them. There's nothing else so different from to-day. That blue silk is fashionable like your own, my lady—a square corsage; and the neck is as white as yours, and the shoulders shaped as finely. Yet she lived more than half a century ago.

No wonder you say, "Oh that those lips had language!" I have, hundreds of times, poring into their "own geraniums red," like a bee into a rose, yearning to have some dear old little fairy waft her down with her wand from that painted enchantment, and see her step stately in hoop and farthingale along the gallery. I call it a gallery, you know, though it's only a wide hall, with no grandeur of fresco or carving; but it is hung with these old family portraits, through and through. If my father had a passion in the world, it was for collecting these painted semblances of his race. And here they are, a motley assemblage enough, "peace to their ashes!" Here they are—man, matron, and maid, soldiers, priests, and scholars; and one or two with a ribbon across their broad breasts, starred, and otherwise ornamented with signs of a foreign service. Courtly looking cavaliers, in good sooth, with faces that remind you of those young French heroes whose pictures are scattered all through the history of Napoleon. These are my favorites; but my father was fonder of "My Nannie O" than all the rest.

"How came she by that title?"

Oh, you'll find out soon enough. Wait—I'm going to let her tell her own story. I've got her diary—written with her own hand—that hand whose perfect copy clasps the great fan of pheasant feathers there. Just think, my lady, while you wave and flirt that little sandal-wood bijou, besprinkled with its hundreds of flashing gems, of the cunning dexterity those other small fair fingers must have exerted in the management of that enormous thing. Yet, as Domenichino said of his early paintings, "It is not so bad, after all." You perceive how the baby proportions of the hand are enhanced by its effort to compass the fan's bulky size, and how, in the statelily movements, the soft, plummy tips would waft like some sunset cloud between the lovely girl and her adorers. I am not sure, my lady, but she had the best of it. Behind this screen of defense, what chances she held of carrying on a prolonged siege, wherein her coy resistance was charmingly relieved by a bright glance, or a blush now and then flashing out through the plummy pheasant feathers, and setting the suitor's heart in a flame, to be quenched and fired again by the same tantalizing process! What can you do, mia cara, with that pretty toy? You lean your pretty chin upon it in pretty attitudes, it is true; you tap it lightly against those milky pearls, which stand in rows there between your scarlet lips; you mockingly raise it before your face in a playful threat; but "My Nannie O" had but to turn her slim wrist, and build a wall between herself and the sighing swain. Fifty years ago! What a time!

"And did she live to lose that dimpled smoothness, that bonnie brown hair, that rose-geranium color?"

No; that is the best of it. There is no bowed figure, and wrinkled face, and silver hair, that once bloomed fifty years ago, and called herself "My Nannie O." No.

"Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead."

And she is always beautiful Evelyn Hope, you know, now to us. Don't you like it better so?

Fifty years ago, then, she was twenty—a rose in bloom. A remote branch of the family—some far cousin. I am sacrilegiously unmindful of these matters, my father would tell you; he'd give you the exact relation, which you don't care for in the least. All you care for is the beautiful face there, looking down out of hazel eyes at you; and while you softly utter, "Oh that those lips had language!" I will show you what language they had fifty years ago, in

HER DIARY.

June 10, 1795.

To-day I am twenty years old, and to-day I promised to begin a diary—a daily diary to the end of my life. The end of my life! It makes me shiver! I wonder when I shall die! and I am so afraid of that thing called Death—that thing! Yes, an actual presence. Dr. Parker says I must be very wicked to feel so; and if I don't repent and love the Lord, that I shall go to hell. His words are mere words—nothing more to me. "Repent and love the Lord!" He talks as if I had only to will repentance and love. Let us see; what have I to repent of? Last night, in dancing with Mr. Glarney, I let my glove fall, and when he picked it up so gallantly, and asked to keep it, I pretended a great deal of propriety, and demanded it back again, when I didn't care a pin for it. Indeed, to tell the whole honest truth, which I will do in this diary, because it is between my soul and I, I wouldn't care for his keeping it provided he had stolen it—'twas a pretty glove, and shaped to a pretty hand! In this, then, I have acted a lie; and I ought to repent of lies. I wonder what Tom's wife would say; I'll ask her. She's very decorous and very strict. I shall ask her—"Jane, what should I have replied to Mr. Glarney, when he picked up my glove in the dance the other night, and asked to keep it?" Jane will look at me in silent amazement a moment, then she will answer, "Why, 'No,' of course!" "What, when I would rather he would have it than not? Wouldn't that be a lie, Jane?"

Then how she will talk to me. I "must be very corrupt to feel so!" I am not corrupt! I am only natural. When he picked up the glove, and asked for it, the thought came, quick as a flash, that it was a pretty thing for him to ask, and that it would be a pretty reminder of me. Then another flash brought up all the Sister Janes and the Aunt Prudences, and I answered "No!" Eh! but what did the naughty Nannie do next? She gave him the flower that had lain on her neck through the evening; and when he kissed the flower and said, "Happy flower, who does not envy thee?" she made him a sweeping courtesy, and sent him a laughing response very softly, so that the Sister Janes and the Aunt Prudences couldn't hear!

French women do these things, Jane will tell me, and French women are coquettes. Well, but then I came honestly enough by it, Sister Jane. There is blood of the ancien régime in my veins, you know. Viscount Chastellux, who came over in the French fleet, was mamma's brother, dear; that's his portrait over the fireplace in mamma's room, you remember. He named me, too; and they say I look like him—have his nose and his hair. Only think—that splendid young officer! I am so vain of it my head is quite turned.

There, I had forgotten that I was to confess my sins here on this white paper. Good little page, I'll call thee a white-robed priest. That's it—I'll turn Catholic just quietly here, and tell my beads on that pearl necklace De Grémont gave me. Now, down on your knees, Nannie, to confession!

Firstly, I have told a lie. Secondly, I staid away from church last Sabbath because my new bonnet wasn't done. Thirdly, I got into a passion with Hannah for putting powder on my hair when I told her not, and boxed her ears. That's a pretty story to tell my lovers, eh? I know some of my sweet sex who would relish the telling, though. Fourthly, after making beaux yeux at young Parson Leighton, I refused him flatly yesterday. Fifthly, I went out on Tuesday with my young brother John, and gave him the slip while he stopped to watch the man with the puppet-show; and just at that time Mr. Glarney, whom papa does not favor, came up with me, and we went out on the old road for a walk, and didn't get back for two hours or more. Sixthly, When papa found this out by little John, and reproved me with sharpness, I swept him a saucy courtesy, and reminded him that I should never demean my old French blood: his first marriage, before he ever saw mamma, was a mésalliance with one of the provincial bourgeoisie. Seventhly, On going out of the room I encountered little John, and scolded him for tale-bearing, shaming him into tears and indignant denials. Whereupon I told him that he should die in silence, if he would be a gentleman, rather than tell secrets; and I have treated him very cruelly since. Eighthly, I refused to ride with Mr. Edward Overing yesterday morning because he chose to give me some advice about my conduct on the night of the ball, telling him I wished there would be another revolution, that we might see specimens of gentlemen here in America such as my mother remembers, and telling him various savage things that I'll warrant spoil his sleep last night. Ninthly, When my mother asked me to go to Mrs. Overing's this afternoon with the apple-jelly for little Sally, who has the measles, I answered “No!” very unbecomingly, and said I was tired of the Overings, and wouldn't wait on them any longer. There was no one else to go then, and I saw her set out herself without a word.

Here's a list for you, good priest. Which do I repent? Which? Hear that! Well, I don't repent giving Mr. Glarney the flower, nor the courtesy; but about the lie? Oh, I'm repenting that in sackcloth and ashes! And I don't feel very bad about my bonnet sin, though I suppose that is because I am so wicked. But I am sorry I boxed Hannah's ears, for it was not becoming a gentlewoman; and Hannah is a good girl, though she tries my temper with her forgetfulness. Then I am not sorry I refused Parson Leighton, for I didn't want him, and I couldn't help making beaux yeux at him any more than I could help breathing; for he has beaux yeux himself without the making, and he is forever following me about. And I don't repent walking with Mr. Glarney, though papa frowns on him. He is a gentleman, though he is a gay British soldier and a second son; but I am sorry I spoke up to papa as I did—that was mean and cowardly in me to reflect upon his poor young wife, whom he married for love, and who died so soon. And I am sorry I treated little Johnny so cruelly, for the lad is far better than I, and loves me more than any body or any thing, save his romantic notions of right and truth. As for refusing to ride with Mr. Edward Overing, I am not repenting much. He to set himself up as my adviser! For my last offense, I repent most heartily and honestly, and long to lay it all to the door of his high mightiness, Edward Overing; for if he had but held his peace, I should never have answered my sweet mamma so rudely, and allowed her to go through the hot sun on that tedious walk. My sweet mamma, who never said a sharp word to her disobedient, disrespectful daughter. But I am to put it all down to my hot temper—my fiery Chastellux blood. I know there is no use in excuses. I will have no shoulders but my own to bear this sin. To-morrow I will do penance. I will scourge my willful spirit by spending the whole day in mamma's service; and it is house-cleaning day, so it will be bitter scourging enough, for I hate the whole thing.

So endeth the first lesson of my diary; so, good little priest, I have knelt at thy confessional. Bless me in the name of my godfather, who believed in the holy Catholic Church, the saints and the martyrs.

Saturday, 1795.

Well, I knew it would be so. I prophesied the very words. “You must be very corrupt to feel in this way.” Yet they moved me as if unexpected. Oh Jane! Jane! in your cold, unnatural presence I feel so spelled with evil that I can never talk freely. But what matter? She would not comprehend if I did. And yet she is like most of the women one sees—so artificial, so afraid to evince emotion. Even my kind, good Mary, Henry's wife, looked quite shocked at me one day when I told her I hoped that I should marry a man I loved some time; and more than that, as I declared that I liked the society of the other sex so much. So do all women—the little hypocrites!

“Corrupt!” how the word follows me—how it angers me. My cheek flames, and yet I know it is a corrupt estimate. Yes, a corrupt estimate! Jane is a type of most of the girls I know. There are the Eldons, the Drakes, and the Cartrights—how they talk of proprieties!—how they turn up their noses (Liz Drake's is such a pug) at some poor sinner of their sex, whose steps have wandered out of their track! I scared them most to death one day by reading a translation I made of La Magdalène. If I hadn't been Judge M'Lean's daughter they would have flouted me—me, Nannie Chastellux M'Lean. As it was, Miss Miriam Eldon relieved her mind by a long rigmarole without rhyme or reason, on and concerning the sphere of woman. Then what did they do? They fell to scandalizing poor little Mrs. De Croix. Such things as they told—things that I would blush to repeat; and they relished the telling. Jane was present, and she joined in the cry! She liked it too! A madness seized me then. I broke out in a storm of indignant passion at them. I told them their minds were fouler than many a lost sinner's life: that I who could translate La Magdalène would scorn to talk with my own sex what I would blush for men to hear. Oh, how my fiery Chastellux blood ran over. I exult to think of it. They were so frightened they turned pale, but they never answered me—no, not a word. I conquered as truth and right must in the end. I came off victorious with the tri-colored flag of justice, loyauté, et charité! Huzza! Viva la Charité!

Wednesday, 1796.

This morning I sat to Mr. Allston for my portrait. Papa and Mr. Malbone came in in the midst of the sitting, which relieved me, for I was fast getting into a fidget; for, as papa truly says, I do not relish sitting still, or in one place long. Mr. Malbone came and looked over Mr. Allston's shoulder at Mr. Allston's request, for they are famous friends; and I heard him say:

“What a prophetic look you have put into the eyes; where did you find that lurking sadness?” “Where, indeed?” and Mr. Allston suspended his brush to look at me—a perplexed expression crossed his face, and he seemed disturbed. Then Mr. Malbone came and stood beside me, and began telling me of that dear, delightful old place Newport—told me strange and wild traditions, till I got to thinking, I remember, of a story mamma once related to us all when we were children; a story of how my uncle Chastellux was once thrown upon a curious old island not unlike our Newport, though it was in the south of France, and of a picture he brought away—a picture of a lovely court dame, who was banished for some suspected treason from the kingdom, to this little, quaint island city, and who pined and pined for her native land, till at last, grown desperate or crazed, she took her life into her own hands, and when one morning my uncle went to pay his respects to her, he found the house in great commotion and the lady lying in state. An old servant put a package into his hands addressed in a woman's handwriting to him. In it he found the painted likeness of herself, and a touching farewell, wherein she thanked him for his friendly offices. The likeness was one he had often seen her occupied upon—one that she had painted herself—and the last touch had been given but a few hours before the rash act which terminated her existence. It was evident to him that it was the eyes that had received the latest touch, for in their mystical depths he recognized a wild, prophetic light he had never seen before. So strangely and powerfully did this impress him, that my mother said that he never looked at the picture without an inward shudder and devoutly crossing himself, gay soldier and brave man though he was. Papa was displeased that mamma had told us this story—he did not like for us to get such wild notions in our minds, he said.

I was thinking of all this, as I sat there, when I was aroused by an exclamation of Mr. Allston's "Look at her now, Edward!" And I glanced up to see Mr. Malbone regarding me earnestly. "There, you see where I got the prophetic look!"

Papa came forward from the window where he had been reading a letter, and surveyed the portrait: "My dear, of what were you thinking a while ago?" I told him readily, and was surprised to see a heavy frown settle over his face, and he uttered his usual word when vexed:

"Pshaw!" and then, "That childish story has frightened her; get that look off, Mr. Allston, or I shall not know my brave Nan." "I must take another sitting for it; she is too fatigued now." And thus it was arranged that I should go again the next day, which is to-morrow.

Mr. Malbone promised me to finish his story of Newport some time, if I would tell him mine—the one to which I alluded to papa. "He is a nice youth, but very young—too young for you, my gay little coquette; so don't be turning the boy's brain with those arch glances," Mr. Allston whispered as I went out. That's the way they go on. I can't say a civil thing to a young gentleman but I am trying to turn his brain. It's all in my blood—this fiery, Chastellux blood, that sparkles and foams like wine—so what can I do? What do I care? Yes, what do I care? I am free—free as God made me. Will I sell my birth-right for a mess of pottage? for it comes to that, this putting rein and check on word, and look, and motion, and perpetually acting a lie as Jane and the rest of them do. No, never!

"She would not dare say such things if she were other than she is; if she were not Judge M'Lean's daughter." I overheard that sly snake, Sue Cartright, say this to Hannah Carroll yesterday. Thank my stars I'm Judge M'Lean's daughter then! And Hannah, dear, kind little Hannah, defends me, and tells my saintly Susan I am not so much to blame, for I was actually educated in a convent—a French convent! What would papa say to that, I wonder!

Ah, but I yearn for La belle France; for the gay streets, the assemblées, and the warm hearts. I am only half American. I can not get used to their cold, stiff ways; they are like their cold, chilly climate. I shrink and shudder under the influence of both. Ah, it is very triste here, very triste!

Hark! what is that? A guitar. Who plays a guitar? Mon Dieu! can it be De Gremont?

Wednesday, 1795.

A whole week since I wrote here last. How irregular I am! Ah Ciel, how perplexed one gets trying to think in two ways! Ah, that I had never left La belle France; that I had remained with ma grande mère!

But I shall never make a proper diary in this way. Where did I leave off—a week since? I shall begin on Thursday then, the day I went to Mr. Allston—what am I thinking of? Shall I forget the strains of the guitar that moved me so strangely? I knew it could be no other than De Gremont, and I sat spell-bound. I could scarcely credit my ears; but when I heard that low, sweet song of Burns's he always sung to me, my heart gave one great bound and I wept. He had come away from sunny France, away from the grand court, the palaces, and the people of his name for me. In that moment I had forgot that I had promised papa but yesterday to retract my refusal to young Parson Leighton. I forgot that I had even fancied myself that I liked the young man; for in that moment I knew that but one love, but one passion would ever have possession of my heart; that the love I had thought time and absence had stifled was only sleeping; that De Gremont was my destiny; and I must give him some sign. What? A happy idea came to me—I caught my guitar—the very guitar he had given me in France, and began playing that sweet old melody from Favart's Opera. I did not dare to sing, but he knew the words well:

"And I'll awa' to Nannie O,"

"Though young and yet untaught,
New feelings sway me now;
This love I never sought,
It came I know not how."

As I ceased he took up the strain and gave me that tenderest of all songs,

"Ma mie
Ma douce amie,
Réponds à mes amours,
Fidèle
A cette belle
Je l'aimerai toujours."

Then I heard his retreating footsteps, and I sat there quite still till they had entirely ceased. And he knew me well—he did not linger: ah, he knows every thing so well—all the little nice shades of delicacy and courtly breeding. There is none like him here, not one; and I thought he had forgotten me perhaps. And now he has come to seek me. Will papa frown upon him or smile? The French are our friends surely—the friends of America—then De Gremont has princely blood, a noble lineage. He is not very rich, but papa is not sordid.

These thoughts, I remember, passed like lightning through my mind, and all night they kept with me in my dreams. In the morning I awoke with a new feeling. Life was no longer stale, no longer triste here. While I had been sighing for La belle France, more than its kingdom had come to me!

I dressed myself with unusual care, for I knew not at what hour he would present himself. I had many fears that he would delay until my appointment with Mr. Allston arrived, for I knew what French habits were; but eh charmante! at just a quarter before ten I heard a voice I knew so well asking at the door for papa. Oh, the sweet southern accent of France, how it thrilled my heart! Then the two tones together reached me from the study; then the tinkling of glasses as papa offered him wine; then—ah then, a message for me!

I ran down with such nervous haste I shook the powder from my hair upon my neck, and then I staid at the threshold in a little fright of pleasure and pain. Presently I summoned courage and opened the door. A mist came before my eyes, but through it I was conscious of a glance that rapt me from that moment away from the world. Then he started forward to meet me—he took my hand—he murmured softly,

"And I see you once more! I have prayed for this hour, Nannie." Here my father interposed: "De Gremont, you know upon what terms you meet!" I heard the words, but they sounded afar off. I did not catch their meaning. I only comprehended De Gremont's reply as he waved his hand with a little gesture as though he put away some obstacle. "Give her to me five minutes, five seconds, Monsieur M'Lean, and then—" I was in some sort of a dream for a space—severed from my common daily life and in a little sphere of rest and delight. Then my hand was released with a lingering pressure; it was like a farewell, and before he spoke I felt as if the north wind was blowing down to my southern vintage land, and I was once more alone.

"M'amselle," he said, "I have told your father that I love you—that I have good blood, good position, and respectable means. He approves all this, but refuses you to me because I am of the Mother Church; because I am not of your faith; and M'amselle, he says you are to be given in marriage to a priest of his order!"

Then I told the whole truth. Was this a time for faltering? I told of my preference long ago when we walked in the garden of the old chateau, and how it had grown to something deeper now, and that I could never consent to marry another man.

Then my father put on his iron look. Ah me! and as good as swore that I should never marry one of the corrupt Catholic Church; indeed, that I should never marry other than young Leighton. My blood rose at this—my fiery Chastellux blood—and I said some rash things; and there before us both he stood, De Gremont, looking like an angel—so kind, so sorrowful, so calm.

Into my storm of words my father's stern voice broke again: he never looked at me.

"De Gremont, you know the terms upon which you meet."

"That I would give her up if I could see her now—I remember!"

"But I will not be given up!" I cried, in a little passion of tears. "I will not be given up, De Gremont!"

Oh the light that came into his eyes, the color that mounted to his cheek; and I knew then that I had sealed my fate and his. The next moment he was gone; he had wrung my hand at parting, and left a kiss upon it, and a tear—it is my marriage ring. Then my father—how he talked to me—he called me "unmaidenly" and "forward," and sent me to my room with a fire in my heart and rebellion in my soul.

At twelve, when I came down to keep my appointment with Mr. Allston, he stood drawing on his gloves waiting to accompany me. I knew what it meant; I was to be overlooked, watched. I am afraid I have a very bad heart, for I said to myself: "Is this love that my father feels for me, this selfish determination to force me into compliance? Then I tried to remember how he had in many ways been very kind, and that he was my father and had a right to treat me thus: but I could not make it right; the old rebellious heart kept on.

Arrived at Mr. Allston's, we found the door ajar, and passed in: two or three persons stood with their backs toward us looking at a picture; and I heard one say,

"It is the look of those who die young—a sudden, undecaying death!"

I stepped forward—they were standing before my portrait, absorbed in the contemplation. I glanced at papa—he looked annoyed; and beyond feeling a little wicked pleasure that he had overheard this remark, I did not otherwise think of it. Afterward, when I spoke of it to mamma, she shuddered, and begged me not to think of such gloomy predictions. Somehow it does not trouble me at all—and I wonder, for I am a superstitious little thing. Ah, mon Dieu! nothing troubles me now but one cruel fate; and death is better than separation surely.

I sat a long while to Mr. Allston; but at last he flung his brush down.

"I do not know why it is," he said, "but I can not get that look from the eyes: the more I labor the stronger it becomes."

Papa came round and stood before it with a disturbed face, glancing at me now and then. "Your daughter is not well, perhaps, to-day, Mr. M'Lean."

"She was never better, Sir!" papa answered, with his coldest manner. "But let it rest a while; in a week or two the change may come easier."

So we went home and left it, to my great relief, for I could think of nothing but the strange event of the morning.

For the next three days I do not think papa had me out of his sight. On the morning of the fourth he called me into his study and told me something that turned me stone-cold—that De Gremont had sailed for France. "I saw him last night," he went on, "when he intrusted me with this, which I told him I would give into your hands." I remembered it—a great seal-ring which had been his father's: a new hope shot into my heart as I took it. The motto was "Attendre et veiller," rudely cut upon the shield of gold, and I remembered the old tradition he had once related to me. The ring had been in the family since the time of Louis Quatorze; one of his ancestors had it made for a token—a token of his constancy when separated from the lady of his love—sending it to her by a trusty servant. She understood its meaning, and watched and waited, filled with hope and faith.

I knew that he sent this ring to me for the same purpose, and I would wait and watch!

That very night, as I sat by the window after every one had gone to church but mamma and I, I heard a low, fine whistle—the same tune, "My Nannie O!" He had not gone then; it was all a ruse—a solemn ruse; no simple cheat of cunning, for he is the best and bravest gentleman that ever lived—a sacred stratagem to overcome the force of might, not right. Mamma was in her room, and I was alone in the parlor; again the low, fine whistle nearer yet under my very window. I leaned out, I spoke softly,

"I am here and alone; I will come out to you."

I ran around by the currant path and met him—met him alone for the first time in three years. Oh, well I remember that parting in the garden of the chateau!—well I remember how he looked as he said, "When I am my own master, Nannie, I shall ask you of your father; but you will forget me ere then, perhaps." And in all the three years, because I had no word or token, I thought I was forgotten instead. I little understood his sense of honor and delicacy.

And now he had asked my father the fatal question—fatal it had indeed proved; and here we met, the scions of the houses of De Gremont and Chastellux, in secrecy and trepidation.

He asked me to fly with him; he said, and my heart—ay, my conscience—tells me truly that we have no right to sacrifice ourselves to unjust prejudice and force. He told me of the letter my grandmother had written to my father—a letter of approval, giving her consent, her benediction on our union. And for a question of belief in certain creeds, this union must be denied and given up; ay, worse—I must enter into a marriage without love, and while my heart is another's! Ah, mon Dieu! what shall I do. A marriage without love is infamy; I would die rather, for I know what love is now. Thus three days have I been tortured and fluctuating; every hour dreading discovery to De Gremont's stolen stay in the city, and to our evening interviews. To-night must witness my decision. Disobedience to my father, or a living death for years perhaps.

What next shall be recorded upon these pages I marvel. Mutiny or death? I shudder and turn cold.

Friday, 1795.

I have decided; last night, while the guests were assembled at Governor Adams's, I stole out in my gauze dress to the old pine-avenue, where I had appointed to meet him. He was waiting for me: oh so worn and haggard in these few days, yet looking so patient and kind! I put my hands in his; I said:

"Armand, I will go with you—I am yours!" He did not burst out into any extravagance of joy at this. He took it solemnly and still; for he feels with me that it is a sad and solemn thing we are to do. Solemnly and still, with hands clasping mine and eyes that grew misty with emotion, he looked down upon me and said,

"God give me grace to make your happiness, Nannie!"

Then it was arranged for our departure. On Saturday night at eleven a French vessel is to sail for Toulon. He knows the captain, the officers—they are friends, every one. There is a chaplain, too—the old chaplain of the chateau—who will marry us. All this time they have waited for us, the good, true people.

And after this interview I had to go back to the gay rooms, to answer inquiries as to my absence, and play my part in the scene. I thought we should never get away. The hours were endless, and all night I dreamed of my coming trial, yet deliverance.....

.....It is now seven o'clock; in three hours I go to meet thee, my beloved. Three hours, and I cut adrift from my father's house forever! Ah, will he curse me? He was never very soft, very gentle, but he must have loved me. I remember once when I was ill how he walked with me all night, a peevish, crying child, in his arms. I remember—God stay such memories! Oh, Lamb of God, give me consolation in this trying hour; soften my father's heart to me! And my mother, my dear French mamma, she will not utterly hate me for this act. She has merci, she has charité. She loves her race—the people of France; she will have faith in me to the last. She knows I do not demean myself by an alliance with the house of De Gremont. And little John—God bless thee, little John!—thou lovest me, mon frère; and I, oh, Jean! Jean! I may never see thee again!

Ten minutes of the three hours gone. I will write to the last, and leave this poor brief record of my New England life behind me, a better explanation than I could now give for my flight.

Brief record, indeed, and offering what vivid contrasts! With what lightness I began it, with what tragic sorrow do I end it! How life, in one night, from a folded bud became a perfect flower!

How slow the minutes creep! Yet ah, mon Dieu! each one hastens me forever from my father's house. My father's house! To-morrow it will be all over. He will know what I have done, that I have fled from his roof and taken the actions of my life in my own hands! To-morrow! Oh, my father, forgive me! See! I leave a kiss for you on this insensible page—a kiss and a tear; and mother, my sweet French mother, you will say a prayer for me each night, and I for thee shall never cease praying! And little Johnny, little Jean, I have thee in my heart mignon; while it beats it will never turn cold to thee. Ah, Johnny, little Johnny, thou art all the child left now. Be brave and gentle, little Jean; and intercede for me, if hearts are hardened to me when I go. And, Jean, when thou gettest to be a man, do not judge me harshly and by the world's judgment. Believe that I acted not hastily, but with calm consideration; and remember I loved thee, Jean, to the end!.....

The wind is rising—how it sighs round the pines and maples! Ah, and there is lightning over the hills. A storm is coming down to us. Well, it is fit, my beloved, for this wild and troubled departure!

How the time goes! thoughts grow leaden, and I write but slowly as the hour approaches. Something tells me I shall never look upon thy face again my father, nor hear my mother's voice, nor kiss the lips of little Jean. Never again! Perhaps this storm may find a shroud for us. Ah, how the eyes of the portrait flashed upon me then. They are unchanged as he left them. "The look of those who die young—a sudden, undecaying death!" Is this my fate? Am I going now to meet it? Well, I would not turn back. I go to meet it calmly. The time approaches—is now here. Farewell father, mother, little Jean—I go with your images in my heart, and love for you for evermore in my soul. Again, adieu!.....

In family archives and town records there is a story told of a fearful night in July, 1795, a night of storm disastrous on land and sea. Many vessels went to pieces on the rocks and in the wild winds. Many sad stories were told of shipwreck and loss; but the saddest of them all was of the French ship L'Esperance. Not fifty miles from shore the storm burst upon her in its sudden fury, dismantling sails and driving her against the rocks, where one bolt of lightning finished the work of destruction. Guns of distress, fired at short intervals, brought the citizens from their beds down to the harbor.

On that night Judge M'Lean, contrary to his habit, was singularly wakeful and restless; he had retired early as his wont, and, waking after a brief slumber, heard the wind rising and sighing round the pines and maples. A little later a door slammed with violence! How high the wind must be! did his wife hear it? he asked. Yes, she had heard it too. Just then the dog howled beneath the window—a wild and mournful expression of dumb emotion. Then for a brief period there was a lull; the wind sank away, and the air grew still and brooding.

Slumber again came to the Judge, held him perhaps for an hour, when an awful crash, as if the heavens were rent asunder, awakened him. He started from his bed, flung on his dressing-gown, lighted a candle, and looked out into the hall; he was not a nervous man, nor given to imaginings, but it seemed as if above the raving wind he heard the voice of his daughter Nannie calling in dire distress. He listened—again through the wide, old hall, and down the stairway once again, with tender supplication, the sweet young voice called "Father!"

He waited no longer, but more rapidly than he had moved perhaps for many a day he strode on to her room. The door was open, a candle flaring low in its socket, and the bed unoccupied. Open on the table lay the "Diary." A few words, and he knew the truth. Yet her voice! Ah! she had repented at the eleventh hour and turned back. She was waiting at the door for pardon and admittance. He would give her both: and the great oaken door was unbarred for the penitent; but only the rain claimed admittance—the rain and the wind. In vain he shouted her name and waited for a reply. None came.

Suddenly the minute-gun boomed through the night: once and yet again; and once again from afar, borne down it seemed over sea and shore, that sweet, thrilling voice calling "Father!"

Who may tell what strange, unusual promptings of the spirit stirred within that stern breast as out into the raging storm the Judge, obeying that call, took his way?

Only one boat crew dared to put out on that tossing sea, and that after the stirring appeals of one who did not belong to their number; and when they pushed off from shore at the helm there he sat, eager and watchful and still, the old Judge. Returning, they brought the freight of death. Lashed together on a floating spar, hand clasped in hand, and tresses mingling, were the dead bodies of Armand de Gremont and Nannie Chastellux M'Lean.

Long after, the sailors told how the stern old Judge sat rigid and motionless watching the pale, cold face of his dead daughter, and now and then saying, softly, "Poor little Nannie!"

Long after, my father, the last of the old house of M'Lean, brought out of manifold wrappings the portrait of the Judge's daughter. The picture being stained with mildew and must in many places, he had it retouched. When the painter returned it, the wild, prophetic look that once baffled the unerring brush of Allston was no longer there; the painter of another age had sacrilegiously stricken it out. But on twilight eves in July, when the wind is sighing through the pines and maples, looking into the lovely face there, I think I see the old, old gleam of prophetic intelligence; and I say, softly, "The look of those who die young—a sudden, undecaying death!" Then I only recall the heroine of the French ship L'Esperance—Nannie Chastellux M'Lean. But when the sunshine of high noon streams down the hall I recall only the arch young girl who scolded Hannah and swept a saucy courtesy to the gay British soldier. But in her tragic hour, as in her gay young life, never a truer, tenderer heart ever beat in womanly bosom than in the breast of "My Nannie O."

LITTLE MATTIE.

DEAD! Thirteen a month ago!
 Short and narrow her life's walk.
 Lover's love she could not know
 Even by a dream or talk:
 Too young to be glad of youth;
 Missing honor, labor, rest,
 And the warmth of a babe's mouth
 At the blossom of her breast.
 Must you pity her for this,
 And for all the loss it is—
 You, her mother with wet face,
 Having had all in your case?

Just so young but yesternight,
 Now she is as old as death.
 Meek, obedient in your sight,
 Gentle to a beck or breath
 Only on last Monday! yours,
 Answering you like silver bells
 Lightly touched! an hour matures:
 You can teach her nothing else.
 She has seen the mystery hid
 Under Egypt's pyramid.
 By those eyelids pale and close
 Now she knows what Rhamses knows.

Cross her quiet hands, and smooth
 Down her patient locks of silk,
 Cold and passive as in truth
 You your fingers in spilt milk
 Drew along a marble floor;
 But her lips you can not wring
 Into saying a word more,
 "Yes" or "no," or such a thing.
 Though you call and beg and wreak
 Half your soul out in a shriek,
 She will lie there in default
 And most innocent revolt.

Ay, and if she spoke, maybe
 She would answer like the Son,
 "What is now 'twixt thee and me?"
 Dreadful answer! better none.
 Yours on Monday, God's to-day!
 Yours, your child, your blood, your heart,
 Called.....you called her, did you say,
 "Little Mattie" for your part?
 Now already it sounds strange,
 And you wonder, in this change,
 What He calls His angel-creature,
 Higher up than you can reach her.

'Twas a green and easy world
 As she took it! room to play
 (Though one's hair might get uncured
 At the far end of the day).
 What she suffered she shook off
 In the sunshine; what she sinned
 She could pray on high enough
 To keep safe above the wind.
 If reproved by God or you,
 'Twas to better her she knew;
 And, if crossed, she gathered still
 'Twas to cross out something ill.

You, you had the right, you thought,
 To survey her with sweet scorn,
 Poor gay child, who had not caught
 Yet the octave-stretch forlorn
 Of your larger wisdom! Nay,
 Now your places are changed so,
 In that same superior way
 She regards you dull and low
 As you did herself exempt
 From life's sorrows. Grand contempt
 Of the spirits risen a while,
 Who look back with such a smile!

There's the sting of 't. That, I think,
 Hurts the most, a thousandfold!
 To feel sudden, at a wink,
 Some dear child we used to scold,
 Praise, love both ways, kiss and tease,
 Teach and tumble as our own,
 All its curls about our knees,
 Rise up suddenly full-grown.
 Who could wonder such a sight
 Made a woman mad outright?
 —Show me Michael with the sword
 Rather than such angels, Lord!
 ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes with the 8th of June. The facts which we chronicle, though important in themselves, derive their chief significance from their bearing upon events which must soon occur.—War-like preparations, upon both sides, have been carried on with the utmost vigor. At this date there are fully a quarter of a million of soldiers enrolled and in the pay of the United States. Of these about one half are in the immediate vicinity of the seat of war in Virginia, and the remainder are distributed throughout various camps, in such a manner that they can be brought into immediate service. The contributions of money by States, towns, and individuals, have been on a large scale. The following summary presents the amount reported a fortnight since, distinguishing the sums voted by States and those furnished by local contributions. Since that date the amount has been largely increased, especially in those States where the sums as given below are comparatively small, full reports not having been received in time to be incorporated in the table:

STATES	State.	Towns	Total.
Connecticut	$2,000,000	$160,000	$2,160,000
Indiana	1,000,000	52,000	1,052,000
Illinois	3,500,000	53,000	3,553,000
Iowa	100,000	100,000
Kansas	20,000	20,000
Maine	1,300,000	55,000	1,355,000
Massachusetts	3,000,000	745,000	3,745,000
Michigan	1,000,000	100,000	1,100,000
New York	3,000,000	2,831,000	5,831,000
New Hampshire	58,000	58,000
New Jersey	2,000,000	231,000	2,231,000
Ohio	3,000,000	348,000	3,348,000
Pennsylvania	3,500,000	430,000	3,930,000
Rhode Island	500,000	23,000	523,000
Vermont	1,000,000	27,000	1,027,000
Wisconsin	1,000,000	77,000	1,077,000
Total	$25,920,000	$5,185,000	$31,105,000

The route through Maryland to Washington, by way of Annapolis, having been secured by the troops under command of General Butler, that officer, on the 13th of May, sent a strong detachment to Baltimore. They passed through the city without opposition, and took up a position on Federal Hill, about a mile from Fort M'Henry. The commander issued a proclamation stating that the forces under him had occupied Baltimore for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the laws of the State and of the United States. No loyal citizen would be disturbed, private property would not be interfered with, unless it was used to aid those in rebellion against the Government, in which case it would be seized and confiscated. No assemblages of armed men, except the ordinary police and those organized by the State and acting under the orders of the Governor, would be permitted. The ordinary operations of the authorities would not be interfered with, but would be aided by the military force of the United States.—Governor Hicks, who had before declined to comply with the requisition of the President for a quota of troops, now issued a proclamation stating that the requisition had been made in the spirit of and in pursuance of the law; and as he had received satisfactory assurance that the troops called for would be detailed to serve only within the State, or for the defense of the capital, he therefore called upon the loyal citizens of the State to volunteer to the extent of four regiments for the term of three months, subject to the orders of the Commander-in-chief of the army of the United States.—General Butler, having been promoted to the rank of Major-General, and placed in command of the military department of Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, took up his quarters at Fort Monroe, and the command of the forces at Baltimore was given to General Cadwallader, of Pennsylvania.—In Maryland several arrests of prominent persons have been made. Among these was that of John Merryman, who applied to Chief Justice Taney for a writ of habeas corpus. This was granted; and General Cadwallader, in answer, said that the prisoner had been arrested on charge of various acts of treason—of holding a command in a company, having in possession arms belonging to the United States, and of avowing his purpose of armed hostility to the Government of the United States. In such cases General Cadwallader said that he was authorized by the President to suspend the habeas corpus act; he therefore requested Judge Taney to suspend further action until instructions could be had from the President. Judge Taney thereupon issued a writ of attachment against General Cadwallader for contempt of Court. The Marshal, proceeding to Fort M'Henry to execute the writ, was refused admittance. Judge Taney said that the President had no right to suspend the act, or to authorize others to do so; that military officers had no right to make arrests except in aid of the judicial authority; that persons so arrested must be delivered to the civil authorities, to be dealt with according to law; that the military authority was subordinate to the civil, and under ordinary circumstances it would be the duty of the Marshal to proceed to bring the General into Court; but as in the present case it would be impossible to do so, he should prepare an opinion and forward it to the President, calling upon him to enforce the decision of the Court. This opinion was subsequently prepared, and has been published at length.

General Butler has taken up his head-quarters at Fortress Monroe, which has received large reinforcements of men and munitions. Three fugitive slaves, belonging to the commander of the Virginian troops in the neighborhood, were brought into the fortress while attempting to escape, to avoid being sent southward. Their owner sent a flag of truce, demanding the return of the slaves under the Fugitive Slave Law. General Butler refused to comply on the ground that slaves belonging to insurgents were employed in military service, and were consequently contraband of war. General Butler submitted his action to the consideration of the Government, by whom it was fully sanctioned by the following letter from the Secretary of War:

"SIR,—Your action in respect to the negroes who came within your lines, from the service of the rebels, is approved. The Department is sensible of the embarrassments which must surround officers conducting military operations in a State by the laws of which slavery is sanctioned. The Government can not recognize the rejection by any State of its federal obligation resting upon itself. Among these federal obligations, however, no one can be more important than that of suppressing and dispersing any combination of the former for the purpose of overthrowing its whole constitutional authority. While, therefore, you will permit no interference, by persons under your command, with the relations of persons held to service under the laws of any State, you will, on the other hand, so long as any State within which your military operations are conducted, remain under the control of such armed combinations, refrain from surrendering to alleged masters any persons who come within your lines. You will employ such persons in the services to which they will be best adapted, keeping an account of the labor by them performed, of the value of it, and the expenses of their maintenance. The question of their final disposition will be reserved for future determination."

The first actual movement of the forces of the United States into the hostile territory took place on the morning of the 24th of May. Shortly after midnight the New York Fireman's Zouaves, under the command of Colonel Ellsworth, embarked on steamers from the Navy-yard at Washington for Alexandria. Other regiments, from New York, New Jersey, and Michigan, were simultaneously sent over the long bridge which unites the District with Virginia. The Zouaves landed without opposition shortly after dawn, and proceeded to remove the rails from the road leading into the interior. Colonel Ellsworth, with two or three men, passing a public house, from the roof of which floated a secession flag, entered for the purpose of removing it. Coming down, with the flag in his possession, he was met in a passage-way by the proprietor of the house, James T. Jackson, and shot through the heart. At almost the same instant Jackson was killed by Francis E. Brownell, one of the Zouaves. Alexandria and its neighborhood were occupied by the Federal troops, and a company of Virginia cavalry were captured; after a detention of some days they were released upon taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. Intrenchments were thrown up around Alexandria, and upon Arlington Heights, which command a portion of the capital. Bodies of troops were pushed forward toward the Manassas Junction, with the object of interrupting the communication between Richmond and Harper's Ferry. On the 1st of June a company of cavalry set out on a scouting expedition to Fairfax Court House, about 20 miles beyond the outposts. Some hundreds of Virginia troops were stationed here, and a sharp skirmish ensued. About twenty of the Virginians are reported to have been killed; one of the United States troops was killed, four or five wounded, among whom was the commander, Lieutenant Tompkins. The cavalry withdrew, having made five prisoners, and leaving two of their own number as prisoners. On the following day the same cavalry company made another dash to Fairfax, and rescued their comrades who had been left behind.

On the 27th of May the United States volunteers stationed at Wheeling, Virginia, marched toward Grafton, an important station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. On the same day two Ohio regiments crossed into Western Virginia. This portion of the State is strongly loyal to the United States, as is manifested by the vote on the ordinance of secession. Before the Ohio troops advanced, General McClellan, commander of the Department of Ohio, issued a proclamation saying that the Government had abstained from sending forces across the Ohio until after the State election had been held, in order that no one might be able to say that the slightest effort had been made to influence a free expression of opinion. The proclamation concludes:

"It determined to await the result of the State election, desirous that no one might be able to say that the slightest effort had been made from this side to influence the free expression of your opinions, although the many agencies brought to bear upon you by the rebels were well known. You have now shown under the most adverse circumstances that the great mass of the people of Western Virginia are true and loyal to that beneficent Government under which we and our fathers have lived so long. As soon as the result of the election was known, the traitors commenced their work of destruction. The General Government can not close its ears to the demand you have made for assistance. I have ordered troops to cross the river. They come as your friends and brothers; as enemies only to armed rebels who are preying upon you. Your homes, your families, and your property are safe under our protection. All your rights shall be religiously respected. Notwithstanding all that has been said by the traitors to induce you to believe our advent among you will be signalized by an interference with your slaves, understand one thing clearly: Not only will we abstain from all such interference, but we will, on the contrary, with an iron hand, crush any attempt at insurrection on their part. Now that we are in your midst, I call upon you to fly to arms and support the General Government; sever the connection that binds you to traitors; proclaim to the world that the faith and loyalty so long boasted by the Old Dominion are still preserved in Western Virginia, and that you remain true to the Stars and Stripes."

On the 2d of June two columns, consisting of Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana troops, set out from Grafton for Philippi, about 25 miles distant, where a body of 2000 Secession troops were posted. The march was made through a drenching rain. The columns reached their destination just at daybreak. The enemy were taken by surprise, and fled after a brief struggle, leaving behind their arms and equipments. Fifteen or twenty are reported to have been killed. Colonel Kelly, the commander of the loyal Virginia volunteers, was severely wounded.—Several indecisive engagements have taken place between the United States vessels and the Confederate batteries erected upon the shores of the Potomac.

It is impossible to gain any reliable information of the number of the Confederate troops now in Virginia. It is known, however, that in addition to those of the State, the whole disposable force of the Confederation has been pushed northward. The estimates made vary from 75,000 to 150,000. They occupy a long irregular line from Harper's Ferry on the north to Norfolk on the South. Strong detachments are stationed at Richmond, Lynchburg, and Petersburg; while advance forces are posted in numbers at Manassas Junction almost directly west of Washington. Here, or at Harper's Ferry, it seems probable that the first serious encounter will take place. President Davis, with a portion of his cabinet, arrived at Richmond early in June, for the purpose of taking the command of the Confederate forces.

The Congress of the Confederate States adjourned on the 20th of May, to meet at Richmond, Virginia, on the 20th of July, unless some public emergency should arise which in the judgment of the President should render it impolitic to meet at that place, in which case he is to call the Congress together at some other convenient place, to be selected by him.—On the 6th of May an act was passed "recognizing the existence of war between the United States and the Confederate States, and concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods." The preamble says that the efforts made to establish friendly relations between the Government of the United States and that of the Confederate States have proved unavailing; the President of the United States has issued proclamations calling for troops to recapture the forts within the Confederate States, and setting on foot a blockade of their ports; and the State of Virginia having seceded, and formed an alliance with the Confederate States; and the States of Maryland, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, and Missouri having refused, and it being believed that Delaware, and the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory south of Kansas would refuse to co-operate with the Government of the United States: Therefore the President of the Confederate States is authorized to use the whole land and naval force of the Confederacy to meet the war thus commenced, and to issue letters of marque and reprisal against the vessels and property of the United States, and those of their citizens, with the exception of the States and Territories above named. The general provisions for privateers are the same as those indicated in the proclamation of Mr. Davis noted in our last Record. It is further provided that the proceeds of all prizes shall be distributed among the owners, officers, and crews of the capturing vessels according to any written agreement between them; in the absence of any written agreement, half goes to the officers and crew, and half to the owners. Prizes, before breaking bulk, must be carried into some port of the Confederate States, or of some friendly State, to be proceeded against before some competent tribunal, which may make restitution, or decree damages, in case the capture shall have been made without probable cause. All persons found on board of any captured vessel are to be placed in charge of the authorities of the Confederation, who are to take charge of their safe-keeping and support. A bounty of twenty dollars is to be paid for every person on board of any armed vessel of the United States which shall be destroyed by any vessel of equal or inferior force, and twenty-five dollars for every prisoner brought to port, and delivered up. Upon all goods captured by any private armed ship and brought into the Confederacy a deduction of one-third is to be made in the duties imposed by law. Five per cent. upon the value of all prizes is to be retained by the Government as a fund for the support of those who have been disabled in action, and for the families of those who have been killed.—An Act was passed prohibiting the export of cotton or cotton yarn from any of the Confederate States, except through the sea-ports, under penalty of the forfeiture of all exported or attempted to be exported, and a fine of not exceeding five thousand dollars or imprisonment for not more than six months. Every steamboat or railroad car used, with the consent of the owner or person in charge, for the violation of this Act, is to be forfeited. Any person giving information of any such violation is entitled to half the proceeds of the forfeited goods: This Act, which is to continue in force so long as any ports of the Confederate States are blockaded by the United States, does not apply to the exportation by land of cotton to Mexico.—It was proposed in Congress that the cotton planters should be invited to put their crops into the hands of the Government, receiving bonds for its value, the Government to dispose of it in Europe for cash.—The Postmaster-General, on the 1st of June took charge of the transmission of the mails in the Confederate States; and the Postmaster-General of the United States announced that on that day postal communication would close with the seceding States, with the exception of some counties in Western Virginia. All letters for these States are sent to the Dead Letter Office at Washington.

Two more States—Arkansas and North Carolina—have formally seceded from the Union, and joined the Confederate States. In Arkansas the State Convention, on the 18th of April, had passed an ordinance submitting the question of secession to the people, at an election to be held on the 3d of August, and making other provisions, as noted in our Record for May. When the requisition of President Lincoln was received, Governor Rector, on the 22d of April, replied to the Secretary of War, "In answer to your requisition for troops from Arkansas to subjugate the Southern States, I have to say that none will be furnished. The demand is only adding insult to injury. The people of this Commonwealth are freemen and not slaves, and will defend to the last extremity their honor, lives, and property against Northern mendacity and usurpation." On the same day the Governor gave orders for the seizure at Napoleon of a large quantity of military supplies belonging to the United States. On the 6th of May, the Convention, which had reassembled, unanimously passed an ordinance of secession. The preamble says:

Whereas. In addition to the well-founded causes of complaint set forth by this Convention in resolutions adopted on the 11th March, A.D., 1861, against the sectional party now in power at Washington City, headed by Abraham Lincoln, he has, in the face of resolutions passed by this Convention, pledging the State of Arkansas to resist to the last extremity any attempt on the part of such power to coerce any State that seceded from the old Union, proclaimed to the world that war should be waged against such States, until they should be compelled to submit to their rule, and large forces to accomplish this have by this same power been called out, and are now being marshaled to carry out this inhuman design, any longer to submit to such rule or remain in the old Union of the United States would be disgraceful and ruinous to the State of Arkansas.

The ordinance then goes on to repeal the ordinance and laws by which Arkansas became a member of the Federal Union.—In North Carolina the ordinance of secession, and one ratifying the Provisional Government of the Confederate States, was passed on the 21st of May, by unanimous votes of the Convention; a proposition to submit the matter to the people having been defeated by a vote of 73 to 34.—Tennessee has also virtually, though not in form, joined the Southern Confederacy. The Legislature has passed a Declaration of Independence, which is to be submitted to the people on the day (June 8) upon which we close this month's Record. Meanwhile a military league has been formed with the Confederate Government, in virtue of which the forces of Tennessee are to be employed to aid the Confederate States.

In Kentucky a determined effort is still made to preserve a strict neutrality. Governor Magoffin, as before noted, refused peremptorily to comply with the President's requisition for troops. On the 20th of May he issued a proclamation declaring that every indication of public sentiment in Kentucky showed a fixed determination of the people to take neither side, but to maintain a posture of self-defense, forbidding the quartering upon her soil of troops from either section, in the hope that the State might yet become a mediator between the parties. He therefore warns all States, whether separate or united, and especially the Confederate and the United States, against making any occupation within the State of Kentucky, without the permission of the Legislature and Executive authorities. All citizens of Kentucky are forbidden to make any demonstration against either of the sovereignties, but are directed to make prompt and efficient preparations for the defense of the State.—Of similar purport are the proceedings of the "Border States Convention," held at Frankfort. Virginia, North Carolina, and Arkansas, having joined the Southern Confederacy, of course sent no delegates; none appeared from Maryland, and only one from Tennessee, and four from Missouri. The remainder were from Kentucky. Senator Crittenden was chosen President. Two addresses, one to the People of the United States, and the other to the People of Kentucky, were adopted. The essential point in the first address is the recommendation that Congress shall propose such Constitutional amendments as will secure the legal rights of slaveholders; and if this should fail to bring about a pacification, that a Convention be called composed of delegates from all the States, to devise measures of peaceable adjustment.

The address to the people of Kentucky defends the action of the Executive in refusing troops to the Federal Government, as called for by the peculiar circumstances in which the State was placed. "In all things," says the address, "she is as loyal as ever to the constitutional administration of the Government. She will follow the stars and the stripes to the utmost regions of the earth, and defend it from foreign insult. She refuses alliance with any who would destroy the Union. All she asks is permission to keep out of this unnatural strife. She has announced her intention to refrain from aggression upon others, and she must protest against her soil being made the theatre of military operations by any belligerent." The address goes on to censure the conduct of the States who have withdrawn from the Union, affirming that there was in the Constitution a remedy for every wrong, and provisions to check every encroachment by the majority upon the minority. In withdrawing the States committed "a great wrong, for which they must answer to posterity. But Kentucky remained true to herself, contending with all her might for what were considered to be the rights of the people, and although one after another of the States that should have been by her side ungenerously deserted her, leaving her almost alone in the field, yet she did not surrender her rights under the Constitution, and never will surrender them. She will appear again in the Congress of the United States, not having conceded the least atom of power to the Government that had not heretofore been granted, and retaining every power she had reserved. She will insist upon her constitutional rights in the Union, and not out of it." The address goes on to say that if the war is transferred to Kentucky, it will matter little to her which party succeeds; her destruction will be the inevitable result; "and even the institution to preserve or control which this wretched war was undertaken, will be exterminated in the general ruin."

In Virginia the vote upon Secession has resulted in a large majority in its favor. In the northwestern part of the State the vote was largely in favor of the Union. A Convention of the Western Counties convened at Wheeling on the 13th of May, at which resolutions were passed pronouncing the ordinance of secession null and void. The Convention adjourned to meet on the 11th of June.

The position of Missouri is similar to that of Kentucky. The State endeavors to avoid taking part in the war. Troops had been organized with hostile designs against the Government. These were forced to surrender by Captain Lyon (since appointed General). At St. Louis an attack was made by the populace, on the 10th of May, upon the United States volunteers; they returned the fire, killing some twenty; an émeute on the next day resulted in the loss of several lives. General Harney, who had been put in command of this district, entered into an agreement with the State authorities, which seems to have been disapproved, as he has been relieved from the command, which has been given to General Lyon.

EUROPE.

The attitude to be assumed by the Great Powers of Europe in relation to the American war is of high importance. That of England is indicated by the Royal proclamation, issued on the 14th of May, which says that, "Whereas hostilities have unhappily commenced between the United States of America and certain States styling themselves the Confederate States of America, and whereas we being at peace with the Government of the United States, have declared our royal determination to maintain a strict neutrality in the contest between the said contending parties, we therefore have thought fit to issue this our royal proclamation." The proclamation then goes on to forbid all British subjects from taking part in any way in the contest, by enlisting in the army or navy of either party; by fitting out or arming any vessel; by breaking any lawfully established blockade; by carrying to either troops or any articles contraband of war. All subjects violating any of the provisions of this proclamation are warned that they will incur the penalties provided by law, and will moreover do so at their own peril, forfeiting any protection from any liabilities or penal consequences.—This proclamation, taken in connection with the explanations of the Ministers and the speeches in Parliament, has an unfriendly aspect toward the United States, recognizing, as it does, the Confederate States, as belligerents, and, by implication, entitled equally to the right of carrying prizes into the ports of Great Britain.—In the House of Commons, Lord John Russell said that the character of belligerency was not so much a principle as a fact; that a certain amount of force and consistency acquired by any mass of population engaged in war entitled them to be treated as a belligerent. A power or a community which was at war with another, and which covered the sea with its cruisers, must either be acknowledged as a belligerent or dealt with as a pirate. The Government had come to the opinion that the Southern Confederacy, according to those principles which were considered just, must be treated as a belligerent.—In reply to questions in the House of Lords, the Earl of Granville said that a lawful blockade must be maintained by a force sufficient to make ingress or egress not indeed strictly impossible, but certainly extremely difficult. With respect to what articles were contraband of war, he said that in many cases this depended upon contingencies which could only be decided by a prize Court.—The Earl of Derby said that there were two points on which it was desirable that an understanding should be had with the United States. It had proclaimed a blockade of the whole Southern coast, which it could not maintain. It had also declared that it should treat privateers as pirates; but it could not do so by the law of nations; and it was desirable that it should be declared that the infliction of such a penalty on British subjects would not be viewed with indifference by England. Lord Campbell said that a subject of another Power, holding letters of marque, was not guilty of piracy. Lord Kingsdown said that the United States might hold the people of the Southern States to be rebels, and guilty of high treason; but this would not apply to the subjects of other Powers who had become privateers.—The French Government has not yet defined its position.

Literary Notices.

Seasons with the Sea-Horses; or, Sporting Adventures in the Northern Seas, by JAMES LAMONT, Esq., F.G.S. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The author of this volume is a jolly Scotch sportsman, with all the natural shrewdness and enterprise of his countrymen, a keen love of adventure, and a certain vivacity of temperament which he never fails to exhibit, whether in running down a walrus on the ice, or in penning a description of the eager pursuit. He starts on his exciting trip in quest of the strange game which had touched his fancy in a former experience on the coast of Spitzbergen in the spring of 1859, and, accompanied by a brother sportsman, no less gay and resolute than himself, arrives at Hammerfest, "the most northerly town in the world, and the most unsavory place in the universe," soon after the middle of June.

The party, including the crew of the sloop which was to be the head-quarters of the expedition, consisted of sixteen souls. They were amply provided with the necessary outfit for their hazardous adventures; and after reaching the extensive submarine banks to the northeast of the Thousand Islands, were ready to commence operations. Attached to the sloop were two walrus boats, twenty-one feet long by five feet beam, each carrying five or six men.

These boats are among the curiosities of Arctic navigation, and well deserved the elaborate description given of them by the author. They are bow-shaped at both ends, strong, light, swift to row, and easily turned on the centre. They have a very thick and strong stem-piece and stern-piece, to resist concussions with the ice. Each man rows with a pair of oars hung in grumnets to stout single thole-pins; the steersman directs the boat by also rowing a pair of oars with his face to the bow; the harpooner, who has the command, always rows the bow oars, and he alone uses the weapons and the telescope. The strongest man in the boat usually sits next to the harpooner; he holds and hauls in the line when a walrus is struck, and hands the harpoons and lances to the harpooner when required. The boats are invariably painted white outside, to make them look as much as possible like the ice.

The pursuit of the great Spitzbergen seal, though not so exciting as the chase of the sea-horse, is regarded by the author—certainly no mean judge of such matters—as a very delightful amusement. These animals are a wary tribe, sleeping as lightly as the weasel, and in the deepest slumber raising their heads from the ice every three or four minutes, and looking round with a most uneasy expression, to assure themselves that they are not in danger. It is no easy thing to make good work with them. If a seal is not shot stone-dead on the ice he is almost certain to roll or jerk himself into the water, and sink or escape. As he never lies more than about a foot from the edge of the ice, the most trifling spark of life is enough to secure his disappearance. The only part of his huge carcass in which a bullet will take mortal effect suddenly is the brain, and this, in the biggest, is no larger than an orange. It is well to harpoon him even after he seems to be shot quite dead, for he will often give a convulsive kick over the brink of the ice, and go to the bottom like a stone, while his proprietors, as they delusively consider themselves, are standing within a few feet of him. When the seal is fairly dead all the men except one get on the ice, and in a very few minutes strip off the skin and blubber, in one sheet, with their knives. A full-sized Spitzbergen seal, in good condition, is about nine and a half or ten feet long, by six or six and a half feet in circumference, and weighs at least six hundred pounds. The skin and fat amount to about one half the total weight. The blubber lies in one layer of two or three inches thick underneath the skin, and yields about one half of its own weight of fine oil.

The great sport, however, for which the party had tempted their fate in these regions of "thick-ribbed ice" was the pursuit of the walrus. These huge monsters were sometimes found lying two deep on the ice, with not less than three hundred in a single troop. They were shy and restless, difficult of approach, and some of them always on the look-out while the others slept. When there are so many together there is a pretty fair chance of securing some by rowing after them as hard as possible, and keeping on in the same direction which they appear to take when they dive. The calves can not go much faster than the boat, and as they must come up to breathe much oftener than the old ones, the whole herd generally accommodate their pace to that of the old cows with young ones. There is an almost frantic excitement as the boat, driven through the water by five pair of oars, actually seems to fly; while perhaps a hundred walruses, roaring, bellowing, snorting, and splashing, make an acre of the sea all in a foam before and around her. The harpooner stands with one foot on the thwart and the other on the front locker, with the line coiled in his right hand, and the long weapon in both hands ready balanced for a dart, while he shouts to the crew which direction to take, as he frequently can see the walruses under water as he stands upright in the boat. The herd generally keep close together, diving and reappearing at the same time. One moment you see a hundred grizzly heads and long gleaming white tusks above the waves; they give one spout from their blow-holes, take one breath of fresh air, and the next moment you see a hundred brown hemispherical backs, the next a hundred pair of hind flippers flourishing, and then they are all down. The old bulls are always very light-colored, from being nearly without hair; their skins are rough and furrowed, like that of the rhinoceros; and they are generally covered with scars and wounds inflicted by harpoons, lances, and bullets, as well as by the tusks of one another in mutual fights. In these battles, which are often severe, especially in the amatory season, they use their tusks against one another in the same manner that game-cocks use their beaks. Notwithstanding their unwieldy proportions and the position of their tusks, which would seem to be fitted only for a downward blow, they can turn their necks with great rapidity, and strike either upward or downward or sideways with equal dexterity. The tusks of the walrus are simply an enlargement of the eye-teeth, firmly imbedded, for six or seven inches of their length, in a mass of very hard and solid bone, forming the front of the animal's head. They are composed of fine white ivory, varying in size and shape, according to the age and sex of the animal. The upper lip of the walrus is thickly set with strong, transparent, bristly hairs, about six inches long, and as thick as a crow-quill. This terrific mustache, together with his long white tusks, and fierce, blood-shot eyes, gives him a most unearthly and demoniacal appearance as he rears his head above the waves. The old fable of the mermaid, in the opinion of the author, may have originated in the grim resemblance of this animal to the head of a human being when in this position.

Mr. Lamont does not confine his pages to the description of his own exploits in dealing destruction to the huge inhabitants of these frozen seas. He now and then indulges in speculations in physical geography and natural history, which, although of not much importance in themselves, serve to give a by no means disagreeable variety to his narrative, the excessive liveliness of which is its principal fault. For instance, he is a thorough skeptic with regard to reaching the north pole by water, and pleasantly discusses the reasons of his unbelief. The extreme north reached by the Spitzbergen adventurers is about 81° . Very few people have ever succeeded in reaching a higher latitude. The accounts of some of the early Dutch navigators having sailed to 83° or 84° are either apocryphal or founded on erroneous observations. Scoresby, who had spent his life in the Polar seas, and who was not likely to be left behind by any seaman, admits that $81^{\circ} 30'$ was the utmost that he had succeeded in gaining. The story of a great open sea around the pole, so firmly believed by our countryman, Dr. Kane, is pronounced by the author to be entirely chimerical. He maintains that nothing exists within a radius of six hundred miles of the pole but vast masses of eternal ice, unless, indeed a portion of land may happen to intervene. But hopeless as all attempts to sail to the pole must ever continue to be, he thinks it not impossible to reach it by land, or rather, by ice. The distance from the extreme northern point of Spitzbergen is about six hundred miles. The method to overcome this is lucidly described by Mr. Lamont, and we wonder that he does not undertake the experiment himself, instead of confining his ambition to the ignoble pursuit of harpooning seals and sea-horses. A well-provided vessel should proceed to Spitzbergen in summer with sledges and plenty of good dogs. Selecting a sheltered harbor as far to the north as they could get, they should pass the remainder of the season in killing rein-deer and wild-fowl for their own provisions, and walrus and seals to keep the dogs fat and in good condition. A hundred tons of deer, seals, and walrus might easily be laid in in two months. After wintering in Spitzbergen, a plenty of hardy volunteers could be enlisted in Tromsøe and Hammerfest to act as hunters and harpooners to the expedition. During the early spring it would be necessary to exercise the teams, and bring them into the highest possible condition and discipline. At the same time dépôts of provisions should be established, as far as practicable, on their intended route to the north. Advantage being taken of the first available fine weather in March or April, they might reach the pole and regain their ship, according to Mr. Lamont's delightful programme, in about a month or six weeks from the time of their departure.

Not less edifying are the speculations of the author on certain moot points of natural history, in which he endeavors to illustrate Mr. Darwin's famous theory of the origin of species. Just look, for example, at the walrus. The original paternity of that delicate monster may be clearly traced to some wonderful polar beast prior to the polar bear, which, by-the-way, is nothing but a variety of the bears inhabiting Northern Europe, Asia, and America. Some individuals of the latter tribes, finding they were getting short of food, ventured on the ice, when pressed by hunger, and caught a few seals which they were able to reach. These fortunate bears were not without a certain modicum of common sense. They found they could get a better living in their new quarters than at the old homestead. Thus, their eye-teeth being already cut and ready to be transformed into walrus' tusks, they took up their residence on the shore, with a view to business on the ice. Brown bears by birth and lineage, those of the lightest color (and even now silver-grays are found among the species, as well as among the ancient fossil Whigs), would have the best chance of surprising seals, while the fattest of them would best stand the cold. The process of "natural selection" would do the rest, and in a few million of years more or less, dating from the epoch of Weissnichtwenn, the old brown bear would be transformed into a genuine white bear, catching seals instead of squirrels, and in his whole nature and all his habits "suffering a sea-change." Now fancy an immense land animal, long before the metamorphosis of the bear, living on the borders of the then existing Polar Sea. It is easy to believe that, in the perpetual struggle for existence, this primeval bear, or whatever he was, may have been compelled to take to the sea-shore, and among other things add shell-fish to his bill of fare. At first he would only go into shallow water; by-and-by success and habit would embolden him to go deeper; and he would soon acquire the talent of digging up shells with his feet and teeth. Natural selection would now come into play; those animals which had the longest and strongest teeth would meet with the best success, and would transmit that style of teeth to their descendants. Now the tusks of the walrus are not a pair of extra teeth, but merely an enormous development of the eye-teeth, such as any large carnivorous animal, compelled to subsist on shell-fish under water, would naturally acquire in the course of a few million of years. He would also soon learn to dive and to hold his breath under water (the author once saw a white bear dive in true walrus fashion); and from generation to generation he would be able to stay longer below. He would certainly have very little use for his legs: hence they would gradually become abortive, and resemble fins; the hind legs would grow like the tail of a fish; and the real tail, having no function in the new element, would almost disappear, as is the case with the seal and the walrus. The legs of the walrus—this clenches the argument—although almost abortive, are still legs, and not fins, as he can walk on all-fours on land or ice.

Whatever may be thought of this precious reasoning as a contribution to natural history, no one can deny the skill of the author as a lively and entertaining narrator, and his volume will be regarded as one of the most readable books of travels for which we have recently been indebted to the love of adventure characteristic of so many British sportsmen.

The Alchemist, or The House of Claes, translated from the French of Balzac by O. W. WIGHT and F. B. GOODRICH, is published by Rudd and Carleton, a fantastic, but powerful story of an infatuated adept, who sacrifices his fortune, his character, and the happiness of a devoted wife and family in the vain search for the philosopher's stone.

A Manual of Military Surgery, by S. D. GROSS, M.D. (published by J. B. Lippincott and Co.), is a brief and valuable treatise intended for the use of young physicians in the volunteer service. In addition to the surgical details, which it ably treats, it contains a variety of important practical directions for the preservation of the health of soldiers on march or in the camp.

The Eighth volume of Sheldon's beautiful edition of MILMAN'S History of Latin Christianity has been recently issued, completing the work. In point of general interest, this volume surpasses those which have preceded it, containing an admirably condensed view of theology, literature, painting, sculpture, and architecture of the Middle Ages. The work occupies a high place in the modern historical literature of Great Britain, and the manner in which it is now brought out is an honor to the American press.

Chambers's Encyclopædia. (Published by J. B. Lippincott and Co.) The second title of this work, "A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People," indicates its design and character. In six or seven volumes it proposes to give a digest of those branches of human knowledge most important for the great mass of intelligent readers. This leading object has been kept steadily in view. In Biography obscure names are not recorded; in Geography unimportant places are not described; in Philosophy exploded theories are not revived. The space thus saved is devoted to full articles upon Natural History and Science. These are treated in such a manner as to be intelligible to the non-professional reader, while they are strictly accurate as far as they go. The work will be found admirably adapted to the wants of those who are unable to avail themselves of the larger and more costly publications of a similar kind.

Editor's Table.

THE MASSES.—This is a very common word, and one that has a deepening meaning upon our lips. Perhaps its substitution in place of the words that were formerly employed to mark the many from the few is one of the signs of our democratic times. We do not speak now of the "vulgar," the "plebs," the "rabble," and the like; nor is it thought the part of a gentleman in any good society, or in any book or periodical, to speak with contempt of the multitude. Nor are we satisfied to call them the people merely, for this term is too closely allied with political cant, and gives a suspicion of electioneering aims or partisan adulation. We speak of the masses in a way that marks them not only as the many but as the weighty, and the statesman and the moralist look with mingled solicitude and respect upon them as in number and gravity representing the future of the nation. The most obvious measure of them is number, and we may justly say that they are called the masses who are to be counted instead of being named. The memorable persons of an age are comparatively few, and their names are recorded in biographical dictionaries, official rolls, etc., while the great majority of people are not named to the public ear or known to the public eye, but are counted by thousands or millions. In fact, of those who think themselves among the notables, very few are known out of their own circle or town; and in a country so full of newspapers and facilities of travel as our own, it is often very disheartening to the supposed hero, orator, or author of one section to find that he has not been heard of a hundred miles from home; and on the hotel register or in the rail-cars he is as much one of the masses as any stereotype Mr. Green or Brown. If we test reputation by household fame, very few can lay claim to it; and if men of note are exclusive in their estimate of themselves in relation to the many, these are quite as exclusive in return, and the masses have but a very small number of names upon their list of public acquaintance, and coolly cut the acquaintance of the rank and file of literary and political greatness. Probably a hundred would be a large number of names to record as being known to our people at large; and perhaps the number required to save Sodom from destruction—the number ten—would comprise the first-class notables whose presence would make a sensation in any village in the land.

It may be, indeed, that first-class character does not win popularity in its own day, and the highest quality of merit can only be appreciated by the few, and must rely upon their influence with posterity to reach the many. Yet the dependence, although remote, is none the less important, and true genius will care far more to live in the homes of the people than at the courts of kings, and count a loving place in the farmer's cottage as a far higher reward than a stately shelf in the library of universities. So close is the relation between the many and the few, and so sure are they to need each other's service. And if this relation holds with poets, orators, historians, and the master minds in letters, much more with the thinkers, reformers, and heroes who work more directly upon the common conscience, and whose mission it is to lead the people to better things. Certainly the great question in the world now is, How shall we get hold of the masses? Princes and nobles—nay, even the great despots of our time—are studying the temper of the people, and ready to confess, that however little should be done by the people, every thing should be done for the people. It is not becoming in us, who write as one of the people, to take a position outside or above them, or venture to patronize the masses to which we belong. Yet, taking our stand among them, we are none the less moved to speak of their elements, characteristics, and destiny, and we may perhaps win the ear of not a few of them to some honest and timely thoughts upon the position of the American people at this time.

We confess at the outset that we have respect for the masses in their most obvious aspect, or regarded simply as quantity. If a great mountain impresses us with its grandeur, why not that vastly more mighty and significant mass, a million of human beings—such, for instance, as makes up the population of this great city? Of course the nature of our respect for this mass must depend very much upon the mind they have or the life they live; but considered as so much mere volume of human existence, they have an immense importance in our eyes. Viewing them merely in their physical relations as indicated by the word proletaire, or as the classes that produce proles, or offspring, they give us the idea of wonderful power. A million of creatures who can propagate the human species, and continue to time without end this mysterious gift of life, with all its circumstances and attributes, both personal and social—what a startling spectacle! When, moreover, we connect with this view of their reproductive functions all the offices of nursing, feeding, clothing, shelter that are connected with it, and try to embrace in one view all the natural history and economy of this mass of beings, the contemplation becomes overwhelming, and the fields, forests, waters, air, and skies seem to wait their bidding as willing servitors, ready to pay their tribute. Viewed merely as the highest of animals, man is a most impressive creature, more than a match for the lion or the elephant. What shall we say, then, of a million, or thirty millions, of these creatures gathered as one people?

We know very well that men do not rise in character of necessity as they spread in numbers, and many of the most densely peopled cities and countries are the feeblest and least significant. Yet there will always be enough of social and religious life in the multitude to suggest, if they do not present, the higher characteristics of our race. If, indeed, the million persons were made, like so many bullets, in one mould, and were kept, like bullets, by their own torpor, or by artificial inclosures, from knowing any thing of each other, increase of numbers would not imply any increase of social life; and if one man had no social feeling, a thousand such men would have no more, since, as we were taught at school, a thousand times nothing is just nothing. Sometimes we are tempted to estimate numbers thus when we are among persons who have no enlarged views, no public spirit; and if one of these, by the absence of true human worth, is fitly called nobody, a thousand such nobodies are but nobody. But generally a multitude of people will have some kind of corporate consciousness that makes the many one—one mass at least, if not always one living body or one animated soul. Now, surely this sense of being one mass, or this consciousness of being part of the multitude, gives us an interesting and important view of mere numbers, even without ascending into the higher forms of consciousness that deal with qualities of character rather than with numbers of persons. Thus, the feeling that we belong to a nation of thirty-one millions of people has within it a certain meaning and power before we begin to study the character of our people or consider the grounds of our fellowship and progress. In fact, a certain emotion seems to wait upon the presence of numbers, viewed merely as numbers, and a man feels himself to be a different creature according as he finds himself alone, or with one, or two, or three, or a dozen companions. When the number increases so to make exact counting impossible, he changes his unit of computation to hundreds or thousands, and his feeling rises as the new units swell. Thus an orator breathes more deeply when one of a thousand than of a hundred, and a general's courage rises as the regiments multiply. Generally, indeed, with this sense of numbers, certain qualities of character are appreciated and social affinities are developed. Yet we are justified in maintaining that, apart from any such consideration, there is power in the mere aggregation of numbers; and man, like nature, has a certain life in the mass, as the globe on which we live, before we speculate upon its electric functions or its animated tribes, has unity in its mere bulk, and the gravitation and cohesion of its matter are a type of the gravitation and cohesion that holds multitudes together before they are fused and assimilated by higher forces.

Certainly the most obvious ground of interest in an assembly is in its numbers, and the first question that is asked when we have been to a political, literary, or religious meeting is, "How many were there?" If we analyze the feeling we probably find that, before we discover any peculiar characteristics in the assembly, or enjoy any peculiar fellowship from diverse minds in combination, we find ourselves enlarged by being one of the many, and each man estimates himself by the size of the body to which he belongs. It is important to use this fact in our dealing with the people, and endeavor as far as we can to make mere numbers tell on the right side. Thus popular meetings are of great use apart from any thing that is said, and a vast work is done for any cause when two or three thousand persons come together and look upon each other and their leaders, although no novel ideas may be started and no startling measures may be initiated. We are convinced that many valuable movements have sadly languished from the neglect of this truth; and reformers, statesmen, and moralists have foolishly trusted their cause wholly to abstract reasoning or private conversation, while they overlook the immense power of numbers when gathered together under some commanding mind, or some exciting symbol of patriotism or religion.

It is necessary to be thoughtful, however, in using the power of numbers; and especially there is need of remembering that beyond a certain point multiplicity weakens, or at least confuses, the spectator, instead of strengthening or impressing him. Thus there is a limit to the size of an assembly that can be commanded by one voice or by one eye. Two or three thousand are enough for one man to speak to; and if the aim be to impress the eye, it is wiser to divide a hundred thousand men into ten divisions of ten thousand each than to crowd them together into one immense and unwieldy mass. Indeed, beyond a certain point, size fails to make any impression upon us, and as soon as an assembly is large enough to overflow our field of vision it becomes a mere crowd; and a million of men in one assembly gives us no more idea of multitude, so far as we can judge from the midst of them, than a company of ten thousand men. Hence the superior power of numbers as presented by judicious divisions of the population into towns and states. Merely in a rhetorical or emotional point of view, our American Union is most happily adjusted; and every citizen, as he thinks of the thirty-four States that make up the nation, has a far more distinct and effective idea of the greatness of the people than if the whole population were crowded together in one enormous city, and he tried in vain to take in the whole mass at one view. It is as when we try to see the ocean, and find that we can sweep but a few miles of it with our eye; and we can far better appreciate its extent by looking upon some lake or gulf whose limits we can discern, and then taking this as the unit which is to be multiplied times enough to equal the great sea. Only in this way can we ever begin to appreciate great magnitudes; such, for example, as the entire population of the globe. Most persons get no satisfactory idea from the statement that there are about a thousand millions of human beings on the earth, and they can conceive of a tenth of the number or ten times the number as easily. We come much nearer the mark by riding through the streets and around the suburbs of a great city like ours, and then trying to imagine a thousand cities of about the same number of inhabitants, which must run very near the thousand millions of people assigned to the entire globe.

Perhaps we in this country have our keenest sense of the power of numbers by comparison, especially through the rivalry of sects and parties. We count by majorities and minorities, and where suffrage is so nearly universal as in America, our people are estimated mainly according to the number of votes cast. Yet the absolute number is not thought so important as the relative number, and the question at an election is not so much how many votes were cast, as who had the majority, and how large was the majority. Here comes in the important consideration of the neutralizing of numbers by numbers, or the counterbalancing of masses by masses. Politicians, and in time the people, have a very close sense of the size of parties from this mode of comparison; and when, as is generally the case, this ready estimate of the magnitude of the opposing ranks is connected with the excitement of political opinions and local interests and personal influence, mass is made to appear something far more than mere bulk, and rival parties shine with all the various lights and move with all the various electric forces that appear in the bodies more celestial that star the heavens above us, although sometimes they may remind us more of the glaring meteors that blaze a moment through the darkness to explode and vanish forever.

It should not be forgotten that we are now able to feel the existence and virtual presence of great numbers as never before, and the magnetic telegraph, the locomotive engine, and the press give each of us a ubiquity unknown in the old time. Thus we not only believe from documentary testimony that millions of people live in the great Western Valley, and are pushing on toward the Rocky Mountains, but we almost feel their touch; and when we pay our dollar and send a message to a friend at St. Louis, the answer seems to come to us warm and thrilling with the life of the whole intervening population, and we are vitally one of the million ourselves. This new sense of oneness or solidarity is one of the memorable features of our age, and with all its advantages, it does not fail to suggest some misgivings as to its perils. Certainly since the father of lies began his infernal work, lying was never done on so gigantic a scale as now; and almost every week some monstrous falsehood puts on its more than seven-league boots, and travels from Florida to Maine, or from New Orleans to St. John's, in one electric flash. Rapidity of communication, indeed, does not of itself make more incidents to be transmitted, but simply makes the transmission nearly simultaneous with the occurrence—a fact in itself most significant, since much that passes as news, and is very exciting, would have very little importance if it were left to travel by the slow coach of the old lines of transportation. The peculiar characteristic of our time is the pressure of news from simultaneous occurrences, so that we all live not only our own life, but the life of the whole world, so far as its memorable experiences are concerned; and Europe is but a few days from us, while civilized America is pretty much all at our door, and certainly looks in upon us with our morning and evening paper. This fact must surely give us a new idea of our solidarity, and rid us of the vanity of that poor individualism that sometimes tempts us to set ourselves apart from our race, as if we could live for ourselves or from ourselves alone. It is a new question how this facility of communication shall be employed, and we may well be startled when we think of the power put into the hands of our press of acting upon the mind of the whole nation by telegraphic signals that throw the old beacon fires into contempt, and kindle the whole continent into flame at a single electric word. It may be that necessity and not choice must regulate this mode of communication, and all messages must be sent that business and actual life demand. Yet even in what is called positive news, what room there is for selection, and what frequent cause for suppression! And now that documents, opinions, and speeches are transmitted, what opportunity there is for bringing higher moral and intellectual forces to bear upon the people, and giving sound principles and timely truths the marvelous power of simultaneous publication and popular sympathy throughout the land! But we are advancing before we know it in our discussion, and passing from our view of the masses as numbers or quantity, and considering their quality, or the character of the influence to be brought to bear upon them.

Turn now to the higher view of the subject, and regard the many, not merely as brought together in space, but as united by some prevailing spirit; or, in other words, not merely as aggregated, but as congregated and assimilated. They may, of course, be assimilated by a good or a bad spirit, according as a hero or a buccaneer, an apostle or a fanatic, animates and leads them. If the question be asked whether it is easier to move great companies of men by good or by bad motives, we reply at once that popular passions always have in them decided elements of nobleness; and however blinded and mistaken the multitude may be in their ideas, their purposes are never wholly evil. Even the mob of the Reign of Terror thought that they were doing right, and were far more eager to avenge themselves upon those whom they considered as the enemies of liberty and humanity than to fill their own pockets with plunder. The very lowest class of motives do not show themselves in large assemblies, unless these are wholly imbruted and infuriated by war and bloodshed in its most fearful forms. Thus any exhibition of lustful passion is most offensive to the multitude; and whatever may be the secret sins or private vices of the constituents, the mob, in its corporate capacity, has an utter contempt and hatred for harlots and their retinue of followers. We allow that animosities are more contagious among the many than friendships, and nothing so stirs the crowd as the sight of a common enemy. Yet the animosity thus inflamed is not general or lasting, unless connected with some nobler passion, or some absorbing affection; and if Demosthenes, by his terrible invective against the King of Macedon, kindles in the city a fire of wrath that burns to march against Philip, and to conquer or to die, we must remember that this fire is fed out of the deep love of old Athens, and if hatred touches the match to the lamp, it is patriotism that supplies the oil and feeds it continually. A certain element of antagonism is needed to give zest to all popular movements and emotions; but the greatest power is evolved when the people are united by common interests and affections, and the rise of an enemy brings their union to a decided point, and gives them a common indignation and aim. Such is the effect of war upon nations well civilized and governed, but where public spirit has been permitted to languish during a long period of money-making and self-indulgence, and, perhaps, of selfish partisanship. With all the evils of war—and certainly there are more than we will undertake to rehearse—it evidently brings out patriotic feeling in a marvelous manner; and the first gun fired against our flag has been the reveille of a new age of national enthusiasm—the signal, in fact, that the nation is new born.

But we need not look to such extreme and fearful means to find a wholesome antagonism. All social life comes from a meeting of apparent antagonisms, and every new force rises from the combination of two or more diverse elements. Nature illustrates this law, and air, water, and all the leading substances and organisms of nature show the working of the principle of polarity that educes power by the harmony of opposites. The higher the life evolved, the more wide and wonderful the range and diversity of the materials to be assimilated or combined. The organic substances unite more elements than the inorganic; the plant more than the mineral; the animal more than the plant; the human more than the animal; and man, who is the crown of creation, unites in his constitution the elements of all substances and faculties of all beings beneath him. Human society has the same unity in complexity that the human constitution has; and if we consider the organism and functions of a great nation, we shall be struck with the wonderful assimilation of parts apparently antagonistic. In fact, the nation begins with the union of beings the opposites of each other, and marriage which founds the family, unites for life the sexes, who, in a state of undisciplined nature, are always annoying each other, and in a virtual warfare of aggression and resistance. Business rests upon a similar assimilation, and its work goes on by the harmony between labor and capital, or numbers and wealth, the very powers that constantly tend to make war upon each other in a state of lawlessness. Loyalty, whether under a republican or a monarchical form of government, rests upon a like basis; and by it the weak and the strong, the small and the great, are brought together in a common allegiance: so that the greatest nation is not that which is made up of entire equals, but that which combines the largest number of wholesome diversities in the most vital unity.

The statesman and the moralist, therefore, should bear this principle in mind, and endeavor so to unite and assimilate the various elements of the population as to produce the most comprehensive unity in diversity. They will see that a true method will find a place for the material apparently the most hopeless; and while our social polity thus far has not succeeded in working all the refuse population into the social fabric, and still a portion is set aside in the poor-house as helpless, or in the prison as dangerous, we are more willingly leaving people to their own affinities, and trusting less and less in arbitrary forces, such as the bayonet and the lash, to restrain them. Many whose unruly tempers might make them bad subjects in our city find better use for their reckless daring at sea or in the backwoods, and the more refined and attractive arts of peace waken into usefulness many timid natures, who under rude sway might be frightened into imbecility and pauperism. We can not go with the Socialists in affirming that a new method of living in community would neutralize all unwholesome social elements, and harmonize all antagonisms, for we believe that great responsibility rests with each man, and society can not take his work or his doom off his shoulders; but we are quite sure that a more enlarged system would point toward such results, and bring under wholesome motives numbers who are now given over to idleness or vice.

Our nationality is a marvelous example of the assimilation of diverse materials by one spirit and one constitution. For nearly a century we have lived together in virtual peace and prosperity, and the widest differences of climate and race have been combined under one powerful government. The East and the West, the North and the South differ in the temperament of their people, yet not enough to compel alienation. Nay, the Eastern man in his stability, and the Western man in his restlessness, are all the better friends by being able to give and receive each in exchange for what is received and given, as the slow and careful man is cheered by a companion more free and fast than himself, and nothing is more marked than the great good feeling between the extremes of our country. New England and the Mississippi Valley are great friends, and New York is hand in glove with San Francisco. Between North and South there are, we know, other elements of antagonism than those of climate and pulse, and some of these are too perplexing to be handled here now. But so far as the characteristics of the Northerner and Southerner are concerned, as growing out of cooler and warmer temperaments, or more balanced and more impulsive natures, they are fitted for being the best friends in the world; and if harsh political questions could be adjusted, or utterly removed from public debate, interesting affinities would show themselves, and friendship and marriage would join North and South in close ties both social and national. We need a better understanding between the good and true men of both sections; and it is much to be lamented that these two great communities have been interpreted to each other, not by the wisest and calmest, but by the most extreme and hot-headed agitators in both sections.

We are certainly agreeably disappointed in the disposition of the new Europeans who have lately come to live with us, and there is far less fear than of old that they will make war upon our institutions. The Irish and the Germans are the most conspicuous in numbers and influence; yet they make very good Americans, and are ready to stand by our constitution and laws, even to take arms in their defense. The most dangerous disorganizers have not sprung from them, nor from the ranks of the common people, but rather from disappointed aspirants for political power, who mingle the pride of aristocrats with the passions and vulgarity of demagogues. We do not fear any great trouble from such difference of race, but apprehend rather that our national life will be enlarged and enriched from such a range and diversity of materials. In fact, our original States, although mainly English, had representatives from all nations; and the majority of English colonists, instead of being of one stereotype class, were so various in creed, politics, and habit, as to make the thirteen colonies most interesting specimens of unity in difference, and models of the principle and the policy that should now and ever carry out the old motto that out of the many ever makes the one.

We have not space to illustrate at length the philosophy of social assimilation, or to point out the means to be used to develop the highest order of life from the different elements in our country and our people. We can have little hope from any measures that look merely to immediate effect, and do not consider the perpetuity of the national life. The national life is perpetuated by stability and progress; the one being the root, the other the branches and the fruit of its prosperity. He is the wise leader of the masses who looks judiciously to these two ruling powers, and adjusts them effectively. Without stability, progress is restless, reckless, fruitless; and without progress, stability is sluggish, stagnant, lifeless. Our nation, in its fixed law and in its changing and animating men, has signally combined the two. Every patriot must strive and pray that the old constitution and laws may be maintained, and that the nation may be fixed in the steadfastness of a sound conservatism, and quickened by the fire of progressive courage. God has given us our guiding law and our moving mind, and he will continue and renew them still. More deeply perhaps than we are conscious, we feel this two-fold gift when we look at the flag of our Union, as we have so often done of late, and our hearts beat quicker, and our eyes fill with tears of joy and hope as we gaze upon its stripes and stars. Those stars speak to us of laws of equity as fixed as the eternal heavens; and those stripes, as they wave in the breeze, tell us of that mysterious breath which moves through men and nations, that they may be born, not of the flesh, but of God.

Editor's Easy Chair.

TOWN TALK has but one topic in these days, and can not well have any other. There is little social gayety; few books are published; the Gallery of the National Academy is closed, and Church's picture of "The North" is the chief representative of the Fine Arts. But the great city was never more thronged and busy, and never so earnest in the experience of the younger citizens. Possibly in the old days, when the Sons of Liberty met in the building near the Bowling Green, long known as the Atlantic Garden; or in the later times, when the British fleet sailed up the Chesapeake and the British army marched upon Washington, there was a similar public excitement.

How little Americans of this generation supposed that they should ever hear the alarm of war! Our whole system is so peaceful—the doctrine of our institutions has always been so opposed to the traditions of other nations—that we have proudly felt how softly, by the mild voice of law, all our differences would be adjusted, and civilization secured and perpetuated by the ministries of peace.

We were too eager. When vital differences prevail among men there can be but one final solution—that of force. It seems to be a blind appeal to Providence, upon Fichte's doctrine that the right cause is sure to triumph. Hence, also, the old battle-cry, God for the right! Hence, also, the old hand-shaking before the encounter, in sign that there was no personal enmity, but that each combatant felt himself to be but an agent.

"Non-resistance won't work," said Fountain to the Easy Chair, the other day. Fountain has cherished for a long time a secret conviction that the world had unconsciously drifted into the Millennium. The Crimean war shook his faith sadly. The Sepoy rebellion staggered him. But in the days upon which we have fallen in this country, he has abandoned the Millennial theory altogether.

It is said again that Thackeray is to take up Macaulay's History, and bring it through the eighteenth century; and it is added that some people are very much disturbed by the intention.

"Some people" are disturbed by every thing that happens. Is there any reason why Thackeray should not do it? His studies and sympathies peculiarly fit him for the work; and his pictures, to say the worst of it, could not be more unfaithful than Macaulay's. Macaulay painted for the sake of the picture, not of the likeness. His gallery of portraits, extending through all his works, glows with splendor of color, vigor of drawing, and glitter of accessories. But when his great merits have been conceded, and the student proceeds to inquire whether they are the merits of a truthful chronicler or of a consummate literary artist—do you think Thackeray need be nervous?

Hear what one of his recent critics says—of course, a Tory critic:

"As a specimen of style—at once vivid and correct—it will last till the New Zealander himself shall appear on London Bridge; but every day its assumption of fact and its appraisal of character are being called into question. The Scotch swear the historian has belied them. The Quakers affirm the same. Tories read the book because they say the caricature of conservatism can scarcely go farther, and the gorgeousness of the libels must abash smaller lampoonists for all time to come. Not even the Whigs, however, can rely on it; Lord John Russell would scarcely dare quote the fulsome portrait of his great idol, Lord Somers. 'Paint me,' said Cromwell to Lely, 'warts and all.' Macaulay's Whigs are wartless—his Tories are all warts. In his fifth volume he fails to see a solitary vice in Charles Montague. In the fourth he failed to perceive a single virtue in the Duke of Marlborough. This is not the way to write our annals. It may be made very pleasant reading, especially when relieved with well-grouped pictures and elaborate processions, but it is not history."

It is a fair reply to this to say that the History of England is necessarily a history of parties—or, in other words, of a certain policy, upon which the people have divided into parties; and every man who is competent to write a history must have his opinion of the right or wrong in the matter, and he will naturally favor those with whom he sympathizes. For example, Froude gives one view of Henry the Eighth and the Reformation, and the Protestant historians of England another. Which is right? How are you to reconcile them? The English Jacobites long drank to Charles the Martyr. The English Whigs secretly approved the doom of Charles the Traitor. Will you have Jacobite history or Whig history?

It does not follow, indeed, that a historian shall be unjust because he believes one party to have been in the wrong; and this is the force of the objection to Macaulay. "We do not complain," say the Tories, "that he was a Whig. But we do complain that he paints us as devils, and not as Tories. Lord Somers may have been a great man, but surely Marlborough was not a fool."

And so much must be allowed. Macaulay was not fair. He was not fair, for instance, as Motley is, whose sympathies for the Dutch in the struggle he records are quite as warm as Macaulay's could have been for the Whigs. A curious and remarkable illustration of Macaulay's subordination of the fact to the brilliant and effective account of it is given in the lately published "Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains of Mrs. Piozzi." Macaulay wrote a paper upon Dr. Johnson for the "Encyclopædia Britannica." It was one of his most admirable performances, and as a piece of brief and effective biography it was masterly. Dr. Johnson's intimacy with Mrs. Thrale, afterward Mrs. Piozzi, is one of the pleasantest episodes of his melancholy life. He seems to have been happier in her house than any where else in the world. Some time after Mr. Thrale's death his widow married Mr. Piozzi. There was a great outcry and surprise among her friends. Johnson wrote her an unpardonable letter. He insulted her, and she returned a most womanly and noble reply. Then she went with her husband to Italy, his native country; and before she returned Dr. Johnson was dead. Macaulay tells this story with his bitterest brilliancy. "She, meanwhile," he says, "fled from the laughter and hisses of her countrymen and countrywomen to a land where she was unknown, hastened across Mount Cenis, and learned, while passing a merry Christmas of concerts and lemonade parties at Milan, that the great man with whose name hers is inseparably associated had ceased to exist."

This is well turned, but unluckily it is not quite true. On the contrary, it is entirely untrue. The actual facts of the story are told in the Diary and Letters of Mrs. Piozzi, and they differ substantially from the vivid and pointed description of the historian. "Give Archimedes a place to stand on," says Mrs. Piozzi's editor, "and he would move the world. Give Talleyrand a line of a man's handwriting, and he would engage to ruin him. Give Lord Macaulay a hint, a fancy, an insulated fact or phrase, a scrap of a journal or the tag end of a song, and on it, by the abused prerogative of genius, he would construct a theory of national or personal character which should confer undying glory or inflict indelible disgrace."

Thackeray differs entirely from Macaulay in precisely this requisite for historical composition. He is no partisan, because of his singular intellectual impartiality. His style is exquisitely lucid and idiomatic, and his narrative power remarkable. If he does continue Macaulay's History, it will be the best continuation in literature—better than Martin Farquhar Tupper's completion of "Christabel."

IN these stirring times many persons have very crude ideas of what it is to break the peace. Why should people fight? they ask. Hasn't the world got beyond fighting? Isn't peace the most desirable of all things? And ought we not to sacrifice a great deal for the sake of peace?

Certainly we ought. But it is the question of cowardice and baseness as well as of a sincere desire. It very readily degenerates into a cry for peace every where, at all hazards, and at every cost. But is there a noble man or nation any where that would take such ground?

Peace can always be bought if you will pay the price. If a robber stops you upon the road, if a burglar stands over your child and threatens, you need not break the peace, you have only to give them all they ask and there need be no blows, no disturbance. You may have peace if you will pay the price. A man leads you by the nose through the street—you have only to go quietly. A man kicks you—you have only to wait for more. A man grasps your throat—you have only to stand still. He throttles you—you have only to drop dead.

In all these cases there need be no breach of the peace if you cheerfully submit. But now see—if a man assaults you in your person or your rights, who is the breaker of the peace if you defend yourself? There is no need of serving the devil with the Lord's weapons. No man is called upon to favor anarchy under the plea of preserving peace. In fact, if you would have peace, be ready to maintain and defend it. Peace is a good thing—but only an honorable and manly peace. There is the peace of industrious activity, and there is the peace of death; a tree in a windless summer day is peaceful, so is a stagnant pool. When a man buys peace with dishonor does he not buy it too dearly?

IN Dickens's novel of "Great Expectations," which is now appearing in Harper's Weekly, the novelist returns to his earlier manner. There is more of his peculiar humor in the work than in any he has recently written. The characters are singularly original, and the plot striking and entirely new. The extravagance is a Dickens extravagance, bearing the same relation to life as the portraits of which it is said that they are more like the sitter than he is to himself. The extravagance of Dickens is like a tune played an octave above. It is the perfect melody, although nobody can sing it so high.

Pip, the hero of the book, is a youth suddenly promoted from the smithy of his brother-in-law, Joe Gargery, upon the edge of the marshes somewhere in England, to the position of a young gentleman of great expectations. But neither Pip nor the reader suspect, until they are told, whence these expectations are derived, and then Pip and the reader are equally surprised. Joe Gargery is one of the uncouth beings with a heart as huge as his body, of whom Dickens is so fond, whose simplicity of nature confounds the worldly sagacity of shrewd men. And Dickens makes his readers no less fond of him. The great, blundering, ungrammatical, overgrown Joe, a kind of domestic Titan, helpless in speech, and of no education, is pathetic from his affectionate fidelity, and sublime through the naked instinct of duty.

Miss Havisham is the next most emphatic sketch of character. She was the victim of some bitter nuptial disappointment, and in her gray age her crazed brain holds her the prisoner of that tragical moment. She lives in her chamber garnished for the bridal, wearing her nuptial veil and dress which have grown yellow with time, tottering upon her cane about the table upon which the bride-cake moulds and the ghastly candles burn the whole year round. The object of her life is to destroy the peace of men—to break their hearts in revenge for her own grief. She is old and withered, and can inflame no heart with her own beauty, so she cherishes a young and superb girl, whom she has educated to be her avenger. A young, superb girl, Estella, like Maud, "Passionless, pale, cold face, star sweet on a gloom profound;

Woman-like, taking revenge too deep for a transient wrong."

Her part in the story, thus far, has been to ensnare the affections of Pip, but without effort. She evidently does not wish that he should love her, and for some reason spares him the intentional torture of her charms. But for all that, Pip is hopelessly enamored.

The convict is a bold picture in Dickens's most vigorous vein; and Wemmick, the clerk of the criminal lawyer, who is a lawyer's clerk in town and a quaint, simple human being in the country, is one of those exquisitely humane touches which show the master of his art. Mr. Jaggers, the criminal lawyer, who knows all the evil-doers and who seems capable of all their crimes, is curiously contrasted with his clerk, suggesting, without any especial resemblance, the relation of Ralph Nickleby and Newman Noggs.

The plot of the story is thus far capitally concealed. The breadth and humor of the style are in the old manner. The richness of imagination, the affluence of invention, are as remarkable as ever. In these days of little new reading "Great Expectations" is peculiarly welcome.

SEVERAL of the best known and most benevolent of the men and women of Boston have been interesting themselves in the foundation of an Institution for Homeless and Outcast Women. "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more." Upon the list of names are merchants, lawyers, poets, clergymen, and people of all pursuits, with women who are to be found wherever the unfortunate are.

Of course the first emotion of all who read such a statement is that the project is amiable enough, but wholly impracticable. If a sin can only contrive to become monstrous enough it is finally regarded as a part of the natural order of things; and any attempt to remove it, or to obviate its effects, is looked upon like the effort to dig away a mountain. But this is always understood by those who have a little experience of any kind of reform. The nuisance is so comfortably entrenched, the world has become so used to it, that really it seems a very gratuitous task to try to abate it. If it be a profitable nuisance, the course of reform is like that of true love.

Let us suppose a bone-boiling shop which poisons a neighborhood with its noisome breath. When the question is first asked, the shop, which thinks that mild concession is the best way to paralyze the hostile movement, says plaintively, "Well, unluckily, I probably am a nuisance; I suppose I do smell rather strong. Pity, pity! Since bones must be boiled, it were to be wished that they could be boiled without smell. But, alas! in this world," sighs the fetid old shop, "what is perfect?"

The opposition is staggered by this courteous reception and confession. "After all," bleat some of the weaker brethren, "the old shop puts it very reasonably. It does smell. It confesses it. 'Tis the nature of boiling bones. Now bones must be boiled, and they will smell; but certainly this shop smells badly with the utmost politeness and regret. It would be very ill-natured to trouble such a courteous nuisance."

If the matter is pushed—and, somehow, it always is pushed—the shop becomes truculent in the degree that it perceives the effort at removal to be earnest. "Pooh! pooh! what are you talking about? The smell of boiling bones is peculiarly healthy. It is a very lucky neighborhood that can secure a good, rank, bone-boiling shop and smell!"

So at last it is kicked out.

Moral nuisances follow the same law. If the pressure against them is strong they usually succeed by a compromise: "Regulate us—don't abate us." Society, as a whole, capitulates under that name of compromise. But a few are unwilling still, and as they are entirely in earnest, they finally carry the day. It is a good rule, therefore, when you wish to do men service, to seek some unblazoned, struggling, apparently hopeless movement for relief, and help that. It is never difficult to follow the fashion. To set the fashion is quite another thing. John Howard is a heroic philanthropist whom we are inclined to undervalue, because prison reform is one of the accepted fashions of charity. (It is not said unkindly; and there is plenty more work to do in that direction.) But when Howard plunged into the dungeons of Europe, and brought the sunshine of human sympathy with him, his coming was like his whose feet are beautiful upon the mountains.

Our charity is languid so long as it is skeptical of any reform. The methods may be matters of difference and debate, but not the object.

It was not more a matter of course, a century ago, that debtors should be imprisoned than it is now that the friendless and outcast women of our society should be utterly lost. But we have grown wiser about imprisonment for debt: why should we indulge any foolish skepticism or despair of any other enlightenment?

It is proposed to found a self-sustaining and industrial institution for forsaken and homeless women. There have been many attempts to help this unhappy class, but they have failed for many reasons. Placing them in families is a method defeated by the prejudice of society. Then many kinds of employment devised for them are chosen regardless of their inevitable restlessness. "In work-rooms and female associations generally, the scorn of the untempted and the suffering of the fallen stamp every attempt to employ them with mortification and failure."

The general plan of this movement contemplates the culture of fruits, vegetables, and flowers; the care of the dairy and of poultry; of green-houses and nurseries; the preparation of seeds and herbs, of pickles, preserves, and jellies, etc.; the cutting and making of common garments. Ten thousand dollars are wanted to begin with, which is to be raised by voluntary subscriptions in various ways.

The persons who are interested in this movement are precisely those who understand the peculiar difficulties of any such effort. They are neither Utopians, nor infidels, nor Sybarites. They are of the kind by which the work of the world is done. The least we can do is to cheer them by our hope, if we can not muster faith enough. And if we can not hope, we can at least pray.

Is honor, then, mere froth and quibble, F. B.? Is there nothing meant by the word but the maudlin conceit of blackguards and duelists? Is there no such thing as national honor, and is the honor of a gentleman a chimera? I do not mean by gentleman a person who thinks it is his business to devote himself to horses and billiards and his own comfort, and who is ready to kill any body who calls him liar; but a man who lives for others as he best may. When you speak of the honor of a man, do you mean something contemptible or something visionary? No, F. B.: we mean by honor that which is right and just and manly. A man is dishonored, not when a drunkard throws a glass of wine in his face, or when a ribald calls him liar, but when he is mean, false, and unmanly. And so a nation is dishonored when it is recreant to the same great and eternal principles which ought to mould private character and guide private conduct.

A war can not be properly compared to a duel, because it is based upon denial of necessary rights or invasion. National honor, justly speaking, is the national loyalty to the principles of its Government. A nation may dishonor itself, as an individual may, by recreancy to principle, whether political or moral; and it is the most deadly of errors for the citizen of any Government to suppose that peace at all hazards is the duty of that Government; and equally unjust to assume that the war it wages is merely a quarrel upon a perilous point of honor.

F. B. will not have forgotten how well Tennyson puts this in his abused poem "Maud." He was charged with betrayal of the vocation of the poet because he denounced peace. But he did not. In the passages quoted against him he does not denounce peace. But he insisted, as every clear-sighted man must, that there may easily arise an occasion in which war is the noblest and most peaceful part. He knew when the savage has raised his tomahawk over your child, that he who cries to you "Peace, hold your hand!" is a more mortal foe than the murderer. He knew that under the name and form of peace the most annihilating war may be waged upon all that makes society tolerable.

Let us refresh our remembrance of the closing lines of the poem in which, during the Crimean war, the poet laureate of England sang his hopes and fears of his country. There is no citizen in any land in our day who may not be warned by the words. True to his duty as a poet, a creative singer, Tennyson unfolds the eternal law of human nature and human society, that storm is better than stagnation, and that the spiritual laws of this world are just as resolute and sure in their operation as the laws of chemistry or the stock market. He insists that a seed planted in the ground is not so sure to germinate as wrongs and corruptions in society to rend and tear it at last like departing devils. And in saying it the poet only echoes the lesson of all history.

The poet dreams. The vision

"Spoke of a hope for the world in the coming wars.

* * * * *
And it was but a dream, yet it lighten'd my despair
When I thought that a war would arise in defense of the right,
That an iron tyranny now should bend or cease,
The glory of manhood stand on his ancient height,
Nor Britain's one sole God be the millionaire.
* * * * *

And as months ran on and rumor of battle grew,
 'It is time, it is time, O passionate heart,' said I (For I cleaved to a cause that I felt to be pure and true)
 'It is time, O passionate heart and morbid eye,
 That old hysterical mock-disease should die.'
 And I stood on a giant deck, and mixed my breath
 With a loyal people shouting a battle cry
 Till I saw the dreary phantom arise and fly
 Far into the North, and battle, and seas of death.

Let it go or stay, so I wake to the higher aims
 Of a land that has lost for a little her lust of gold,
 And love of a peace that was full of wrongs and shames
 Horrible, hateful, monstrous—not to be told;
 And hail once more to the banner of battle unroll'd!
 Though many a light shall darken and many shall weep
 For those that are crushed in the clash of jarring claims,
 Yet God's just doom shall be wreaked on a giant liar:
 And many a darkness into the light shall leap,
 And shine in the sudden making of splendid names,
 And noble thought be freer under the sun,
 And the heart of a people beat with one desire;
 For the long, long canker of peace is over and done,
 And now by the side of the Black and the Baltic deep,
 And deathful-grinning mouths of the fortress, flames
 The blood-red blossom of war with a heart of fire."

EASY CHAIRS have a natural sympathy for Loun-gers. They seem almost made for them. Loiterers, lazy people, vagabonds, have all a kinship with the expansive arms and the comfortable cushions of the Chair. This Chair, of course, is no exception.
 So strong is the fellow-feeling that he always feels self-reproached if he rolls by an organ-grinder without giving him something for his melodious vagabondage—easy enough to others, but so wearisome to himself. A man is always so naturally suspicious that his virtuous indignation with a beggar is only an ingenious swindle of selfishness—a kind of Mr.
 Jenkinson of an emotion. You remember that Mr.
 J. was the moral scoundrel in green spectacles in "Pelham." And there are so many of those sleek, green-spectacled, ex-officio virtuous, scoundrels among our emotions!

I am trying to smooth the way to say that I am consciously and outrageously humbugged four times a year, once a quarter, by the most abominable Italian mendicant that ever went unwashed from Monte Rosa to Tarentum. It was about four years ago, one summer afternoon, hazy and languid as Capri in July, that I first saw this dreadful sinner. I was sitting quietly, as Easy Chairs do on warm afternoons, with all my four feet extended, and smoke exuding from where a mouth should be, if Easy Chairs had mouths. As I sat dreaming, I saw a seedy, utterly filthy, and obsequious figure approaching; an old man, evidently, and with his remnant of a hat in his hand, bowing almost to the ground, as he caught my eye, and leering upon me with fawning servility, as if wondering whether I should think him worth spitting upon. His hair was a mass of white bristles, and the combination of age and servility inspired a feeling of curious and painful loathing. The man's clothes hung tattered about him, and as he came near enough to speak he leered at me, his body still bent, and the head turning restlessly and appealingly toward me like that of an abject animal; and still grimacing, I saw his lips move and heard the words:

"Per amor' di Dio, Signore."

What I was to do for the love of God he did not say, and there was no need of saying. The man actually squirmed as he spoke it; but the words came out full and clear and crisp, and his knee seemed longing to touch the ground that he might worship me.

I looked without speaking, and he handed a piece of paper that had the complexion of small-pox, cholera, and the plague. There was no mortal or disgusting disease that might not have been taken from that paper. However, I glanced at it, and saw that it was one of the certificates which are issued by some bureau of Mendicancy, and which solemnly attest innumerable absurd lies.

Still, I could not help feeling that however the paper might lie, and the man's tongue lie, and his beastly sycophancy lie, they did all tell the most tremendous truth. The man as he stood there could not lie. He could not prevaricate, nor hide the fact that he was an utterly disgusting and deplorable Italian beggar; and not only that, but a professional beggar, and a skillful but still hackneyed artist in his melancholy and miserable vocation. It was clearly up-hill with him in the world. He may have been in the country thirty years instead of the two which his paper set forth; he may never have lost his wife and children by something or other, as was also stated in his diseased credentials. It might be all a lie in the details; but the truth was unde-niable, he was having a rough passage over the great ocean that we are sailing, and if any man probably had excuses for lying he was the man.

Probably there was something of this faint touch of sympathy in the sound of my voice, when I replied to him—mustering the best Italian I could recall, and asking him what he wanted.

There was a little less grimace as he answered,
 "A little money."

"But you are lying; and this paper is a lie: and you are a regular old vagabond and beggar."

I said it blandly, and it sounded like a musical compliment in my vaguely reminiscent Italian.

He relapsed instantly into cringing depreciation:

"No, Signore! Per l'amor' di Dio!"

I gravely asked him how long he had been in the country, and he instantly departed from the statement of the certificate, while his head gradually rose and his voice whined much less. He gave me a mouthful of ringing Italian, and ended by asking
 "Had the Signore been in Italy?"

Yes, the Signore had been there.

Sicuro: nothing could be plainer from the wonderful fluency and classic purity with which the dearest Excellency spoke Italian. He must have been every where in Italy! In Genoa?

Yes.

Gia! In Florence?

Yes.

Wonderful! In Rome?

Yes.

Dear saints! But not in Naples?

Yes.

Gran' Dio! It is a miracle!

I said the old reprobate was an artist. He managed the details of his profession with perfect skill.
 At the least hint of familiarity his head rose and his voice began to lose its obsequious whine. At the least tone of superiority down went the head, out came the leer at the eyes, and the voice canted back again into the treble drawl. At some time of his life the man may have done some work. He said that he had once been a vine-dresser in Tuscany.
 He said so; but talking with some men is like walking upon quicksand. He was an idler by nature; a minion of the sun. He was ready to cringe and squirm his way through life, but not to work his passage. Yet he was such a thorough lazaroni, such a demoralized Edie Ochiltree, that beside the Emerald beggars, who compose the great army of our paupers, he seemed actually poetic.

The shilling that he got stood for a great many things besides Christian charity, and as he took it in his hand he tried to stoop and kiss mine. But his hand was cold, and mine escaped from it as soon as possible. Then bowing to the ground he limped and hustled away.

Just four months afterward he reappeared. He had evidently quite forgotten the dearest Excellency, and began to tell the same old Sardinian lie. A few words restored his recollection, and he assumed a tone of old acquaintance. He chattered on for some time, and finally collected his shilling and departed. I wished for an invisible cap to follow him.

One or two more visits and he was fairly installed as my Italian pensioner. He came as regularly and successfully as the tax-gatherer. Only yesterday I was holding my neighbor's horses while he helped his wife out of the carriage, when I heard a scuffling along the avenue and beheld the pensioner. I was concealed in front of the horses, but I saw the half-alarmed air with which my neighbor's wife looked at the Italian, while her husband reminded her that it was only the friend of Mr. Easy Chair. Mrs. Neighbor did not seem relieved, but hastily gave him two shillings, as if she were ridding herself of some evil spirit. The old rascal grinned and grimaced, and shambled off, while I ran across the grounds to my own door, and leaned against the side, awaiting him as he came round by the road.

I saw him through the shrubs as he unlatched the gate and came in. He took his hat off as he entered, and surveyed the ground as if suspecting dogs; for I suppose he felt, as every one who saw him must have known, that there was no blind, old, toothless cur in the world so dull as not to bark at him. When he saw me he stopped and cringed. I looked steadily at him, without speaking. He came wriggling up the path, and in the most pathetic whine began his appeal.

"How much have you received to-day?" I asked, cutting him short.

The old chap held up two fingers.

"Sette soldi, che!"

Seven cents! And I had just seen the two shillings slip into his pocket!

"You hardened old vagabond, you dreadful liar, you hopelessly lost sinner," I answered, with a perfectly smiling face, and the gray-beard smiled in return—"what fire do you think will be hot enough for such a scamp as you? Didn't you just get two shillings?"

He looked at me a moment narrowly. He had come straight by the road from the other house. He knew of no private path, and I had the air of an Easy Chair which has been leaning against the door for a month; so he ventured,

"No, Signore, che!"

It was done with great skill; but I laughed so skeptically, and told him so distinctly what I had just seen, that he instantly recanted:

"Si, Signore, due shillings!" and smiled as if there were no escaping so excellent a joke.

I talked with him and presently paid his fee. An Easy Chair can not excuse itself for doing so. If you reproach it with encouraging idleness—ma che! shall a man starve? If you know he will steal from somebody if you don't give him something, will you withhold your alms? Let us be reasonable. The old pensioner is lazy and tells lies—that is the worst of it. The extenuation of the Easy Chair's weakness is, that there are a great many people who are not amusing, and who do not beg, yet who do just what the old pensioner does.

Our Foreign Bureau.

FROM a recent Report of the Council of Public Health for the Department of the Seine, for the ten years last past, we extract a few facts which may be of service to your metropolitan advisers—of double service if they serve to waken your public men to the importance of establishing a similar commission of scientific and honest inquirers in all your large cities.

First of all, the Paris Board condemns the system of warming houses with furnace heat, particularly the large lodging-houses which are intended for the poorer classes. It objects to the system that it does not supply ready means of ventilation, besides affording no means of economizing the heat according to the hours during which the apartments are occupied, or for rendering it serviceable for cooking purposes.

In regard to sewers, the Commission reports the entire feasibility of disinfecting all the impure waters discharged through them. It is further suggested that these disinfected waters be diverted from the river, according to a plan submitted by an eminent engineer, and the sediment reserved for agricultural purposes.

Certain cheap disinfectants recommended by the Board we copy:

"1. Dissolve sulphate of zinc in water, and add a sufficient quantity of boiled rice-water; also a few drops of some aromatic essence: this produces a white liquid for the disinfection of liquids. Take, on the other hand, a solution of sulphate of iron, and add a solution of tannin, some raw pyroligneous acid, a little charcoal, and a few drops of an aromatic essence; this will give a black liquid for the disinfection of solid matter. 2. Or else, dissolve 25 parts of sulphate of zinc, and two parts of sulphate of copper, in 973 parts of water. This, besides disinfecting fetid matter, may also be usefully applied in disinfecting places where many people are constantly crowded together, by aspersion with a watering-pot. 3. Lastly, a mixture of charcoal in grains and chloride of lime may be used, but this is more bulky and costly."

In speaking of the comparative healthfulness of different trades, the Board signalizes the manufacture of white-lead as the most deleterious; and strongly urges the adoption of oxyd of zinc in place of white-lead. It instances a large house-painting establishment of Paris where the use of lead colors has been wholly abandoned, and their places supplied by the chromate of zinc, the sulphuret of antimony, and a combination of oxyd of cobalt and zinc, which has the name of riman green. These are innocent, and yield beautiful shades of color. The manufacture of lucifer matches is characterized as excessively harmful.

The question of horse-flesh is considered, and the importance of it as an alimentary substance doubted. Good horse-flesh may be palatable, but good horse-flesh is worth more for other purposes; whereas the grain or food which would go to build up broken-down hacks is much better bestowed upon sheep and bullocks. Twelve thousand horses are annually killed in the suburbs; but of these not one in a hundred are fit to furnish food.

The Board further condemns the custom of supplying poultry with animal food.

The report mentions an alimentary substance called Revalesscière Dubarry, said to come from India, which it declares to be nothing else but a mixture of the flour of beans and lentils; while the Ervalenta or Revalenta Arabica is the flour of lentils alone. The sale of these pretended specifics has been forbidden by the Board, except under their real names. In the same manner "Solenta" is henceforth to be sold only as potato flour; and the famous "Racahout des Arabes," and "Palamout des Turcs," are to resume their original names of flour of acorns and flour of maize, with or without aroma or sugar. Tapioca also is henceforward to be sold according to its real origin, and labeled "Tapioca of exotic fecula," or "of indigenous fecula." Thus likewise the adulterations practiced on olive-oil have been unmasked by the Board. On the subject of wine, the Report condemns the use of what is called vin de teinte de Fismes, for giving wines a dark color. It is a liquid extracted from elder-berries, with an addition of alum. Regarding milk, the Board declares that there are sufficient means for testing its purity, but that it would be prejudicial to the public to publish any instructions on the matter. It admits the addition of a little bicarbonate of soda to milk which is to be sent a great way, because it prevents its turning, and can not injure the health of the consumer. The use of potash, however, should be prohibited. A vast number of frauds on coffee, chocolate, and tea are further exposed, from which we learn that the finer and more high-sounding the name given to the compound, the more filthy and villainous it generally is, containing husks of cocoa, burned rye or beans, the refuse of beet-root sugar manufactories, etc. The only way, it appears, of being sure of the coffee one drinks is to buy it in the grain. Regarding sugar-plums, all kinds of fancy-paper colored with deleterious substances are forbidden. The coloring substances the use of which is permitted, are indigo, Prussian blue, ultramarine, cochineal, carmine, Brazil lake, saffron, French berries (grana Avenionensis), and their compounds for green and violet. The substances prohibited are—all oxyds of copper or lead, Sanders blue, sulphuret of copper or vermilion, chromate of lead, Schweinfurth green, Scheele's and metis green and white-lead.

The same Board of Health from which we derive these suggestions remarks upon the feasibility of bringing salt-water to Paris from the neighborhood of Honfleur, for the establishment of sea-water baths. As a preliminary step, and to test the efficacy of such baths in a metropolitan district, the old school-frigate has been moored near to the Pont Royal, and is now being fitted for a bathing establishment, the sea-water being brought each day by rail from Havre.

It is not over yet in the late Kingdom of Naples. The reactionists are fully at work; the camorristi are taking advantage of the disturbed condition of the country to levy heavy tribute upon all chance travelers. A Lombard reports, in a journal of Turin, that having occasion to pass from Nola, distant only a few leagues, into the city of Naples, he was strongly advised against it by a captain in the royal carabineers. But his business being urgent, he availed himself of a guide and protector (armed only with a stout bludgeon), who was a native of the country. Every picket of soldiery advised him of the risk he ran, at all which his protector of the bludgeon only shrugged his shoulders. And it proved that the bludgeon, made effective by a heavy douceur, carried him through safely, it appearing at the end that the protector was none other than an agent of the brigands, among whom the price of safe-conduct was duly divided. The same pleasant system is understood to be duly inaugurated just now on all the great roads of the south of Italy.

As for the young King, he is safely and delightfully posted for the summer near to Albano, upon that chain of purple hills which sweep round the campagna of Rome to the westward. Near him, at Castel Gondolfo, is the dowager Queen, his mother, a guest of the hospitable Pope. The royal officers who remain loyal are renewing their oaths, and preparing themselves, under the instructions of their august master and of the subtle Antonelli, for a summer of intrigue against the royalty of Italy.

Nor is this the only or the greatest danger which the new kingdom has to contend with. The Mazzinists are every where busy; they have urged the rupture of Garibaldi with the Administration; and had they not been met by the severe and self-sacrificing patriotism of the Count Cavour, would have embroiled Italy afresh. The parliamentary passages of the great minister with the great soldier are now a matter of gone-by news. The result was a quasi victory for the patriot chieftain; but not by any reason of his parliamentary strategy or courtesy. Never, indeed, did a great man so forget himself to acrimony, and abate his reputation by violence. Nobody looked for an accomplished debater or a suave talker; but all who admired him and valued him had reason to look for more of dignity, and that calm self-restraint which his elevation ought to bestow. The King, with a bonhomie and good sense that were admirable, healed the breach between the rivals. Garibaldi's wishes in respect to the army of Southern Italy were regarded; and he has gone back to Caprera to bide quietly the occasion for more worthy service than he can render in the House of Deputies.

It is noteworthy in these times of war, that the the volunteer army of the south is to keep by its Garibaldian uniform of red; and, paradoxical as it may seem, the great general is understood to urge it as the safest and least royant of colors for the field. A writer in one of the journals of Turin details a personal conversation with Garibaldi, in which the chieftain sets forth warmly this strange opinion.

We have alluded to the troubles in the South of Italy, the active schemes of the reactionists, favored by a recreant priesthood and the growing audacity of Calabrian brigands; but, on the other hand, we find cause for hope in the inauguration of new measures of justice, and the effective engraftment of a valid jury system upon the judicial administration of the South. Under this the conductor of a noisy paper, the Pietra Infernale, was arraigned for "indecent attacks on our holy religion and on good morals." The Judge, in opening the Court, said, "Grand and beautiful is the scene which I am permitted this day to witness, and I rejoice that I have lived long enough to see this triumph of freedom. Hitherto we have administered justice while surrounded by the sbirri of the police, and have spoken and acted under the menace of imprisonment and ruin. We have trembled under the despotism of perjured kings, but now—let us be thankful for it!—we speak and act our honest convictions under the government of a loyal and upright prince. Italian citizens, let me urge upon you the wise and moderate exercise of your high privileges; and you, gentlemen of the jury, prove yourselves worthy of the high account in which you are held, and administer justice with the strictest impartiality."

The Attorney-General, too, in opening his case expressed himself as overwhelmed by sentiments of satisfaction and gratitude at being at length able to speak in a Neapolitan court of justice with perfect freedom. He eloquently contrasted the old Government of suspicion and tyrannous exaction with the new one which symbolized freedom and progress; but exhorted all Italians to use their liberty with discretion and charity. "The press," he said, "was one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and should be guarded with the utmost scrupulousness; but there were limits to its action, when it violated public decency and insulted the religion of the state and of the great mass of the people; then it was for the law to interfere, and the articles of the Pietra Infernale, now indicted, had been guilty of this offense. He did not come there to argue theological points, or to question the right of individuals to believe as they chose, but to enforce the law and respect for public opinion. The law had declared the Roman Catholic religion to be the religion of the state, and it must be respected."

THE political relations of the various countries of Europe, each with the others, are just now in a somewhat anomalous condition. Thus Russia and France, which have been growing into a very tender and confidential alliance, are just now set at variance by the suspicion shrewdly entertained at Moscow, if not at St. Petersburg, that French influence has not been silent in provoking the recent national demonstrations in Poland.

Again, England and Spain, which maintain a kind of ex-officio alliance, are just now manifesting more coolness, not to say hostility, toward one another than for years: partly by reason of the old sore of the Spanish dues, and partly—and more particularly just now—by the rigid adherence of Spain to her intolerant Popish prejudices, which persist in denying all favor and all grace to British Protestants.

England, too, is having its quarrel with Prussia, specially fostered by the Captain McDonald case, which, from the newspapers, has now reached the dignity of an inter-state quarrel. This quarrel is too old now for us to sum it up except in a half dozen lines. A British captain, traveling in a rail-car on the Rhine banks, makes claim to a privilege which the station-master denies. The captain is testy and choleric; the station-master brutal and insistent. But the captain proves to be connected in some way with her Majesty's household. Yet he goes to jail. There is protest from the British residents of Bonn, indignantly worded; and the protestants are treated even more harshly than the captain.

All the British action is in strict conformance with British pride; and all the Prussian action, though brutal and uncourteous, is in strict conformity with Prussian law. The affair reaches diplomacy, which expresses itself in a roundabout interchange of notes that mean nothing. Next it reaches Parliament, where Lord Palmerston gives a smart slap at the boorishness of the Prussian ally; which the Prussian Foreign Minister resents by declaring it rhodomontade, and by asserting that England is too dependent on her Continental alliances to bandy insults in that manner. So the affair stands; England weaned away from Prussia, and disposed just now to cultivate particular amity with Austria. Indeed she finds a fair excuse for this new love in the fact that Austria has now put on a semi-constitutional form of government; and furthermore, is earnest in declaring, with England, against the continued French occupation of Syria. The truth is that, in view of the new complications on the shores of the Mediteranean—the doubt of France, the dislike of Spain, the Ionian troubles, the progress of the Lesseps canal, and the Syrian occupation—England is largely in need of an ally whose ships shall command the Adriatic. The Suez Canal project has latterly commanded a new share of attention. In the British House of Lords the Earl of Caernarvon violently attacked the scheme, and called upon the Government for explanation; to which Lord Wodehouse replied that Turkey, in obedience to advices from England, had never legally given its sanction; and furthermore, reiterated the old reply that the project was a commercial, and so a political, absurdity. Yet nothing is more certain, as we learn from French and Italian papers, than that the managers have secured most ample funds; that the Pacha of Egypt has given it his sanction, besides rendering himself largely responsible pecuniarily; and that some thousands of laborers have been for a considerable time actively employed upon the work. M. Lesseps himself, the adroit and indefatigable manager, promises that in less than six months the "New Bosphorus," which is to divide the Isthmus of Suez, shall be complete.

A further indication of the present good understanding between England and Austria may be found in the fact, that an action recently brought by the Emperor of Austria in the English law-courts against Louis Kossuth, for the issue of Hungarian paper money, has been decided in favor of the Imperial plaintiff, and the Court has ordered the condemned bills, amounting to a very large sum, to be given up. Of course the British journals declare it to be a strictly legal decision, under which the Emperor has received no more favor than if he had been a ditch-digger of Lincolnshire. This is certainly a pleasant view of it, and we hope it may be true; but we can not escape the belief that if the action had been brought when Austria was playing fast-and-loose during the Crimean campaign, that the decision would have been different.

UPON the whole, perhaps, English justice is surer than the justice of any other country; but it is none the less true, that in all that regards her external policy, the action of Great Britain is measured unswervingly by her interest, with a magnificent disdain of sentiment of whatever sort. The Government of Victoria looks with a very maternal fondness after the good of its children of India, and the Canadas, and Lancashire, and London; and we Americans may be assured that it always will.

Great Britain is religious and Christian and sends missionaries to India; but all the while her Government humors and protects the Hindoo superstitions, which her private enterprise seeks to undermine. Great Britain is a friend to the poor crushed Poland, and chants sentimental regrets for the martyrs of Warsaw; but her Government (through Lord John Russell) does not send any diplomatic protest against imperial cruelty. "If I were to write a dispatch on the subject to the Court of St. Petersburg," says Lord John, "I have no doubt whatever what the answer of that Court would be: that the Emperor of Russia had made the most liberal concessions to his Polish subjects, and that all he required was that tranquillity should prevail in the country, but that he meant not to withdraw those concessions or to go beyond that which he thought necessary for the preservation of peace in his dominions. There would be a dispatch, and there would be an answer, but is there any party in this country, is there any Government that could be formed in this country that is likely to take up arms in behalf of Poland, and to endeavor to restore her nationality? and if we are not prepared to do that, although we might sympathize with Poland, I do not think it is a case for diplomatic dispatches or diplomatic exertion. What had happened lately was no doubt very lamentable."

And it is very lamentable that Venice should writhe as she does under the heel of the Austrian ally of England; and Great Britain pities her with her great, far-off pity. That is all; and the Government of England will do nothing for her until such time as the Austrian alliance is worth nothing to her. We can never forget the bitterness with which, upon a time, we heard the late sincere patriot, Daniel Manin, express his loathing for what he called the selfish policy of England in the days of 1849. "We had heard so much," he said, "of her friendliness; there had been such outspoken declaration of sympathy, such hearty greetings, as we met the brunt of the storm; and when we held the tyrant at bay—the world looking on, we fainting from weariness, and imploring aid in the name of humanity, in the name of Christ—England hesitates, measures cost of interference, sinks her brave sympathies, leaves us to desolation and slaughter."

And yet, what is a Government for if not to look after the temporal interests of its subjects? Is it part of the rôle of a good government to make war for an idea? France says yes! France has tried it over and over; but France has left deep traces of her outside heroism in the spilt blood of a million children. Has a Government any right to be heroic if the heroism is to sacrifice the interests of those specially under care? What is the end of Government except to look singly, persistently, unflinchingly after the interests of those who fashion it and endow it? England represents, perhaps, more than any country in the world Christian civilization, and the office of its Government is to secure the blessings of that civilization to its own people—but not to all peoples. And if the prosperity or growth or well-being of any great class of her population is maintained at the manifest expense and damage of any foreign population, does the British Government consider it a duty to abate straightway the home prosperity for the sake of ending the harm accruing to outsiders? Does it forbear export of opium when opium is brutalizing the Chinese? Does it forbid the coolie-trade when it is manifest that the coolie-trade involves incredible hardships and cruelty? Does a world-wide humanity invariably direct and control the policy of the Government? The popular sympathies of Great Britain may be always in favor of liberty and progress and religion; but its political sagacity does by no means always keep step with its sympathies. Has Great Britain ever proposed to give a bounty on free-grown cotton?

We may depend upon it that, in all that concerns British relations with the two American parties in the field, the English Government will be guided purely and thoroughly by what it shall count the best interest of the mass of the British people.

APROPOS of the humanities of the British Government, much attention has been called within a short time to the frightful persecution of the native population in Bengal, in prosecution of the indigo culture, through the instrumentality of the ryots. The subject elicits the very warm treatment of such Anglo-phobic prints as the Nord of Belgium, and has received the earnest attention and reprobation of such men as Mr. Layard in the House of Commons. We are prepared to see a very decided expression of the public sympathy in favor of the maltreated East Indians, and a very sagacious and diplomatic entertainment of the "unfortunate business" on the part of her Majesty's ministers. About the well-ordered household of our friend Mr. Bull there are a great many small dogs that bark; but the mastiff, which only bites, is chained very close.

A SIGNIFICANT episode in connection with the unfortunate Polish outbreak has just now excited largely the wonderment of the curious in Paris. It was half believed that men high in the confidence of the Emperor (shall we name Walewski?) were privy to the late outbreak of Warsaw; but it is none the less certain that Paris diplomacy expresses regret at the rupture, and expresses confidence in the good intentions of the Muscovite Emperor. Well, the Polish sympathizers who live in Paris asked authorization of the government for a funeral ceremony in honor of the martyrs. It was granted, upon the condition that there should be no political demonstration. The committee of arrangement appealed to the Père Lacordaire for a commemorative discourse; the Franciscan orator declined, but suggested the name of a brother of his order, of Toulouse, M. Minjard. M. Minjard accepted the office; but, to the great scandal and discontent of his Polish mourners, counseled complete submission to the fatherly government of Russia, and rounded his funeral oration with an eloquent anti-Imperial appeal in favor of the temporal authority of the Pope. Poland is Popish, without a doubt—which Russia is not; and the drift of the theological plea seemed to be this: Let the Poles and all who suffer stand by the Holy Father, and see first to his reinstatement in his old sovereignty, and the Holy Father will then stand by them.

AMONG the things of city interest in Paris must be mentioned the Art-exhibition of the World Palace upon the Champs-Élysées. You enter it from gardens upon gardens. Chestnuts and lindens, and wide sweep of carriage-way without. Within, great blaze of garnished glazing, and fragrant exotics, with miniature streams that counterfeit the dash and frolic of the waters of the Bretagne hills. Birds singing as they sing on the meadows of Nancy; flowers breaking cover as they burst into blossom at the Luxembourg. It is altogether a rich twin-array of nature and art that makes the flowers cheat our passion for the pictures, and the pictures cheat our passion for the flowers. It is a show of living artists, the Exhibition Triennial. There are those we miss since the last. Decamps, and Ary Schaffer, and Delaroche. But Art marches, though dead ones strew the way. Of the old heroes of the brush Ingres is still alive, and so is Horace Vernet; of the new ones a host contribute to make the galleries gorgeous. But the particular art-attraction of the spring in Paris has been the exhibition and sale of the famous "Soltykoff" collection, made by a Russian millionaire and prince, and enriched with the rarest objects of porcelain, carving, enamel, armor, furniture, manuscripts dating from the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries. Unbounded means and a severe taste, added to very large and accurate historic knowledge of the times put under contribution, had made this collection the most complete and valuable ever brought to public sale. The Emperor of Russia secured all the armor drawn from Eastern countries before the public sale commenced, at the price of two hundred thousand francs; the armor of the Western nations was taken by Napoleon at two hundred and fifty thousand; while the balance sold for something over two millions of francs—making a total of half a million of dollars. Among the high prices we may instance an early book which was purchased by the eminent publisher Didot at twenty thousand francs. A carved “toilette” brought thirty thousand francs; and a ewer and bowl of early Limoges manufacture brought the enormous price of twenty and odd thousand francs.

IN French literature there is just now particularly noticeable a history of the Revolution of 1848, by M. Garnier Pagés—a man fully competent to give a just record, and as willing as competent. As yet only the first volume has appeared, which treats almost exclusively of Italy, and shows the author's ardent love for Republican institutions, and his unabated faith in them, as compared with the weakness of all monarchical ones. He does not pardon the late Savoyard King, Charles Albert, for not embracing and defending the Republican opinions of the insurrectionists of Milan, and he artfully excuses the republicanism of revolutionary Venice, which periled their city and freedom rather than succumb to the monarchical opinions of Sardinia. Had there been more unity of purpose, whether republican or monarchic, among the states of Italy, in 1848-'49, they might have achieved the conquest (Venice included) which they wrought eleven years later by favor of the Emperor of France. M. Garnier Pagés was an active and enthusiastic member of the Provisional Government of Paris in 1848; and he tells his story with the earnestness of a man who feels keenly the great glory and the great failure of his life. There is something pathetic almost in listening to the story of a man who has so long outlived the great epoch of his life. We remember well when the portrait of M. Garnier Pagés, in lithograph, was in all the shop-windows upon the Boulevards. We remember when our neighbors, in the parquette or the orchestre (as the francs were plenty or few), nudged us, and said, “Le voici, the man yonder with the mole on his cheek and the straight hair, that is Monsieur Pagés, of the Provisional Government.” But nobody has pointed at him these many a day. If you had asked (before this book) is he alive, or is he not alive? nine in ten would not have known what answer to make you. It was the same thing with poor Marc Caussidière, who one time held the “top of the street” hereabout; but the times tumbled him out of sight. We knew of him as a fat fellow in a steeple-crowned hat in a red sash, who had thousands in just such steeple-crowned hats at his bidding, but he vanished; and we never saw his name again, until one day, in New York it flashed upon our vision, in gilt, with the affix of “Wine Merchant.” In Paris it was never known again until he died.

Editor's Drawer.

PIPING times are times of peace. There is little that makes merry in war; but the Drawer holds on its way brimful of the humor that flows in steadily from all parts of the land.

In the camp as well as in the cottage the Drawer is read with zest; and if our soldiers had the hang of the pen as well as the sword, and a chance to write, they would fill the Drawer with the stories of their new and exciting life.

“PREVIOUS to the breaking out of hostilities at Charleston,” a Wisconsin correspondent writes, “we had in our county three companies of United States militia, fully armed and equipped, composed altogether of our German fellow-citizens. Upon receiving the requisition of President Lincoln for volunteer troops, the Governor called upon these companies to join the regiment, whereupon they very promptly and unanimously surrendered their arms and equipments back to the State, as did also their officers their commissions. Among them was one Captain Jahns, who had figured largely in times of peace as Chairman of the Military Committee in the Legislature of the State, and in other ways had for eight or ten years been laboring to establish for himself a military reputation. Soon after resigning his commission he was met by Colonel Teall, who very coolly inquired of him ‘if the track was getting too fresh?’ The Captain not understanding what was meant, the Colonel told him his military career reminded him of a California hunter, who started out with his gun in the morning upon the track of a grizzly, and pursued it hard all day. When it became evident he had nearly overtaken his game, he turned aside into a miner's shanty, very much excited. The miner inquired what was the matter, as he looked agitated and alarmed. The hunter replied that he had been pursuing a grizzly all day, but the track was getting too fresh, and he didn't think it safe to follow it any further!”

DURING the war of 1812, as the Northwestern army was engaged in one of its toilsome expeditions, a private soldier sunk down beneath the hardships of the march and died. General William H. Harrison was careful to arrest the progress of the forces, in order to give this man a Christian burial with coffin and funeral. As some of the military carpenters were engaged in preparing the coffin, he entered the shop and paced the floor in silence, watching the progress of the work, evidently with his feelings aroused by the circumstance. One of the soldiers, presuming perhaps on this exhibition of humane feeling, asked the General as to his plans for the future operations of the army. Pausing in his walk, and elevating himself to commanding height, Harrison asked,

“Are you a soldier, Sir?”

“Yes.”

“Then, Sir, be one!” was the reply; which, with the tone and eye of the speaker, gave the daring soldier a lesson in subordination doubtless never forgotten.

“A FEW weeks ago, being on a visit to Elizabeth, New Jersey, I was the guest of Captain Blank, who has become famous in consequence of his connection with the first attempt to reinforce Fort Sumter. He is the proud father of a very intelligent little girl of some six or seven summers, who is remarkable for her smart little speeches. On one occasion, at the dinner-table, she was in her usual happy humor, when her little brother, a lad several years her senior, ventured to tease her a little. He said: ‘Tillie, doesn't your head feel as if it were cracked, or not altogether right, when you knock upon it in this way?’ at the same time tapping his forehead with his fingers, and looking around mischievously, thinking he had quite silenced her. She looked at him a few moments, and replied: 'Why no, Willie. Is that the way yours feels?' The laugh was turned on poor Willie, and he took the first opportunity to leave the room."

SAYS a young correspondent:

"I am a clerk in a country store in the wilds of Michigan, in a locality where a railroad is being laid. Of course Irishmen are plenty. A Patlander and his Biddy came in to make a few purchases. Their attention was at last called to a piece of flannel which I offered at cost—seventy cents—it being a remnant. After bantering some time Biddy said, 'And faith, Sir, we will give yees jist six shillin's, and not a cint more, ony how.' My first impulse was to laugh; but I kept straight, and told her it was almost giving her the goods; but I would not stand about a few cents, and she might take it along. Paying the money, they left chuckling over their good bargain, and saying, 'Be jabers! and we know how to dale wid the blatherin' Yankees.'"

THE following singular circumstance occurred in this city some time ago, and was duly reported in the Drawer. It seems to have happened again in Boston. A correspondent writes:

"Near the Revere House, in Boston, is a block of several fine houses, all having their street finish precisely alike. One of these houses is owned and occupied by Mr. Fusilbury, who has a cheerful round of friends living in the country; and when they visit Boston Mr. F. is usually invited to 'make one' for a few hours at the Revere. One night, not long since, he had been making one till the clock had made two or three in the morning; and soon after he was in a dream of philosophy, bucking a lamp-post, and gazing intently at that block of houses. A woman soon appeared at an open window, to whom he put the anxious inquiry,

"Marm, will you tell me where—in which—Mr. Fusilbury lives?"

"Why, you are Mr. Fusilbury."

"I know that, Marm; but I want to know where he lives."

"He lives here, and I am his wife. You better come in quick!"

"Mr. Fusilbury went in."

"WE have with us in Wisconsin a lusty Hibernian of corpulent dimensions, who, like most manufactured Yankees, has a strong desire for official position. Having gained the important office of constable, he received an execution for collection, and was directed to levy upon a cow and calf in a certain field. He accordingly proceeded to the place designated, and having succeeded in driving the cow into a corner of the fence, laid his execution upon her and read it aloud, at the same time informing the cow that he had levied the execution upon her. He then proceeded to secure the calf, but the youngster was too active for him; and after having pursued it at full speed several times around the field, returned in an excited and heated condition to his employer, and informed him that he had levied the execution upon the cow, but the calf run so he could not levy it upon him."

A MASSACHUSETTS correspondent writes:

"As you indulge the readers of your Monthly with a few pages of anti-hypochondriacal matter, I send the following; and if you think it worthy of a corner in your Drawer, you are at liberty to use it. It has been published in Dr. Holland's 'History of Western Massachusetts,' and was furnished him by a successor in the ministry of the reverend gentleman spoken of, but will bear repeating. I give it in his own words:

"Amusing stories are told illustrative of the character of some of the pastors who have lived in New Salem, and among them the following: Rev. Mr. Foster was a facetious man, and usually ready at joke and repartee. He had a parishioner, a carpenter by trade, pretty well stocked with ready wit, and withal somewhat given to boasting. One day, while at work for his minister hewing a stick of timber, the carpenter was boasting, in his usual style, of the marvels that he could perform. The pastor, to put an extinguisher upon him, said: 'Governor' (his nickname), 'do you think you could make a devil?'—"Make a devil?" responded the Governor; "why yes, oh yes" (his broad axe moving a little more rapidly). "Here, put up your foot! You want the least alteration of any man I ever saw!" It was rare that the minister came off second best in an encounter of this character, but he did this time."

"OWN cousin to the boy, in April's Drawer, who wanted to know 'Where is the shop?' must be our five-year-old Eddie.

"He attends Sabbath-school, and has learned, from Genesis and the Catechism, that the principal ingredient of humanity is dust—a material which he delights of all things to work in.

"On week-days the dining-room sofa serves as a milk-wagon, with a chair for horse; but on Sunday he turns it into a pulpit, and preaches, extempore, for the benefit of the assembled chairs and sister Lillie. On a recent occasion his subject was cruelty, and the discourse ran as follows:

"What a wicked, wicked boy he was, to catch flies and pull off their wings and legs! How would he like to have his arms pulled out and legs cut off? Then he was sorry he had treated the poor flies so. A bad man threw him right into the river. He was so lame he could not get out, but he went right to heaven."

"Careful, careful, Eddie,' says mamma, who had been quiet but observant.

"A pause ensued, during which he seemed to be trying to realize the scene to which he had introduced the lame boy. Soon, however, the discourse was finished, with an emphasis and a flourish, in these words: 'And there he saw how folks are made—and they've got a lot of dust up there!'"

"OUR little Johnny, going to dine with his grandmother on his birthday, partook so freely of the good things on the table that a second piece of pudding became an utter impossibility. The old lady, seeing his eye dwelling on the tempting object, said, 'Johnny, don't you think you could manage another piece?' Johnny looked doubtful for a moment, but a light breaking over his face, immediately exclaimed, 'Perhaps if I was to stand up I might eat another!'"

"My father tells a great many old Scotch stories," says a correspondent in Ramapo, "a few of which I here send you:

"The family of Mr. Torrance were about leaving the town of Strathaven, in Lanarkshire, Scotland, for America. Tibby Torrance, an old maiden sister of Mr. Torrance's, was to accompany them. Before they left some of the neighbors were talking to Tibby of the dangers of the 'great deep,' when she suddenly exclaimed,

"'Aweel, aweel, it's been a gae dry simmer, and I think the sea 'll no be very deep!'"

"JEAN M'GOWN had been telling a story to some friends who seemed inclined to doubt the truth thereof, when Jean, turning around quite indignant-ly, said, 'It mon be true, for father read it out o' a bound book!'"

"SOME singular inquiries were made by Scotch people last year while I was traveling in Scotland. One asked me, 'Have you any fresh water in America?—I thought it was all salt.' Another asked me, 'Do you know a Mrs. Walker in America?' 'Yes, I know a Mrs. Walker in New York city, but perhaps she will not be the person you are acquainted with. Where does she live; for America is a very large country, you know?' 'Well, I believe she lives in a place called Wisconsin!'"

"LITTLE CHARLIE says some smart things in his way. The other day he was somewhat saucy to his mother, and when she rebuked him he showed the fire of the eye, and told her she 'had better look out.' He saw he had committed the unpardonable, and as she was about to take the matter in hand, he added, 'I mean—out the window!' That will do for a three-year-old, which was his age."

"A FINE old Irish gentleman of my acquaintance called on me just as we were seating ourselves at dinner. He remarked that he was always lucky. 'Born under a lucky star,' said I. 'Yes,' said he; 'sometimes I am.'"

"THE pulpits of the churches in old times in New Jersey were very much the size and shape of large tubs, or hogsheds, and were reached by some few steps to a landing a few feet square, and another flight to the pulpit."

"At that time slaves were held in that and other Northern States, and Parson L—— had one, who was regarded by the neighbors as a good man. This negro occupied a seat on the landing, and of course was seen by the congregation. In another locality, out of the view of Parson L——, but in that of the people and the negro, a large, noble dog, the property of the negro, had his station."

"The pastor, like others, had a mischievous son, who one Sunday kept the dog at home, and dressed him in a part of his father's clerical robes and wig, powdered and set off until the dog assumed a most ludicrous appearance, then released him in time to reach his place in the church before the end of the long prayer. Parson L—— commenced reading a psalm, when he observed an unusual smile on the face of many of his people. This increased and spread, until the parson became so disconcerted that he stopped in amazement, and stood wondering what could move his people to such untimely excitement. The negro kept his white woolly head, with eyes rolling in dismay, turning back and forth from his master and the innocent dog; but the culminating point soon came, and the scene it produced must be left to the imagination of the readers of the Drawer, when the negro exclaimed, 'Massa, look at Cuff!'"

IN —, Connecticut, Mr. Ewing had borrowed twenty dollars of his neighbor, Squire Robinson, and had failed to make payment according to promise. Two or three times he had failed; and at length he told the Squire that he would certainly pay him on Saturday next if his life was spared till that day. The day came and went, and no money came. The next morning, bright and early, the Squire sent word to the sexton of the church that Mr. Ewing was dead, and, as was customary in those days, the bell should be tolled. The sexton tolled forty-nine times, the deceased being in his fiftieth year. "Who is dead?" the neighbors asked. "Mr. Ewing," said the sexton. But in the course of the morning Mr. Ewing was out as usual, on his way to church, and learned that he was dead, and the town had been told of it when the sexton tolled the bell in the morning. The joke soon leaked out, and the next day the Squire got his money."

A BOSTON correspondent sends the following Choatiana:

In a speech at the beginning of the Mexican war Mr. Choate opposed an invasion of the Mexican territory, advocating the policy of keeping the United States army within the line of boundary claimed by our Government. In answer to this it was urged that such a policy would prolong the war: that the Mexicans did not agree to this boundary, and that they would be sending armies continually into the field to harass our troops. This Mr. Choate energetically denied. "No, Sir," said he; "draw a line with the sword where the United States are resolved it should be drawn, and no Mexican army will dare come within a thousand miles of that line for a thousand years!"

In maintaining the worthlessness of certain testimony offered upon the other side, in a cause in which he was engaged, Mr. Choate said, "It would be as difficult to find a grain of truth in that testimony as to find a drop of water spilled in the Desert of Sahara in the times of the Crusaders!"

Speaking in excuse of a man who had borrowed largely in the prosecution of an enterprise that failed of success, and thus cruelly disappointed his creditors, Mr. Choate said, "Suddenly, as the lightning blazes in the summer sky, all his vernal hopes of promise perished in autumnal rigor."

THE following "Rules" are issued by the Board of Health of the city of Matanzas, Cuba, for the benefit of "foreignness." The copy was forwarded by an American lady residing in Matanzas. We omit two or three of the rules, which the foreigner would do well to find and add:

that ought to be observed by foreignness which come to this Island in the warmer season to prevent of being invaded by the yellow fever, well assured, that if they follow these rules recommended here, as the result of a long experience, even if they were attacked by the yellow fever they will be cured with more facility.

1. Those persons just arrived to this country, ought to avoid to get wet, they ought not to be exposed to the sun, not to make excess in eating or drinking: not to eat green fruits, nor any thin piquant, not to drink spirits, and if they could, would be better for them, not to drink but pure water, or if necessary a little red wine mixed with fresh water at dinner time.

2. They will take great care not to expose themselves to the fresh wind changing clothes when in transpiration and not to get wet when they are sweating and procuring, to keep always an equal temperament avoiding the suddenly changes from warm to cold weather.

3. When the Thermometer of Farenheit will mark 75 to 80 degrees of heat in any season of the year they will bath themselves before taking any meals in temperate water, not cold nor warm, and during the hot season they will be seated in temperate water for some minutes taking care not to be in perspiration at that time.

4. Dinners and breakfasts will be moderate and at regular times, and at 12 o'clock in the noon they will take a glass of limonade, barley water, orange or tamarind water, without being transpiring at that time.

5. If foreignness ought to remain in this country, it would be good for them to live in the interior for the first 2 or 3 years, procuring to live in the most higher climates during the hot season and not to come back to the ports until December or January when the cold weather is come.

Following these rules and advises they will by degrees get acclimation, and if yellow fever will come it will be very moderate and easily to be cured.

6. Those whose temperament is very sanguinous ought to be bled moderately by doctor's advises as they arrive to this country, and when they feel some kidneyach and headach, with white colour in the tongue and heaviness in the eyes they will call the doctor immediately without loss of time if the wish to conserve their lives as some time after may be late. If the attack is violent they will drink immediately a glass of sweet olive oil with some drops of limon or bitter orange mean time the doctor comes drinking afterwards linseed or white mallow, or tamarind boiled water cold moderately and procuring perspiration in bed.

MATANZAS.—FERRO CARRIL PRINTING OFFICE.

MANY persons, when wanting a marriage-license, would go by mistake into Phil Hoyne's instead of Charley Farwell's, the County Clerk's, for it, in Chicago.

One day a candidate for matrimony having made his appearance in Phil's office, was severely cross-examined as to his ability to support a wife, and faithfully promised to never let her want for any thing, and treat her kindly, etc., and then gave him the following note to the County Clerk:

"CHARLEY FARWELL,—Give this man a license.—O.K.—Able to support as many wives as the law requires. Poor fellow!

PHIL HOYNE."

"I HAVE a little wee cousin about three years old, full of fun and life. I paid his parents a visit not long ago, and the first face that I saw at the door was little George's, beaming with pleasure. I went up to him, and exclaimed, playfully, 'Why, George, what do you do for a living now?' Without a moment's hesitation he answered, 'I eats!'"

A LITTLE boy once had committed to memory, for recitation at a Sunday-school, that beautiful Psalm of David, the Twenty-third. When he got to the verse which says, "Thou anointest my head with oil," he sort of stumbled; but recovering himself he said, "Thou anointest my head with cologne!"

"GOING into the room of my friend Wm. B. S—— the other morning suddenly, I found him engaged at his toilet. He said, 'You have found dis here Bill in dishabille!'"

JUDGE ROWAN, of Kentucky, was one of the most remarkable men of that State, and one of the few who approached Mr. Clay in his manners and great power of conversation. We had the good fortune of being fascinated by his intellectual powers, and shall ever remember how he held spell-bound all who came within the magic circle of his voice. He stated on one occasion that he was present when Aaron Burr was a prisoner in Louisville, on his way to Richmond to be tried for treason. The populace outside the building was excited to the highest degree, and made a demonstration as if they would seize and maltreat the distinguished prisoner. Mr. Clay, then just rising into fame, became somewhat alarmed for Burr's safety; and in that courtly manner for which he was always so remarkable, said, "Mr. Burr, whatever may be the excitement in the street, depend upon it I will be answerable for your personal safety." At the remark the fine eye of Burr flashed with lurid fire, and drawing himself up with a dignity that seemed overpowering, he replied, "Mr. Clay, I have never been placed in any circumstances where I could not protect myself."

SOME of the finest specimens of oratory in the world are to be found among the Western stump speakers. They excel particularly in a style not set down in the books, which may be termed "the inference." Can any thing be more to the purpose than the following passages?

"Gentlemen, I have heard of some persons who hold to the opinion that just at the precise moment one human being dies another is born, and that the just-departed soul enters and animates the new-born babe. Now, I have made particular and extensive inquiries concerning my opponent there, and I find that for some time previous to his nativity nobody died!"

"Colonel Skinner, of Texas," who was going it on "a high figure" before the right kind of audience, thus settled a long-disputed fact in history and "elevated" himself.

"Feller-citizens," said he, with a very knowing look, "I was at the battle where Tecumsey was killed—I was! I commanded a regiment there—I did! I'm not gwine to say who did kill Tecumsey—I won't! But this much I will say: Tecumsey was killed by one of my pistols; and, gentlemen, I leave it to your knowledge of human nature if a man would be very apt to lend out his pistol on an occasion of that sort."

MANY years ago, upon a Western steamer, a group of strange beings sat about a table gambling. For the want of their usual prey they were "eating each other up." Without a word they steadily performed their work, and as one after another lost his all they sullenly retired into the back-ground. Presently one of the "unfortunates" came back to the table, and speaking to the seemingly acknowledged leader, said,

"Bill, I want you to do me a favor."

"What is it?" was the gruff response.

"Why, I want you to lend me your pistol to blow my brains out."

The gambler addressed coolly drew out the weapon and handed it over, remarking, "Why, Jim, when you said something about doing you a favor, I thought you wanted to borrow some money. That, you know, you couldn't do. But if it is only to have my shooting-iron to blow yer head off, you know you are welcome to it."

The gambler then went upon the lower-deck of the boat, and deliberately seating himself with his feet over the bows, he drove the fatal bullet through his head and fell into the water. The powerful steamer plowed over the place where he disappeared, but the passengers, as they looked back, saw no evidence that the body ever escaped the embrace of the under whirlpool currents of the Mississippi. The gamblers about the table pursued their avocation, and never displayed the least curiosity to learn the fate of their companion; and long before the day was passed the circumstance was apparently forgotten, for among the desperadoes of the Southwest there had been witnessed no uncommon tragedy.

"KIRBY'S DYING" is still the standard of all death scenes among the theatre-goers, and any one who pays the last debt of nature, on the theatrical stage, in a becoming manner, is considered a "slow engine" and treated with due contempt. Every one admires the heroism in a sea-fight where the ship's crew nail the ensign to the mast; and Kirby's introduction of the American flag in Richard the Third, and wrapping it around the kingly person just before he "pegged out," had a touch of the heroic about it, after all. Garrick died decently and in order when he played the hump-backed tyrant, and it was not until Edmund Kean changed the taste of the public that the "modern gyrations" and "hyfalutens" were considered by critics of taste "just the thing." The following extract, which illustrates this idea, was written before the "Kirby school" had any existence, and lets the reader into the mental operations of a cultivated man who, in England, witnessed Kean for the first time, entirely unprepared for the "physical exhibition" by any precedent. The gentleman says:

"I have seen critics convulsed with ecstasy, and the whole house in a roar of delight at a death scene of Roscius Kean. On receiving his first wound, he doubled himself up like a tobacco-worm, and announced the accident by a broad grin. Anon he received another poke, which caused him to stagger and fall upon one knee, where he delighted the audience with several displays of determined valor, grinning terribly all the while. On receiving the third push, he wheeled round, staggered, stamped, and fenced with the air like a blind game-cock, until finally he received the coup de grace, which caused him to jump up two yards, and fall down in the most affecting manner. Now, Heaven be praised! thought I, the man is dead at last. But I was out of my reckoning, for then began the cream of the affair; the rollings, the contortions, the gnashings of teeth, the bitings of the dust, the gropings about for the sword, and finally the great flip-flap which crowns all. I vow to you one of these first-rate actors is as hard to kill as our Missouri bears, which, it is said, are so tenacious of life that a bullet or two through the vitals is a mere flea-bite."

Now who ever said harder things of Kirby in his "best estate?" And yet this was written by a very clever man about Kean, and might be repeated as characteristic of some living celebrities.

IN the rage for making fortunes in the California trade, Charley Peck bought, among other truck to take out and sell in the new world, a large lot of pease, and sent them from New York around the Horn. He went by the way of Panama, and arrived ahead of his pease.

When they did come nobody wanted them, and Charley was stuck, as the pease were when growing. What should he do? He must mind his pease, and get rid of them some way. He soon learned that feed for mules was very scarce, and the thought struck him that pease would be the thing. He went to a neighbor and hired a mule for ten days; starved him till he took to pease like-thistles or clover. Off went Charley to a feed store, and offered his pease for mule feed. The dealer objected, as he had never heard that mules would eat pease. They adjourned to the yard, where Charley's mule was munching them. This settled the matter, and Charley sold his pease at a grand profit. But the rest of the mules would not eat them, and the dealer found his pease on hand and no sale.

KISSING is not to be talked about; one practical demonstration is worth a thousand prosaic descriptions. The emotions of anger, fear, doubt, hope, and joy have been appropriately described; but no one has done justice to a warm, loving kiss. We find in the Drawer several attempts. One is by a young lady still in the dreamy regions of girlhood. She sings:

"Let thy arms twine
Around me like a zone of love;
And thy fond lip, so soft,
To mine be passionately pressed,
As it has been so oft."

This is cold enough, surely. We next have something better; the heart has made advances, and speaks from experience:

"Sweetest love,
Place thy dear arm beneath my drooping head,
And let me lowly nestle in thy heart;
Then turn those soul-lit orbs on me, and press
My panting lips, to taste the ecstasy
Imparted by each long, lingering kiss."

Alexander Smith seems to have been electrified by a kiss; one made him feel as if he were "walking on thrones"—a figure quite as remarkable as the old deacon's, who, upon taking too much cider-brandy, likened his sensations to being on top of a meeting-house, and having every shingle turned into a Jews-harp. But let us hear Alexander:

"My soul leaped up beneath thy timid kiss;
What then to me were groans,
Or pain, or death? Earth was a round of bliss,
I seemed to walk on thrones!"

It has been reserved, however, for an editor to make the manner of kissing a business; for we hear of one—hailing, we believe, from the State of Delaware—who gives the recipe with a business air that would do honor to a cookery-book. He says: "Of course you must be taller than the lady you kiss: take her right hand in yours, and draw her so gently toward you that you do not derange the economy of her tippet or ruffle—your left arm will find its place without instruction; at the same time the lady will throw her head back, and you have nothing to do but to lean a little forward, and the thing is done. Don't make a noise about it, as if you were firing percussion caps; don't pounce down upon it like a hungry hawk after an innocent dove; but silently revel in the sweet blissfulness of your opportunity, without ever once smacking your lips as you would over a bowl of turtle-soup, or the glorious appearance of a well-roasted duck."

THE Rev. Mr. Bennett, of —, was making prayer at the funeral of a child. Two sisters of the child's mother had come from abroad to make her a visit. When the minister would make special allusion to the family, he said, "Here are three sisters gathered together; they came expecting to have a joyful meeting, and to spend much time pleasantly together; but the Lord has seen fit to afflict that one which we judge to be the youngest!"

"WE have among us an old gentleman noted for the many sharp things he has done and said, and whose name is Sewell. He formerly kept a store, and I believe could keep a hotel if required. He used to sell very cheap, if we might believe his constant assertion of the fact. One day, when the store was crowded, he was trying to persuade a customer to take a 'whole bolt' of very cheap muslin, which he declared he was selling a quarter of a cent a yard 'under cost.'

"'But I can't see how you can afford to do that, Mr. Sewell.'

"'I couldn't, if I didn't sell so much of it!' replied Sewell."

"THE Hon. William Johnson was our candidate for State Senator last fall. His private character is not faultless, and though he is often called 'Old Billy Johnson,' it is not from any special reverence the people feel for him. One day during the canvass he was speaking, and in his bitter, sharp tone blazed out, 'And here they are talking of "Honest old Abe!" I'd like to know, now, what kind of an argument that is? Why don't they call me "Honest old Billy?"' An Irishman shouted out, 'Kase they know ye too well!' Old Billy was satisfied."

ELSIE GREY.

WHAT was it that you talk'd about,
Elsie Grey, Elsie Grey,
Coming through the clover-field
That sweet summer day?
What was it that he whisper'd you,
That took so long to say?
'Twas evening ere we saw you home,
Little Elsie Grey.

Back you came all rosy red,
Elsie Grey, Elsie Grey;
It must have been sweet words he said,
To make your smile so gay.
Was it of the birds and flowers,
The busy, laboring bees,
The murmur of the brooklet's tide,
Or the wind among the trees?

Very happy then you look'd,
Elsie Grey, Elsie Grey;
Never blither looks the fawn
In its woodland play;
But your lip trembled, though it wore
A deeper, richer hue,
And on your cheek a tiny tear
Lay like a drop of dew.

Child, I guess'd what he had said
To thee, dear Elsie Grey;
Guess'd the soft, sweet tale of love
Reveal'd that summer day.
Ah, beware! for sweetest moments
Are shortest in their stay;
And love is not the joy it seems To thee, sweet Elsie Grey.

FROM young Iowa we have the next two anecdotes:

"In 1855, when the whole West was, we might say, inundated with emigrants, speculators, etc., with the usual accompaniment of a large delegation of rowdies, our worthy friend Squire Blank officiated as Justice of the Peace. At that time our City was small, comparatively. We had no Mayor or Police Courts proper, and the offenders against the peace and good order of our city were handed over by our excellent Marshal to the tender mercies of venerable Squire Blank, who had a very summary manner of disposing of them. From six to a dozen hard cases were brought before him nearly every morning.

The Squire, with all dignity, went through with them thus:

"'Mr. Marshal, what's the charge against this feller?"

"'Drunk and disorderly, your Honor.'

"'Stand up here,' says the Squire to the culprit. 'Guilty or not guilty? Mind, now, ef you say Not guilty we'll call a witness, and that'll be half a dollar more.'

"'Culprit pleads guilty generally, and the Squire relieves his mind by pronouncing the judgment of the Court to be three dollars and costs.

"CAPTAIN KING—a gentleman of great good sense, and who places all reliance on the words of Holy Writ, with which he is exceedingly familiar—was elected last year a Justice of the Peace. A few days since an Irishman brought a replevin suit against another to recover possession of a hog. The case came on with a long array of witnesses. The witnesses on both sides were equal in number, of equal credibility, and the defendant's witnesses swore as strong that hog was defendant's as plaintiff's witnesses that hog was plaintiff's. Captain King was in a quandary: number of witnesses, credibility of testimony, and strength of swearing all equal. After stating his difficulty in making a decision, he said:

"'Gentlemen, as I am compelled to decide this matter one way or the other, and since I can find nothing in the Code of Iowa to meet just such a case, I shall be compelled to follow the only precedent I know of that comes near applying, and which was resorted to by that eminently wise and good man Solomon, of whom, I think, very few of you ever heard; and in so doing the judgment of this Court is that you divide the hog, and each man pay one half the costs.'

"And he made them divide it."

AN Arkansas correspondent says that his particular friend, Benton Greene, will not thank him for telling the following true story:

Not long ago Mr. Greene became the husband of a beautiful Mississippi lady, and the happy pair were installed as lord and mistress of a fine plantation fronting upon the great Father of Waters. Shortly after a party was given, and Mr. G. and several ladies who were visiting him were invited. The distance being five or six miles, the party set off in a carriage just at twilight. The driver being unacquainted with the route, Mr. Greene undertook to act as pilot. The scene of festivities seemed more distant than they had supposed; but the gentleman was confident in his knowledge of the road, and was quite sure that they were close to the place. At last they came to a negro quarter, where some son of Ethiopia was extracting doleful tunes from a fiddle. "There's the music," said Mr. G.; "dancing has begun." As they approached the mansion it seemed to wear a familiar aspect.

"Whose place is this, boy?" asked the gentleman, alighting and hailing a servant who made his appearance.

"Why, dis Massa Greene's, Sir."

"Greene's! What Greene's?"

"Massa Benton Greene's, Sir."

Mr. Greene looked again. Sure enough it was his own house, and the grinning darkey was one of his servants. He had made the circuit of his own plantation. He "owned the corn," flung Cæsar a dollar to pay for the information, and passed the remainder of the night at home with his guests.

A LADY in Boston writes :

"A good story is told of a certain inhabitant of this metropolis, which seems to me worthy of being embalmed in the memories of the million readers, more or less, of the incomparable Drawer.

"Our friend being thirsty, and having a decided antipathy to the sparkling Cochituate, concluded that a glass of fresh and foaming ale would satisfy his desires. But how shall it be procured? for a reference to his finances discloses the unwelcome fact that he has no money. However, the liquor must be had by fair means or by foul. Firmly convinced of the justice of such a decision, he repairs to the W— House, and boldly calls for a glass. Tasting the nectar, our friend blandly remarks to the waiter :

"'Excellent ale—most excellent ale! Pray tell me, waiter, whose ale is this?'

"'That, Sir, is Richardson's ale,' was the prompt reply.

"Drinking the rest, he coolly remarks :

"'Richardson's ale—indeed—ahem! Well, I'm pretty well acquainted with Richardson, and when I see him again I'll pay him for this. Good-morning!'

"'LITTLE IDA is three years and a half old, and is quite an observer of matters and things in general. She is domiciled with her grandmother, a devout old lady, who, on the fourth of January, felt it her duty to observe the day as designated by the President, and attended church, or, as it was explained to Ida, 'went to fast meeting.' The service happened to be quite short. The next Sunday 'Grandma' attended church again, and this time went early in the morning, and the church being at some little distance, remained at a friend's, not returning until after the afternoon service. No sooner did she enter the door than she was greeted by these words from Ida, who had been impatiently awaiting her return : 'Grandma, you have been to slow meeting to-day, haven't you?'

"CLARA S—, a little Buffa.onian, about three and a half years old, has no very well defined notions of the modus operandi of imparting color to the 'ladies from Africa.' One day, being at the house of a neighbor, who has an old, fat, and very black female domestic, after looking at her intently for a moment, propounded the following :

"'Aunty, would you been so brack ef you'd allers minded your mamma, and wored your "shaker" every time when you run'd out doors?'

"'LITTLE ANNIE, my neighbor's child, had the misfortune of losing a little dog of which she was very fond. After shedding many tears over its lifeless body, she at length said, with a long-drawn sigh, 'Well, I suppose God wanted the little thing, so he took it home!'

In Newark, New Jersey, during the Millerite excitement in 1844, a cobbler, about the time fixed for the consummation of all earthly things, being strong in the faith, shut up his shop, and posted a notice outside—"No more work done here. The Lord is coming." As the Lord did not come according to expectation, and not being a second Elijah, he was soon fain to reopen his shop and peg away as usual ; but to keep his faith lively, as well as to admonish the world, he placed on the wall opposite his bench—"The end of all things is at hand." One of his customers read it over, and repeated it musingly : "'The end of all things it at hand.' What?" said he, "the waxed end?"

In one of the interior towns of Massachusetts resided a thrifty family of Friends (or Quakers), whose family of well-grown-up sons and daughters were ripe for the enjoyment of parties in their neighborhood.

Their worthy parents, Timothy and Comfort, had arranged to attend Quarterly Meeting about twenty miles from their house, and as it was their custom not to return home the same night, the young people of the neighborhood had concluded to have a frolic at Friend Timothy's house. It was winter; and at an early hour the sleigh-bells were heard merrily arriving, and the party was soon in full blast, and were having a play called Disguise, where one of the girls would go to Friend Comfort's wardrobe, and one of the boys go to Friend Timothy's, and then appear in the room of the party. While that play was in full blast Friend Timothy and Comfort unexpectedly returned home; and while Timothy was tying and covering his horse, Comfort hastened to the house, and entering all muffled up, was taken to be one of the party, whereat all began to gather about and embrace her; when she made out to show her face, a stampede ensued which baffles description. George Jones rushed out on the porch and ran off at the wrong end of it, which was about four feet from the ground, and fell sliding down the sloping yard toward the gate, on his hands and knees, encountering Friend Timothy and upsetting him, where he bawled out, at the top of his voice,

"Samwell! Samwell! didn't I tell thee when I left home to be sure and shut up the calf at night; now see what he has done!"

George Jones did not blaat, but got his sleigh ready, and he and his partner were soon off, and that party ended for that night.

LAST January a friend in Boston wrote to the Drawer in such pleasant words as these:

"Having just finished the last Number of Harper's at the quiet home out of town 'where I sleep,' away from noisy and confusing scenes incident to a business life at the 'Hub of the Universe,' the usual conviction comes over me with renewed force that I owe you, not one, but many, for the store of 'good fat things' presented monthly, and which have accumulated until a 'pile' of the Magazines, containing a copy of nearly every issue since it was first published, cry out against me, 'Pay what thou owest!'

"Speaking of the 'pile' of Magazines I am reminded of a conversation they occasioned the other day. Jem, my factotum, whom we Yankees designate as 'help'—a regular gem of the 'Gem of the Sea'—had occasion to replenish the wood-box in the room containing my treasures; and as the cold weather requires the use of much wood, he brought it in a large basket, being assisted by Mike, another gem, who acts as first-assistant to the original Jem. They were depositing the wood carefully in the box, stick by stick—for we don't allow things thrown, dust kicked up, or other unseemly actions there—when Mike espied the stack of Harper's, and said,

"'Sure, what is them, Jem?'

"'Them is the books you get for him sometimes, was the reply.

"'Oh, murder! ain't there gobs of them!' said Mike.

"If you know what quantity or numeral is equivalent to 'gobs' write me, and I will credit you with that much for favors received. That was not what I intended to write at the commencement. I designed to enter for record an anecdote of old Colonel Weston, now dead, as I believe are all of his immediate family.

"The Colonel would at times get drunk—yes, that is the word that best expresses the fact. When under 'ardent' inspiration he was eloquent, much given to the use of big words, kind to his family, and invariably peaceable. Such being the case, he was unmolested by the neighbors, constables, and people generally troublesome to bibulous characters. But drunk or sober, the Colonel despised his neighbor Thaxter—a sneaking, hypocritical person, whom every one disliked, and a specimen of which can be found in most every village.

"This Thaxter had made himself especially obnoxious by professing religion, evidently for the sole purpose of insnaring the heart of a rich maiden lady, who thought no one good unless a member of some church of the denomination of which she was an active member. Thaxter joined her church, and immediately commenced his wooing.

"The Colonel 'went on a drunk on the strength of it;' and Thaxter, to prove to the community his abhorrence of that which had heretofore been unnoticed, entered a complaint against the Colonel as a common drunkard.

"Being arraigned before a Justice of the Peace, the Colonel sat mute, allowing the witnesses to testify without questioning. The last witness was Thaxter. When he had resumed his seat, the Justice said the accused would be allowed to make any remarks, or ask any questions of the witnesses, previous to his announcing the fine to be imposed.

"The room was crowded with neighbors, and as the Colonel's pressure of steam had not exhausted itself, fun was expected.

"Rising slowly from his seat, the Colonel commenced:

" 'May it please your Honor, if you will call the last witness I would like to propound a few queries.'

"Thaxter took the stand. Steadying himself by his chair, the Colonel sternly commenced:

" 'Thaxter, look me in the eye.' Reluctantly he complied—at least as well as a sheep-faced man can. The Colonel continued: 'Do you understand the nature of an oath?'

"THAXTER. 'I do.'

" 'Now, Thaxter, on your solemn oath, bearing in mind the pains and penalties of its violation—look me in the eye!—do you suppose, remembering what you have here testified, that you ever passed from nater to grace?'

"Sympathy was with the Colonel, and the explosion which followed prevented me from hearing the reply. It is consoling to remember that, soon after, Thaxter was expelled from the church, and that the lady concerned remained until the day of her death 'in maiden meditation fancy free.'"

A PIKE'S PEAKER writes to the Drawer:

"Let me give you a snatch of the humanity of the Rocky Mountains. Dr. B——, once well known as a noisy, but an unsuccessful politician in Eastern Nebraska, and more recently known as such in the Pike's Peak region, stood 'six feet ten' in his hat and boots. His impudence, which 'brazed' his countenance over with a hue brighter than that of the gold of his spectacles, was equaled only by his vanity, which his friends feared might some day take him off like a balloon. Not a Convention could be held here—called for whatever purpose, or by whatever clique or faction—but that the Doctor had his credentials prepared for the occasion. He was the inevitable, but ever unsuccessful candidate for the presidency of every Convention that met. Failing in his aspiration, he invariably resolved himself into the director and dictator of the committees, the debates, and the ballots. Unfortunately no Convention ever could appreciate the immaculate wisdom of his motives. Judge B——, a young magistrate of one of the mining districts, finally put a quietus upon him. At the Golden City Convention, held last year, the Doctor had, as usual, been one of the candidates for the presidency; failing in attaining which he had, for several days, to the utter disgust of the delegates, occupied almost the entire time on the floor, brawling the most inconceivable nonsense, and shifting his position on every new subject that was introduced for consideration. At length Judge B——, for the first time during the sessions, obtained the floor. He had proceeded with his remarks but a few moments when the inevitable Doctor rose to a point of order, and asked if it were proper that the Convention should any longer be bored with a small auger? 'I will answer the question,' said the Judge. 'Yes! for what execution can a small auger do, where the big auger has already bored the Convention to the verge of dissolution?'

"The Doctor subsided—he had nothing more to say during the sitting of the Convention.

"THE Doctor was very fond of his dram and his 'little game of poker.' One Sunday morning, riding (pretty well filled with the 'extract of corn') through Central City, on his way to his home in Missouri City, he passed a Jew selling 'a few small tricks' at auction on the public street. A happy thought occurred to him. He turned back, alighted from his horse, mounted the dry-goods box occupied by the Jew, and to the unutterable consternation of the perplexed Israelite commenced a homily to the surrounding crowd on the wickedness of such business transactions on the Holy Day. After he had finished he remounted his horse, and riding slowly away, muttered to himself, 'Now having done that duty as a Christian, I can with a clear conscience play poker the rest of the day, as none but a Christian can.' At night he had lost upward of two hundred dollars. Returning home, his wife naturally asked him where he had been all day. 'I have preached a sermon,' he replied, 'and distributed two hundred dollars among three or four charitable institutions!'

"THE Doctor was particularly vain of his oratorical abilities. He was always, awake or asleep, making what he dignified by the name of a 'speech.' Whenever he concluded one, he invariably went round among his listeners, with all the pomposity of another Polonius, and asked them by individuals what they thought of his speech. A favorable answer always insured a 'treat,' and the Doctor's vanity was consequently, at the expense of his pocket, daily flattered to the extent of his desire. One day, after one of his unintelligible rhodomontades, he approached, among others, a rather tough old customer, and asked the stereotyped question, 'Well, Jack, what did you think of my speech?'

"'Going to treat, Doctor?'

"'Certainly; what will you take?'

"'Whisky, straight.'

"Jack drank his whisky; and then, turning to the Doctor, said,

"'Doctor, you are a phrenological phenomenon; the biggest fool in these diggings!'

"WE have a young hopeful in our family, who, we think, has distinguished himself sufficiently to be worthy your notice. He is about nine years old, and considered by mamma a prodigy of intellect. One day during the past summer he accompanied 'Sol' to the pasture, that he might ride back home on old 'Whitey.' Arrived at the field, Whitey was duly secured, and, all things being ready, Master Andrew essayed to mount, but unintentionally he landed pretty well up on Whitey's neck. It was an awkward position for a novice in horsemanship, and our knight seemed sorely perplexed to reach the right place. But it was only for a moment. A bright idea struck him, and he shouted out, 'Start him ahead, Sol—start him ahead!'

A VIRGINIA correspondent is quite sure that the following "remarkable case" happened in his own neighborhood. The last time we heard the story the scene was laid in Alabama; the time before, the scene was in Canada, and the voucher for the efficacy of the "Universal Pills" was an Irish cook. Possibly the incident occurred in all of these places. If any one can prove that it did not, the Drawer is open for the refutation.

"Cuff is a gentleman's gentleman down in our region. He is a darkey of most undoubted honesty and truth; but he will sometimes tell tough stories. He met 'Kurnel Jonsing's nigg,' as he calls him, the other day, and, after discussing various matters appertaining to the masters, they fell into the following conversation:

SAM. "Well, Cuff, how you was?"

CUFF. "Oh, I isn't no wus."

SAM. "How is all de folks down at the house?"

CUFF. "Oh, dey is able to be round, 'cept de ole man's darter; she had de doctor the oder day. He came in, looked at her, kept lookin' at her, said she had bile in her, and giv her box of Ingine vegetable pills. When de doctor go, she up and trew dem out de winder. She wouldn't take no pills—no, Sah! Wa'al, de ole turkey-cock kum an' he gobbled down de pills, box an' all. Next day we had company, and had to kill dat turkey-cock, yer see. Brought him on the table biled, with 'ister sass; Massa flourish his knife and try to cut him up; couldn't get de knife into him. 'Cuff,' says he, 'how long did yer bile dis turkey?' 'Bile him an hour, Sah.' 'Take him away and bile him another hour.'"

SAM. "Did de company wait?"

CUFF. "Oh yas, de company waited. Wa'al, I brought de turkey in, an' Massa flourish his big knife agin, an' try to cut him; but he couldn't do it—no, Sah! 'Take him away an' bile him another hour.' So I take him down into de kitchen agin."

SAM. "Did de company wait?"

CUFF. "Of course dey waited. I brought in de turkey agin, an' Massa try to cut. But it was no go; Massa git mad. 'Take him away an' bile him a week.' So I took him away an' bile him a week."

SAM. "Did de company wait?"

CUFF. "Oh yas, de company waited—bound to see de fun out, yer know. Wa'al, in a week I brought him dat turkey. Massa thought he got him dis time sure; but he couldn't cut a hole in him; de ole cock wouldn't be cut. Massa send for the doctor to hab de turkey examined; de doctor came, look at de turkey—look all over him. Says he, 'It's no use; you can't bile dis turkey, for he has taken a box of dese Ingine vegetable pills, an' dare isn't any bile in him.'"

"ONE morning last fall, while walking in a garden with Eva, a fairy of three summers, her attention was directed to some pretty flowers.

"Oh, what nice flowers!" she exclaimed; "what is the name of the pretty flowers?"

"I replied, 'Those, Eva, are morning glories.'

"She looked at them for a moment, and then, gazing into my face, said, 'Are they prayers, then, the pretty morning glories?'

"Is she not a poetess in embryo?"

LITTLE JOHN, a two-year old, was very fond of his morning-bath—his visit to the spash-tub, as he called it. When he first saw the Atlantic two of his aunts were running on the beach in their bathing-dresses for a plunge in the surf, and he clapped his hands with great exultation, exclaiming, "Oh, aunties' spash-tub—aunties' spash-tub!"

A "MAIDEN LADY," whose "school-keepin'" and age had made awful havoc with her beauty, said one evening to one of her little boarders, "Now, Johnny, you get to bed early, and always do so, and you'll be rosy-cheeked and handsome when you grow up." The little codger looked up quizzically into her wrinkled countenance, and said, "Well, Aunty, I guess you used to sit up late a good deal when you was young—didn't you?"

WITS AND BEAUX belong to the ornamental, as distinguished from the useful members of society. Like butterflies, they were doubtless made for some good purpose, but one can not help thinking the world would be quite as well off if they were not in it.

Grace and Philip Wharton have put a score of them into a book, and a lively book it is. They shine in it; they amuse and entertain, delight and cheer. The book is a Drawer, full of the effervescence and efflorescence of society—the cream of the cream of the fashionable and the literary world. The Harpers have printed it with the cuts, from drawings by H. K. Browne and James Godwin. But it is full of cuts besides the pictures.

“Beau Brummell and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had been great friends. Dining together one day at the club, Brummell says to him, ‘Wales, ring the bell!’ The Prince thought this was being more familiar than was decent, and ringing the bell, ordered the servant to call Mr. Brummell’s carriage. This led to a breach between them, and the Prince cut the Beau thereafter.

“It is well known, in all probability, that George IV. contemplated with as much disgust and horror the increasing rotundity of his ‘presence’ as ever a maiden lady of a certain age did her first gray hair. Soon after the bell affair, the royal beau met his former friend in St. James’s Street, and resolved to cut him. This was attacking Brummell with his own pet weapon, but not with success. Each antagonist was leaning on the arm of a friend. ‘Jack Lee,’ who was thus supporting the Beau, was intimate with the Prince, who, to make the cut the more marked, stopped and talked to him without taking the slightest notice of Brummell. After a time both parties moved on, and then came the moment of triumph and revenge. It was sublime! Turning round half way, so that his words could not fail to be heard by the retreating Regent, the Beau asked of his companion, in his usual drawl, ‘Well, Jack, who’s your fat friend?’ The coolness, presumption, and impertinence of the question perhaps made it the best thing the Beau ever said, and from that time the Prince took care not to risk another encounter with him.”

THE CENTRAL PARK By TADDISON RICHARDS.

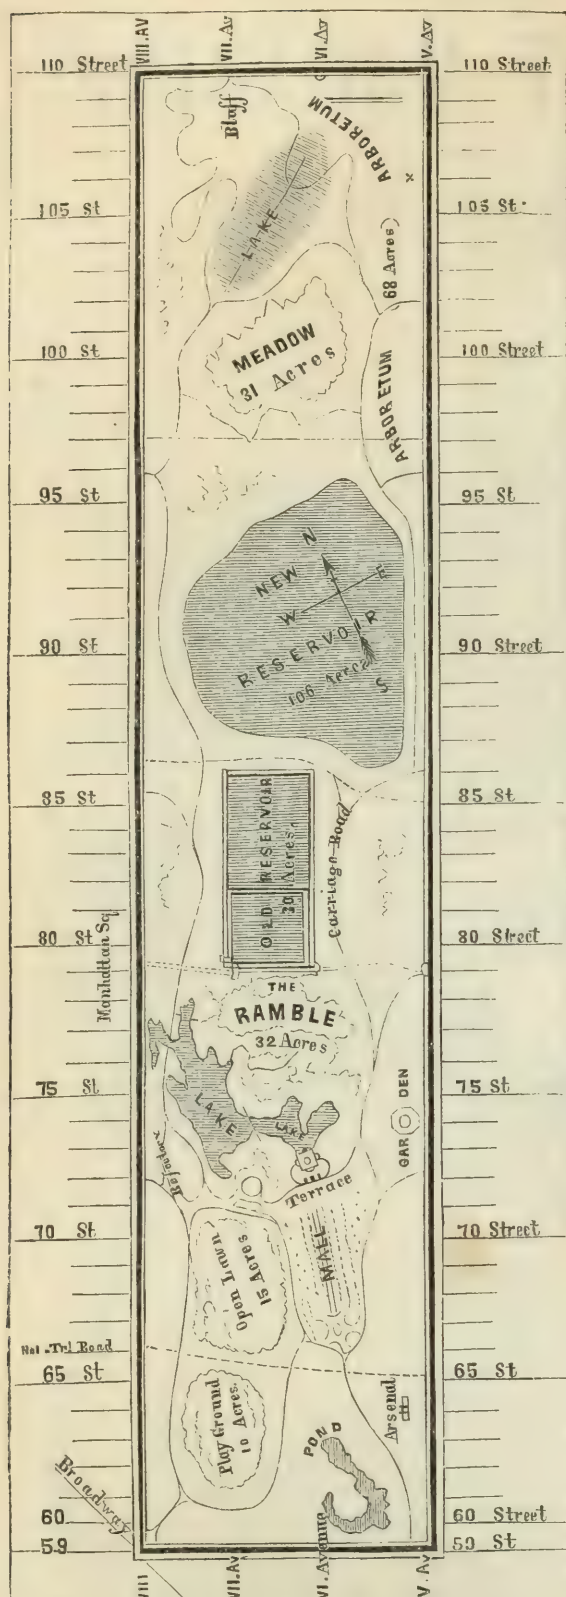

THE long-standing want in the great city of New York of suitable public pleasure-grounds, has, within the past two or three years, been amply supplied in the creation of that beautiful Arcadia known as the Central Park; a magnificent domain containing hundreds of broad acres of hill and valley, cliff and copse, lake and lawn, and miles upon miles of winding drives and winning walks, all radiant in a magic atmosphere of art and taste.

The character and consequence of this grand enterprise, and the wonderful rapidity and success with which it has been urged forward, have made it a subject of such extraordinary curiosity and interest at home and abroad that we feel assured of doing our readers an acceptable service in presenting them with some inklings and pencillings of its history and condition past, present, and prospective.

The first public step toward the consummation so devoutly wished was a special message addressed on the 5th of April, 1851, by the Hon. Ambrose C. Kingsland, then mayor of the city, to the Board of Aldermen, urging the utility and necessity of more liberal provision for the rural recreation and pleasure of the great and ever growing population; and that, too, before the opportunity should be lost, in the threatened absorption of the whole island and suburbs by pent-up lanes and streets.

The aldermen returned a prompt and hearty concurrence with the views and wishes of the Mayor, and the people every where said "Amen!"

So much in earnest were all concerned that before three months had followed the initiation of the project the State charter required for its execution was duly provided. This act was dated July 11, 1851, and was called the "Jones's Woods Park Bill," the original thought having been the occupation of the grounds thus named.

At this period Jones's Woods was not circumscribed within its present narrow bounds, but extended over the whole wide area lying between the Third Avenue and the East River, and between Sixty-sixth and Seventy-fifth streets, and with the addition of certain adjoining property, which it was proposed to annex, presented a surface of one hundred and sixty acres. This locality possessed many attractions, chief among which was the dense covering of forest trees, which rendered the adaptation of the place to park uses simple, speedy, and comparatively inexpensive. The minor objections were its aside position and its want of topographical variety, but the grand and insuperable obstacle was its limited extent. The people demanded ampler scope and more varied beauties for their much-desired park, as they reflected more seriously upon its high destiny—just as years before they rose from the humble idea of supplying the city with water from the little currents of the adjoining Bronx to the grander conception of leading in the floods of the far-off Croton, through the present magnificent aqueduct. "One hundred and sixty acres of park," said they, "for a city that will soon contain millions of inhabitants! It is only a child's play-ground! Five hundred acres it should be, or, better yet, a thousand!" And so from five hundred to a thousand acres they easily secured, the authorities, both city and State, graciously assenting as before.

The act authorizing the purchase of the present site passed the Legislature on the 23d of July, 1853, and at the same time another bill for the occupation of Jones's Woods, the first having, on account of material errors, been objected to in the Supreme Court. Thus it seemed for a while that the city would have two parks instead of one; but the lesser scheme was subsequently abandoned and its charter was repealed.

On the 17th of November, 1853, five Commissioners of Estimate and Assessment were appointed by the Court to take the land under the new Central Park charter. This commission completed its labors on the 2d of July, 1855, and its report was confirmed on the 5th of February, 1856. On the 19th of May the Common Council adopted—in the absence of the necessary legislation—an ordinance creating the Mayor, the Hon. Fernando Wood, and the Street Commissioner, Joseph S. Taylor, Esq., Commissioners of the Park, with power to proceed with the work and appropriating the funds necessary therefor.

This Board entered at once with laudable zeal and intelligence upon the discharge of their important duties, calling to their aid the counsels of a number of prominent citizens, among whom were the late Washington Irving, the Hon. George Bancroft, James E. Cooley, Charles F. Briggs, James Phalen, C. A. Dana, and Stewart Brown, Esquires. These accomplished gentlemen attended the meetings of the Commissioners in the capacity of a consulting Board. They met on the 29th of May, 1856, organized by electing Mr. Irving as their President, and then arranged the preliminaries for carrying forward the work intrusted to their care. At subsequent meetings they considered the various views and the many plans which were laid before them, and in due time they unanimously agreed upon the general features of the design for the construction of the new Park, which has been since, with modifications, so admirably and satisfactorily followed.

ARBOR NEAR THE SIXTH AVENUE ENTRANCE.

With the way thus opened, an efficient corps of engineers began the necessary surveys of the grounds, under the direction of Egbert L. Viele, Esq., at that time the chief executive officer. The entire area was divided laterally into four sections, each of which was assigned to a separate squad, consisting of a surveyor-in-chief, a first and second assistant, and an axe-man. These gentlemen began their labors early in June, 1856, and sent in their reports, at the opening of the following year, after six months' earnest and arduous field-work. The history of their adventures among the rocks, and jungles, and bogs of the then rude and desolate tract would be pleasant and surprising reading now in the dainty arbors, on the flowered walks, or by the marge of the pretty lakes, into which the jungles and bogs have since been so wondrously transformed.

BRIDLE ROAD, NEAR THE ARSENAL AND LOWER POND.

After the six years of suggestion, discussion, legislation, and other preparation which we have now cursorily reviewed, every thing was prepared for an earnest commencement of the proposed enterprise; and it was accordingly begun in the spring of 1857, and has been ever since unremittingly prosecuted with the magical results indicated in our present pictures and story.

Our Park occupies the generous area of eight hundred and forty-three acres. In form, it is an elongated parallelogram, lying longitudinally in the centre of the city or island, two miles and a half long from Fifty-ninth Street on the south to One Hundred and Tenth Street on the north, and half a mile broad from the Fifth Avenue on the east to the Eighth Avenue on the west. At its lower extremity it is five miles from the Battery, at the southern point of the island, and at its upper end it is about seven miles from King's Bridge at the northern extremity of the city. The East River is a mile distant on the one hand, and the Hudson is three-quarters of a mile off upon the opposite side. Our city readers may perhaps more clearly comprehend the extent of the ground, if we add that it is seven times larger than the united area of all the other squares and public places upon the island, and that it stretches over a longer space than that lying between the Battery and Union Square. Its dimensions far exceed those of any other pleasure resort yet constructed in the New World, and it compares in this regard most favorably with the principal works of the kind in old Europe, being more than twice the size of either Regent's Park or Hyde Park in London, and being exceeded only by the Great Park at Windsor, the grounds at Richmond, the Phoenix of Dublin, the Gardens at Versailles, the Bois de Boulogne, and the Prater at Vienna, which range in extent from fifteen hundred to thirty-five hundred acres each: all venerable achievements, royal in conception and in execution.

The total cost of the lands taken for the Central Park up to January, 1860, was about five and a half millions of dollars, from which sum there is to be deducted more than one and a half millions assessed upon contiguous lots; and to which must be added the value of that portion of the grounds lying between One Hundred and Sixth and One Hundred and Tenth streets, which was not comprised within the original charter, and is not yet fully and in due legal form in the possession of the Park commission.

The moneys thus far expended in the construction and maintenance of the Park amounted during the first season (1857), to nearly seventy-eight thousand dollars. In the year 1858 the expenditure was a little over five hundred thousand, and in 1860 nearly twelve hundred thousand dollars. With a proportionate outlay since, the entire disbursements for the lands and the improvements during the four years since the opening of the work have reached the liberal figure of some six millions of dollars—a large sum indeed, but generously and wisely considered by the people of New York as nothing when compared with the benefits of the enterprise to the public health, pleasure, pride, taste, and morals, for all future time. It must be remembered too, that the Empire City, while thus cheerfully giving the millions which we have counted, is yet giving and expects yet to give, every year, for a generation to come, other millions to develop the capacities of its Park and to perfect its beauties: and all this, too, from pure æsthetic and humane impulses, without any sordid arriere pensée of the ultimate reimbursement in dollars and cents, which will, no doubt, be made through the increased value which the Park will give to all the neighboring property, the business revenues it will attract to the city, the saving, through its kindly influence upon the public health and morals, and in many other ways. Upon this head the Controller of the city says, in his report for the year 1859, that "the increase in the amount of taxes accruing to the city, in consequence of the enhancement in the value of real estate situated in the upper part of the island, over and above the former value of the land now withdrawn from taxation, on account of the opening of this noble park, will, it is thought, afford more than sufficient means for the payment of interest on the debt incurred for its purchase and improvement without any increase in the general rate of taxation."

No spot could be more dreary and forbidding than was the site of our Park before the improvements were begun three or four years ago. "The southern portion," says one of the reports of the Board of Commissioners, "was already a part of the straggling suburbs of the city—and a suburb more filthy, squalid, and disgusting can hardly be imagined. A considerable number of its inhabitants were engaged in occupations which are nuisances in the eye of the law: and were consequently followed at night in wretched hovels, half-hidden among the rocks, where also heaps of cinders, brick-bats, potsherds, and other rubbish were deposited." The grading of streets through and across it had been commenced, and the rude embankments and ragged rock-excavations thus created added much to the natural irregularities of its surface. Large reaches of stagnant water made the aspect yet more repulsive; and so ubiquitous were the rocks that, it is said, not a square rood could be found throughout which a crow-bar could be thrust its length into the ground without encountering them. To complete the miseries of the scene, the wretched squatters had, in the process of time, ruthlessly denuded it of all its vegetation except a miserable tangled underbrush.

Still, despite this forlorn condition of the neighborhood, its great and varied capacities of beauty, under proper culture, were plainly manifest to the educated eye, in its changing hills and dales rising a hundred and forty feet above tide-water, or nestling forty feet below the grade of the surrounding streets. It was not a difficult thing to imagine the swamps of stagnant water, drained and turfed as they have been into broad verdant meadows; to collect the bright waters of the unruly brooks into peaceful lakes; to replace the vile hovels with beautiful summer-houses and arbors, and to see noble carriage-ways and inviting foot-paths stealing every where through the glens and thickets. The proximity also of the great reservoirs of the Croton Aqueduct indicated ample supplies of water, over and above the natural resources of the region, for the seductive attractions of pond and fountain.

It was with a comprehensive and intelligent perception of these extraordinary natural advantages of the locality that the Commissioners, architects, engineers, and laborers set to work, not to torture and destroy as would have been the process in past days, but (in the more enlightened spirit of landscape-gardening which now happily obtains) to develop and enhance.

To accomplish this gigantic task three thousand men set head and heart at work, aided by all the powerful resources of art and science and an unstinted purse. This army of laborers has now been busy during four long years, and is still busy constructing roads and bridges and arch-ways; turning dreary wastes into grassy lawns, collecting the straggling brooklets into expansive lakes; here leveling the ponderous rock, and there exposing it in more striking and picturesque aspect.

Not the least agreeable feature of the Park, at the present time, is the vivid contrast between the quiet elegance and beauty of the finished and available portions, and the busy bustle and confusion of other sections still in the various stages of construction. It will be pleasant by-and-by to wander about the livelong day, meeting every where with nothing to change the spirit of one's dream of beauty and repose; but it is also most agreeable now to watch the progress of the works—expending curiosity and fancy upon this and that enigmatical beginning, and to be warned now and then against the dangers of the impending rock-blasts. This last incident is a notable and very exciting one. It is conducted with such admirable caution that not one of the tens of thousands who daily witness it have ever received or have, indeed, been in any way exposed to the slightest injury. These blasts, which are very numerous and upon a grand scale, are made daily at the same moment all over the Park. At noon warning is rung out from the bell-tower, and visitors in carriages or on foot are suddenly brought to a halt or turned to places of security by the cries of the keepers and the shouts of the flag-men. When all is safe, the watch-word, "All clear!" is passed from one flag to another throughout the grounds; the bell tolls again and again, until the final moment at length arrives, when the word

"Fire!" is quickly shouted along the line, the matches are hastily lighted, and the air resounds as with the noise of a cannonading army. On the right and the left, before and behind, here, there, and every where, are seen the ponderous discharges, filling the air with the smoke and smell of villainous saltpetre and the huge fragments of the sundered rocks. A few minutes thus elapse, when the bell rings once more, the cry of "All over!" is echoed from flag to flag, the sudden blockade of travel is removed, and equestrians and pedestrians pursue their various again as they severally list.

The only portion of the Park which is yet much frequented, or in which any considerable improvement has been made, is that lying below the Tower and the old Reservoir at Seventy-ninth Street. This part, from the southern boundary at Fifty-ninth Street up, embraces a little more than a third of the whole area, and will probably be known as the "Lower Park," in contradistinction to the upper section, from which it is partially separated through the occupation of much of the central third—speaking in general terms—by the reservoirs of the Croton Aqueduct. This lower division is a noble park of itself, quite sufficient in its extent and attractions to exhaust the hours of the longest and busiest summer day. Being the most easily accessible to the masses of the population below, it has naturally received the earliest attention, even to the temporary neglect of the more remote portions. Its capabilities are, however, less—as its beauties will ultimately be—than those of the Upper Park, reaching from the northern end of the new Reservoir at Ninety-sixth Street to the boundary at One Hundred and Tenth Street.

The leading points of attraction and resort up to the present time are the Grand Circuit, or the Tour, as the broad carriage-road is differently called, the Glen, or Bridle Road, the Ramble, the Central Lakes, the Mall, and the superb Water Terrace.

The Tour, or Drive, is a spacious Macadamized road for vehicles, with a wide foot-path on either side. It makes the entire circuit of the grounds, commencing at the corner of the Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. In its serpentine course it embraces all the great architectural and scenic features of the Park: the lakes, bridges, lawns, and reservoirs, and all the beautiful vistas beyond. In November, 1859, about three miles of this noble avenue were opened for public use. At this time more than twice that distance is completed, or is in immediate process of construction. Its entire length, when finished, will be nine and a half miles. It is substantially and elegantly built, in part upon the Macadam and in part upon the Telford methods. In its course—which will be found traced upon our “Map of the Park”—it crosses many fine bridges and arch-ways, now over and now under the foot-paths and bridle-roads, and across the sunken and tunneled passages which give public transit, here and there, through the Park. It presents a brilliant and inspiring spectacle, as seen upon sunny afternoons, when alive with the whirl of a thousand gay and gorgeous carriages, bearing the élite and fashion of the city through their daily airing.

The Bridle Road follows the great carriage-way, with many capricious détours, through all the long circuit of the Park. It is entirely shut out, however, from the carriage route, which it never crosses except upon arch-ways above or below. It is intended exclusively for horsemen, and is nowhere accessible to vehicles, though equestrians may enter the carriage-roads when they please. In width it varies from twenty to twenty-five feet. Some considerable portion of this picturesque ride is now in use, and when completed its total length will be between five and six miles.

The Commissioners propose to add a winter drive to the present picturesque net-work of road, which, when covered with snow and merry sleighs, will be one of the most unique and beautiful incidents of Park experience and enjoyment. It is to be about a mile and a half in length, upon the west side of the grounds between Seventy-second and One Hundred and Second streets. It will be thickly planted with evergreens, with such deciduous trees and shrubs only as may be needful to prevent a monotonous and gloomy effect. Open glades of grass will break the uniformity of these masses of evergreen, so as to produce the effect of a richly wooded and varied landscape, rather than of an unbroken forest-land.

The Ramble is a charmingly wooded labyrinth of thirty-two acres, lying upon the broad hill-slope which drops down from the lower end of the old Reservoir at Seventy-ninth Street to the margin of the Central Lakes. It is a wonderfully secluded and quiet spot, quite undisturbed in all its generous extent by any road except the intricate foot-paths, which dance merrily and coquettishly hither and thither, through rich shrubbery of ever-changing form and tint, leading the willing wanderer, amidst their inexplicable mazes, now into the grateful shade of some Arcadian bower, and anon to the crest of some rocky cliff, overlooking the sunlit landscape far and near. It is the spot of all spots in the great Park for dreams and reverie, and will naturally become sacred to sentiment and love. Of its capabilities in this wise under the soft spell of summer moonlight, glinting through the parting verdure upon the gentle ripples of the silvery lake below, we can not trust ourselves to speak. For the delights of the Ramble—which, with all their beauty, are as yet only in the bud of brighter promise—we are especially indebted to the rare taste and skill of Mr. Olm-ted, the accomplished architect-in-chief of the Park.

The Central Lake is an exquisite reach of bright waters, covering an area of twenty acres, and bounded by a shore of infinite variety and beauty. Upon the upper side are the wooded slopes of the Ramble, stealing down with gentle grassy step, or jutting out in bold, rocky promontory. At the southeast is the grand marble esplanade of the Terrace, with its gorgeous arches, fountains, steps, and statues. At its narrow waist beyond—where it is almost cut in two, like a modern belle—it is spanned by a noble wrought-iron foot-bridge, with a single arch of eighty-seven and a half feet. This structure is called the Bow Bridge, from its general likeness in form to a long bow; and sometimes the Flower Bridge, in consideration of the heavy vases of trailing plants which surmount its abutments. Another beautiful bridge carries a carriage-road and walk over the channel connecting the main and western portion of the lake, and yet another, near by—most picturesquely constructed of wood—conducts a foot-path across the little bay-on which approaches the western edge of the Ramble. Pictures of all these interesting structures are included in our present port-folio.

Pretty boats dot the surface of the lake, bearing visitors, for a moderate fee, hither and thither as they list. These little vessels make a winning incident in the scene, especially when filled on summer nights with a ringing chorus of happy hearts and voices. Whole fleets of snow-white swans, too, are ever gliding in stately progress through the winding waters. The manners and habits of these ghostly gentry are excellent examples of demeanor and conduct, teaching lessons worth the learning by their dignified and graceful movements, their thorough-bred ease and happy content, and their ready courtesy toward all the world. Our Park is indebted for this pleasing item in its catalogue of attractions to the liberality and sympathy of the good people of Hamburg, who generously sent us, from across the seas, some fine specimens of their own unrivaled breed.

THE CAVE.

The excellent facilities which the frozen waters of the lake afford for the noble exercise of skating have, of late, given such a marvelous impetus to that merry sport as to have made it one of the most attractive social features of winter life in the city.

When the ice is in suitable condition, the fact is announced by the elevation of a red ball upon the heights of the Tower Hill, above. The welcome news is immediately repeated by proper signs upon all the cars of the city railways leading to the Park; it is further whispered in the streets, the counting-rooms, and the shops, at firesides and tables, and in boudoirs. Every man tells his neighbor fervently that the "Ball is up!" whereupon, no matter how cold it may be, all the world, young and old, rich and poor, men and maidens, rush pell-mell to the Park, forthwith put on skates, and hold high saturnalia there from earliest morn to latest night. It is not, indeed, until the dark hours that the fun culminates—such hours better suiting, perhaps, the convenience of the lads, and the flirting proclivities of the lassies and lads both—skating being, in one of its phases, essentially a love-making medium, involving such timorous reliance of the trembling novice upon the trusty arm of the bold practitioner, such gallant arrests of tripping steps, such tender cautions against dangers seen and unseen, every where and always. At night, too, the dramatic aspect of the jubilee is greatly increased by the sparkle of the moonbeams and the glare of the Drummond lights, which flood the scene with startling brilliance. At the height of the warm season no less than eighty or ninety thousand people visit the Park daily, and the winter sport is often shared by as many as ten thousand at the same moment. Those who do not skate may run about upon the ice, or they may be propelled over the glassy surface by their friends who do, seated in comfortable arm-chairs placed upon runners, or they may watch the shifting scene within the temporary booths where skates and chairs are hired, and where creature-comforts are dispensed.

At the southern extremity of the Park, between the old Arsenal and the Sixth Avenue entrance, there is another pond called the South Lake. In area it is about five acres, and in form not unlike the top of an ancient pastoral crook—a very oddly contrived piece of water—Nature's contriving—where the incomprehensible twistings of the shore hide you every where from every body else. This lake is also a winter skating-ground; but it has, thus far, been given over to that more sturdy exercise known among the bonnie Scots, who especially affect it, as the "Curling Game."

At the upper end of the Park, in the great ravine known in Revolutionary days as M'Gowan's Pass, a suitable space has been assigned as the locality of another fine sheet of water, to be called the North Lake. It will, from the varied topography of that section, be of a much wilder and more striking character than the present lakes below. It is to be crossed by the main carriage-road upon a noble bridge of three bold stone arches.

The Mall is a beautiful lawn in the southwest, between Sixty-fifth and Seventy-second streets, and upon the right of the Sixth Avenue. It is traversed longitudinally by a grand promenade, thirty-five feet broad and twelve hundred and twelve feet long, flanked on either side by rustic seats and by a double row of overarching elms. One of the southern approaches to the Mall is under the elegant marble arch-way called the Alcove, and thence by broad steps ascending on either hand. Northward, the spacious walk terminates in a scene of unwonted beauty upon the upper esplanade of that imposing structure known as the Water Terrace. At this happy point seats are arranged for the cozy enjoyment of the orchestral strains which fill the grateful air at appointed days and hours. Overlooking the site of the "Orchestra" there is a great circle or concourse where carriages may congregate in rest, and their occupants thus see and hear without the inconvenience of descending;

and from it charming access may be had to the margin of the Central Lake close by, either beneath the richly walled and paved arch-ways of the Terrace Bridge, or by the massive stone steps which sweep down in sculptured pomp on the right and on the left.

The design and construction of the Terrace have been intrusted to Mr. Calvert Vaux, the assistant architect, and Mr. J. Wrey Mould. The work is already well advanced, and will be completed with all proper dispatch. Our sketch presents it as it will be seen—when finished and in connection with the Mall, when the trees there shall be more fully grown—from the higher points of the Ramble and the Tower beyond. Its elegance and stateliness, together with the grace and symmetry of the Mall, and the studied charms of the proposed geometrical Flower Garden close by, will give to this portion of the Park a feeling of the beautiful which will be in most grateful contrast to that vagrant and laissez aller humor of the picturesque which prevails through the rest of the grounds.

The Flower Garden, just referred to, will occupy the area upon the Fifth Avenue between Seventy-third and Seventy-fifth streets. Its fountained walls and floral beauties will make it a holy of holies within the great Temple of Nature, into which our Park is so rapidly growing.

We have already spoken of the walks in the Ramble and by the sides of the carriage-roads. There are so many other of these pleasant ways leading among scenes of delight beyond the general view, that the sum of them all told will make a comfortable walk of twenty-one and three-quarter miles; and in all this great stretch the wanderer will meet with no intrusion whatever of vehicle or horse to disturb the quiet tenor of his way. These foot-paths vary in width from three and a half to sixteen feet, the main walk being from twelve to sixteen feet.

To overcome, in some degree, that interruption to the general travel of the town caused by the long break in the streets which the Park necessarily makes, four thoroughfares will cross the grounds from east to west. These roads, say the Commissioners in one of their Annual Reports, "are to be so constructed by means of tunnels and other contrivances, as not to interrupt the landscape or practically effect any division of the Park. Roads and walks will cross them in such a manner, that, when the trees and shrubbery by their side are somewhat grown, they will not be seen by the casual observer. They will be noticeable from no part of the Park, except at their extremities, where they unite with the exterior streets at a higher grade than the surface of the Park, appearing as causeways a few hundred feet in length, terminating upon a hill-side. They will thus furnish the means of direct transit across the Park for business purposes, without causing inconvenience to visitors. The Park not being directly accessible from these covered ways, it will be unnecessary to close them at night, when the public are shut out from the Park itself. The Transverse Roads, as these public transits are called, enter from the Fifth Avenue at Sixty-fifth, Seventy-ninth, Eighty-fifth, and Ninety-seventh streets; and upon the Eighth Avenue at Sixty-sixth Street, Manhattan Square, Eighty-sixth and Ninety-seventh streets. The Sixty-fifth and the Seventy-ninth Street roads are completed and in use. The "Tunnel," represented in one of our pictures, carries the Seventy-ninth Street road under the high ground above the Ramble and at the foot of the smaller Reservoir.

Very much of the southwest quarter of the Lower Park is occupied by large open lawns, which are to be used as play-grounds for children, for cricket, and other sports of bat and ball, and for occasional military parades and reviews. This area has been filled out and reclaimed from the swamps which originally covered the region. The larger and more northerly of these beautiful commons contains fifteen acres lying between Sixty-sixth and Seventy-first streets. Except upon the south, where it is bounded by the first Transverse Road, it is all encircled by the main carriage-way. The smaller lawn between Sixty-first and Sixty-fifth streets occupies ten acres, which is the general size of the old parks and squares scattered through the city.

In the Upper Park, between Ninety-seventh and One Hundred and Second streets, there is yet another charming meadow of thirty-one acres. These broad fields being unobstructed by trees, excepting upon their margins, will afford space and verge enough for the freest and wildest of country frolics.

The picturesque forms and positions of the little arbors and summer-houses which dot the grounds are most winning passages, and very grateful to the wearied wanderer. Their number will, of course, increase as the work of embellishment and enrichment goes on. Other apropos structures will no doubt also peep up here and there, as shelters from sun and shower, and for purposes of refreshment and regalement—both solid and fluid. The site reserved for the chief edifice of the latter order—to be known as the "Refectory"—is in the open space upon the southwestern shore of the Central Lakes. The precise character and extent of its gastronomic capacities are things yet to be determined, but we have no doubt that our Park Commissioners will pay due respect to the material wants as well as to the æsthetic tastes of their visitors.

The numerous bridges and arch-ways of the Park form one of its pleasantest and most unique features. These structures were required for the crossing of the traffic roads, the passage of the brooks and lakes, and for the carrying of the carriage, bridle, and foot paths over or under each other. The whole number of ornamental bridges designed for the grounds is about thirty, besides the plainer arch-ways used over the Transverse Roads, and the many smaller works.

For the variety and elegance in the design, and for the excellence and durability of the construction of these bridges, the Park is indebted to Mr. Calvert Vaux, the assistant architect. Of the three beautiful fabrics over the Central Lake we have already spoken, as also of the arch-ways of the Tunnel and the Alcove. After seeing these works, one may turn with continued pleasure to the unique iron arch-way which carries the foot-path over the Bridle Road south of the play-ground; to the ornate arch-way for the Bridle Road under the carriage-drive west of the play-ground; to the graceful bridge for the foot-path under the Transverse or Traffic Road south-east of the Mall; the arch-way for the carriage-drive, for the foot-path east of the Ramble; that under the carriage-drive for the Bridle Road near the entrance from the Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street; the charming rustic bridge which crosses a little rocky brooklet as it enters the lake on the west side of the Ramble, and the picturesque stone arch-way near the Cave.

The Cave is a bold and romantic rock chamber, which opens northward at the base of the western slope of the Ramble, and southward upon a little arm of the lake. It was discovered by chance, but not in its present spacious and accessible form, for it owes all its availability to the judicious assistance of art.

Tower Hill, above the Ramble, is one of the highest points in the Park. Its topography naturally suggested the use which has been made of it as a general observatory. It is crowned by a bell-tower, which greatly assists in the direction of the Park labors, and at the same time affords to visitors a fine general survey of the grounds. The present rude tower is to be supplanted in due time by a more elegant and permanent structure.

With this glance at the characteristics of the Lower Park we now pass on to the central area, chiefly occupied by the Croton Reservoirs.

These colossal works cover a space of one hundred and thirty-six acres, thirty of which are occupied by the old or Lower Reservoir, and one hundred and six by the new fabric now in process of construction. The old work is a parallelogram, reaching lengthwise from Seventy-ninth to Eighty-sixth Street, and taking from the centre of the grounds a little more than one-fourth of their whole width. The new and larger basin begins just above the lower one, and extends to Ninety-sixth Street. It is irregular in contour, and at some points stretches so nearly across the entire breadth of the Park as scarcely to leave good elbow-room for the carriage and bridle roads and foot-paths. The Reservoirs are too much elevated to form a part of the Park landscape; on the contrary, they obstruct the view so much that the best way to treat them would be to plant them out as much as possible. Yet when the visitor leaves the roads and walks below, and trudges up their green slopes to the grand promenade upon the top of the ponderous walls, and looks thence into or across the vast reaches of crystal waters, or beyond to the distant glimpses of the city and its surroundings, he will find himself in a new and beautiful world, and will thank Fortune for the Reservoirs after all! More especially will he rejoice and be glad if he should happen to remember that upon the priceless treasure which they hold, or will hold when filled, of nearly a thousand millions of gallons of pure water, not only the great city below, but the lakes and fountains and verdure of the Park itself depend for refreshment and sustenance. It may be instructive to say here that the quantity of Croton water expended, or to be expended, each year, upon the lakes, fountains, drives, and walks, and for the general irrigation of that part of the Park lying below Eighty-sixth Street, is nearly one hundred and thirteen millions of gallons; and that the supply which will be required by the entire Park will be not less than two hundred millions of gallons per annum.

The construction of the new Reservoir is a gigantic undertaking, employing a thousand men, in addition to the three or four thousand engaged upon the Park outside. It advances slowly—so slowly as to delay the embellishment of the surrounding grounds, which are cumbered and obstructed by its materials and débris.

We come now to the district lying north of the Reservoirs, and popularly known as the Upper Park. This section of the ground possesses eminent capabilities for the production of wild mountain and glen effects. Its chief topographical incident is the deep and narrow ravine known in history as M'Gowan's Pass. This gorge, which traverses the district in a general southwesterly direction, is about thirty feet wide and some eight hundred feet in length. Bold hills flank it upon either side, terminating abruptly, at the upper extremity of the grounds, in a grand rocky bluff which looks out, far and wide, over the broad stretch of the Harlem plains; the view to the right taking in the city, villages of Yorkville and Harlem, the East River and its municipal institutions, the Sound and the shores of Long Island; the vista northward, including the High Bridge of the Croton Aqueduct and the lands of Westchester County; and, in the northwest, wandering over the village of Manhattanville to the Hudson and its famous Palisades—altogether a noble panorama, such as no other park in the wide world may approach.

The bluff of which we were speaking may be well devoted, at some future day, to the uses of an observatory. At the present time it is capped by a venerable gray-stone powder-magazine, and makes an impressive picture, seen from the plain below, and particularly under the weird effect of moonlight.

The Pass is traversed by a fine brook, which is to be exploited in the formation of the proposed North Lake. There still exist in the neighborhood some traces of the fortifications that by the Catholic Seminary of Mount St. Vincent, together with the old M'Gowan's mansion. One of the Seminary buildings is a new and picturesque brick structure containing a fine chapel. This will probably be preserved, and converted to some pleasant use—maybe a Picture Gallery, just as the old State Arsenal in the Lower Park is to be retained and transmuted into a Museum.—The older wooden buildings at present serve a good purpose as offices for the Commissioners, the architects, and other employés of the Park. It is the temporary residence also of Mr. Olmsted, the architect-in-chief, and of Mr. Vaux, the assistant-architect, abounded at the period of the Revolution, among which is the fine knoll, with the lines of a redoubt, seen in our view of the old site of Mount St. Vincent, from the exterior of the grounds upon the northeast.

The only improvements, thus far, within the limits of the Upper Park, are in the partial construction of roads—in the great meadow already mentioned, and in the preparations for an arboretum in the northeast angle, to cover an area of no less than sixty-eight acres, which will contain specimens of every tree and shrub that it may be possible to grow upon the site in the open air.

Upon the east side, near the line of One Hundred and Sixth Street, there yet stand the edifices vacated and their families, and the head-quarters of the great police force of the Park. Here the little army of Park-keepers—already between fifty and sixty in number, all classes and ranks included—are daily trained in the way in which they should go ; and an excellent way it is too, as the marked intelligence, courtesy, and kindness of the corps when on duty may testify.

If by chance we have, in anywise, at all over-painted the present aspect of our noble Park, let the reader remember how short will be the time before its daily developing charms will far exceed all we have or could have said. Wonders have been achieved, it is true, but still the work is, after all, only begun. Much of the grand area is yet scarcely touched, and the finished portions will yet be embellished a hundred-fold. Before long pretty lodges for the homes of the superintendent and the head keeper will spring up ; the attractions of a Museum, a Gallery of Art, of Zoological and Botanical Gardens, are anticipated ; fountains will send up their cool, silvery spray, and stately statuary will arise to make the verdure brighter by its marble whiteness. The present rude exterior wall will give way to a structure of fitting elegance, and the surrounding streets and avenues will be graded and paved, and lined with beautiful trees and splendid mansions. The ample capabilities of the grounds, and the equally ample experience, taste, and industry of the architects in charge, are so clearly seen in what has already been accomplished, that we may be sure the great work will go on prospering and to prosper. Our Park is not for the present day alone, but for all the generations yet to come ; and if the generous people of New York shall be remembered and blessed by their posterity for any good deed, above all others it will be for this inestimable gift.

THE DIGGERS AT HOME.

THE COAST RANGERS.

A CHRONICLE OF EVENTS IN CALIFORNIA.

II.—THE INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

WHEN the State of California was admitted into the Union, the number of Indians within its borders was estimated at one hundred thousand. Of these, some five or six thousand, residing in the vicinity of the Missions, were partially civilized, and subsisted chiefly by begging and stealing. A few of the better class contrived to avoid starvation by casual labor in the vineyards and on the farms of the settlers. They were very poor and very corrupt, given to gambling, drinking, and other vices prevailing among white men, and to which Indians have a natural inclination. As the country became more settled, it was considered profitable, owing to the high rate of compensation for white labor, to encourage these Christian tribes to adopt habits of industry, and they were employed very generally throughout the State. In the vine-growing districts they were usually paid in native brandy every Saturday night, put in jail next morning for getting drunk, and bailed out on Monday to work out the fine imposed upon them by the local authorities. This system still prevails in Los Angeles, where I have often seen a dozen of these miserable wretches carried to jail roaring drunk of a Sunday morning. The inhabitants of Los Angeles are a moral and intelligent people, and many of them disapprove of the custom on principle, and hope it will be abolished as soon as the Indians are all killed off. Practically, it is not a bad way of bettering their condition; for some of them die every week from the effects of debauchery, or kill one another in the nocturnal brawls which prevail in the outskirts of the Pueblo.

The settlers in the northern portions of the State had a still more effectual method of encouraging the Indians to adopt habits of civilization. In general, they engaged them at a fixed rate of wages to cultivate the ground, and during the season of labor fed them on beans and gave them a blanket or a shirt each; after which, when the harvest was secured, the account was considered squared, and the Indians were driven off to forage in the woods for themselves and families during the winter. Starvation usually wound up a considerable number of the old and decrepit ones every season; and of those that failed to perish from hunger or exposure, some were killed on the general principle that they must have subsisted by stealing cattle, for it was well known that cattle ranged in the vicinity; while others were not unfrequently slaughtered by their employers for helping themselves to the refuse portions of the crop which had been left in the ground. It may be said that these were exceptions to the general rule; but if ever an Indian was fully and honestly paid for his labor by a white settler, it was not my luck to hear of it. Certainly, it could not have been of frequent occurrence.

The wild Indians inhabiting the Coast Range, the valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, and the Western slope of the Sierra Nevada, became troublesome at a very early period after the discovery of the gold mines. It was found convenient to take possession of their country without recompense, rob them of their wives and children, kill them in every cowardly and barbarous manner that could be devised, and when that was impracticable, drive them as far as possible out of the way. Such treatment was not consistent with their rude ideas of justice. At best they were an ignorant race of Diggers, wholly unacquainted with our enlightened institutions. They could not understand why they should be murdered, robbed, and hunted down in this way, without any other pretense of provocation than the color of their skin and the habits of life to which they had always been accustomed. In the traditionary researches of their most learned sages they had never heard of the snakes in Ireland that were exterminated for the public benefit by the great and good St. Patrick. They were utterly ignorant of the sublime doctrine of General Welfare. The idea, strange as it may appear, never occurred to them that they were suffering for the great cause of civilization, which, in the natural course of things, must exterminate Indians. Actuated by base motives of resentment, a few of them occasionally rallied, preferring rather to die than submit to these imaginary wrongs. White men were killed from time to time; cattle were driven off; horses were stolen, and various other iniquitous offenses were committed.

The Federal Government, as is usual in cases where the lives of valuable voters are at stake, was forced to interfere. Troops were sent out to aid the settlers in slaughtering the Indians. By means of mounted howitzers, muskets, Minié rifles, dragoon pistols, and sabres, a good many were cut to pieces. But, on the whole, the general policy of the Government was pacific. It was not designed to kill any more Indians than might be necessary to secure the adhesion of the honest yeomanry of the State, and thus furnish an example of the practical working of our political system to the savages of the forest, by which it was hoped they might profit. Congress took the matter in hand at an early day, and appropriated large sums of money for the purchase of cattle and agricultural implements. From the wording of the law, it would appear that these useful articles were designed for the relief and maintenance of the Indians. Commissioners were appointed at handsome salaries to treat with them, and sub-agents employed to superintend the distribution of the purchases. In virtue of this munificent policy, treaties were made in which the various tribes were promised a great many valuable presents, which of course they never got. There was no reason to suppose they ever should; it being a fixed principle with strong powers never to ratify treaties made by their own agents with weaker ones, when there is money to pay and nothing to be had in return.

The cattle were purchased, however, to the number of many thousands. Here arose another difficulty. The honest miners must have something to eat, and what could they have more nourishing than fat cattle? Good beef has been a favorite article of subsistence with men of bone and muscle ever since the days of the ancient Romans. So the cattle, or the greater part of them, were driven up to the mines, and sold at satisfactory rates—probably for the benefit of the Indians, though I never could understand in what way their necessities were relieved by this speculation, unless it might be that the parties interested turned over to them the funds received for the cattle. It is very certain they continued to starve and commit depredations in the most ungrateful manner for some time after; and, indeed, to such a pitch of audacity did they carry their rebellious spirit against the constituted authorities, that many of the chiefs protested if the white people would only let them alone, and give them the least possible chance to make a living, they would esteem it a much greater favor than any relief they had experienced from the munificent donations of Congress.

But Government was not to be defeated in its benevolent intentions. Voluminous reports were made to Congress, showing that a general reservation system, on the plan so successfully pursued by the Spanish missionaries, would best accomplish the object. It was known that the Missions of California had been built chiefly by Indian labor; that during their existence the priests had fully demonstrated the capacity of this race for the acquisition of civilized habits; that extensive vineyards and large tracts of land had been cultivated solely by Indian labor, under their instruction; and that by this humane system of teaching many hostile tribes had been subdued, and enabled not only to support themselves but to render the Missions highly profitable establishments.

No aid was given by Government beyond the grants of land necessary for Missionary purposes; yet they soon grew wealthy, owned immense herds of cattle, supplied agricultural products to the rancheros, and carried on a considerable trade in hides and tallow with the United States. If the Spanish priests could do this without arms or assistance, in the midst of a savage country, at a period when the Indians were more numerous and more powerful than they are now, surely it could be done in a comparatively civilized country by intelligent Americans, with all the lights of experience and the co-operation of a beneficent Government.

At least Congress thought so; and in 1853 laws were passed for the establishment of a reservation system in California, and large appropriations were made to carry it into effect. Tracts of land of twenty-five thousand acres were ordered to be set apart for the use of the Indians; officers were appointed to supervise the affairs of the service; clothing, cattle, seeds, and agricultural implements were purchased; and a general invitation was extended to the various tribes to come in and learn how to work like white men. The first reservation was established at the Tejon, a beautiful and fertile valley in the southern part of the State. Head-quarters for the employés, and large granaries for the crops, were erected. The Indians were feasted on cattle, and every thing promised favorably. True, it cost a great deal to get started, about $250,000; but a considerable crop was raised, and there was every reason to hope that the experiment would prove successful. In the course of time other reservations were established, one in the foot-hills of the Sacramento Valley, at a place called Nome Lackee; one at the mouth of the Noyo River, south of Cape Mendocino; and one on the Klamath, below Crescent City; besides which, there were Indian farms, or adjuncts, of these reservations at the Fresno, Nome Cult or Round Valley, the Mattole Valley, near Cape Mendocino, and other points where it was deemed advisable to give aid and instruction to the Indians. The cost of these establishments was such as to justify the most sanguine anticipations of their success.

In order that the appropriations might be devoted to their legitimate purpose, and the greatest possible amount of instruction furnished at the least expense, the Executive Department adopted the policy of selecting officers experienced in the art of public speaking, and thoroughly acquainted with the prevailing systems of primary elections. A similar policy had been found to operate beneficially in the case of Collectors of Customs, and there was no reason why it should not in other branches of the public service. Gentlemen skilled in the tactics of State Legislatures, and capable of influencing those refractory bodies by the exercise of moral suasion, could be relied upon to deal with the Indians, who are not so far advanced in the arts of civilization, and whose necessities, in a pecuniary point of view, are not usually so urgent. Besides, it was known that the Digger tribes were exceedingly ignorant of our political institutions; and required more instruction, perhaps, in this branch of knowledge than in any other. The most intelligent of the chiefs actually had no more idea of the respective merits of the great candidates for Senatorial honors in California than if those distinguished gentlemen had never been born. As to primary meetings and caucuses, the poor Diggers, in their simplicity, were just as apt to mistake them for some favorite game of thimble-rig or pitch-penny as for the practical exercise of the great system of free suffrage. They could not make out why men should drink so much whisky and swear so hard unless they were gambling; and if any further proof was necessary, it was plain to see that the game was one of hazard, because the players were constantly whispering to each other and passing money from hand to hand, and from pocket to pocket. The only difference they could see between the different parties was that some had more money than others, but they had no idea where it came from. To enlighten them on all these points was, doubtless, the object of the great appointing powers in selecting good political speakers to preside over them. After building their houses, it was presumed that there would be plenty of stumps left in the woods from which they could be taught to make speeches on the great questions of the day; and where a gratifying scene might be witnessed, at no remote period, of big and little Diggers holding forth from every stump in support of the presiding administration. For men who possessed an extraordinary capacity for drinking ardent spirits; who could number among their select friends the most notorious vagrants and gamblers in the State; who spent their days in idleness and their nights in brawling grog-shops—whose habits, in short, were in every way disreputable—the authorities in Washington entertained a very profound antipathy. I know this to be the case, because the most stringent regulations were established prohibiting persons in the service from getting drunk, and official orders written warning them that they would be promptly removed in case of any misconduct. Circular letters were also issued, and posted up at the different reservations, forbidding the employés to adopt the wives of the Indians, which it was supposed they might attempt to do from too zealous a disposition to cultivate friendly relations with both sexes. In support of this policy, the California delegation made it a point never to indorse any person for office in the service who was not considered peculiarly deserving of patronage. They knew exactly the kind of men that were wanted, because they lived in the State and had read about the Indians in the newspapers. Some of them had even visited a few of the wigwams. Having the public welfare at heart—a fact that can not be doubted, since they repeatedly asserted it in their speeches—they saw where the great difficulty lay, and did all in their power to aid the executive. They indorsed the very best friends they had—gentlemen who had contributed to their election, and fought for them through thick and thin. The capacity of such persons for conducting the affairs of a reservation could not be doubted. If they had cultivated an extensive acquaintance among pot-house voters, of course they must understand the cultivation of potatoes and onions; if they could control half a dozen members of the Legislature in a Senatorial contest, why not be able to control Indians, who were not near so difficult to manage? if they could swallow obnoxious measures of the administration, were they not qualified to teach savages how to swallow Government provisions? if they were honest enough to avow, in the face of corrupt and hostile factions, that they stood by the Constitution, and always meant to stand by the same broad platform, were they not honest enough to disburse public funds?

In one respect, I think the policy of the Government was unfortunate—that is, in the disfavor with which persons of intemperate and disreputable habits were regarded. Men of this kind—and they are not difficult to find in California—could do a great deal toward meliorating the moral condition of the Indians by drinking up all the whisky that might be smuggled on the reservations, and behaving so disreputably in general that no Indian, however degraded in his propensities, could fail to become ashamed of such low vices.

In accordance with the views of the Department, it was deemed to be consistent with decency that these untutored savages should be clothed in a more becoming costume than Nature had bestowed upon them. Most of them were as ignorant of covering as they were of the Lecompton Constitution. With the exception of a few who had worked for the settlers, they made their first appearance on the reservations very much as they appeared when they first saw daylight. It was a great object to make them sensible of the advantages of civilization by covering their backs while cultivating their brains. Blankets, shirts, and pantaloons, therefore, were purchased for them in large quantities. It is presumed that when the Department read the vouchers for these articles and for the potatoes, beans, and cattle that were so plentifully sprinkled through the accounts, it imagined that it was “clothing the naked and feeding the hungry!”

The blankets, to be sure, were very thin, and cost a great deal of money in proportion to their value; but, then, peculiar advantages were to be derived from the transparency of the fabric. In some respects the worst material might be considered the most economical. By holding his blanket to the light an Indian could enjoy the contemplation of both sides of it at the same time; and it would only require a little instruction in architecture to enable him to use it occasionally as a window to his wigwam. Every blanket being marked by a number of blotches, he could carry his window on his back whenever he went out on a foraging expedition, so as to know the number of his residence when he returned, as the citizens of Schilda carried their doors when they went away from home, in order that they should not forget where they lived. Nor was it the least important consideration, that when he gambled it away, or sold it for whisky, he would not be subject to any inconvenience from a change of temperature. The shirts and pantaloons were in general equally transparent, and possessed this additional advantage, that they very soon cracked open in the seams, and thereby enabled the squaws to learn how to sew.

As many of the poor wretches were afflicted with diseases incident to their mode of life, and likely to contract others from the white employes of the reservations, physicians were appointed to give them medicine. Of course Indians required a peculiar mode of treatment. They spoke a barbarous jargon, and it was not possible that any thing but barbarous compounds could operate on their bowels. Of what use would it be to waste good medicines on stomachs that were incapable of comprehending their use? Accordingly, any deficiency in the quality was made up by the quantity and variety. Old drug stores were cleared of their rubbish, and vast quantities of croton oil, saltpetre, alum, paint, scent-bottles, mustard, vinegar, and other valuable laxatives, diaphoretics, and condiments were supplied for their use. The result was, that, aided by the peculiar system of diet adopted, the physicians were enabled very soon to show a considerable roll of patients. In cases where the blood was ascertained to be scorbutic, the patients were allowed to go out in the valleys, and subsist for a few months on clover or grass, which was regarded as a sovereign remedy. I was assured at one reservation that fresh spring grass had a more beneficial effect on them than the medicines, as it generally purged them. The Department was fully advised of these facts in elaborate reports made by its special emissaries, and congratulated itself upon the satisfactory progress of the system. The elections were going all right—the country was safe. Feeding Indians on grass was advancing them at least one step toward a knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures. It was following the time-honored precedent of Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, who was driven from men and did eat grass as oxen, and was wet with the dews of heaven till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. An ounce of croton oil would go a great way in lubricating the intestines of an entire tribe of Indians; and if the paint could not be strictly classed with any of the medicines known in the official dispensary, it might at least be used for purposes of clothing during the summer months. Red or green pantaloons painted on the legs of the Indians, and striped blue shirts artistically marked out on their bodies, would be at once cool, economical, and picturesque. If these things cost a great deal of money, as appeared by the vouchers, it was a consolation to know that, money being the root of all evil, no injurious effects could grow out of such a root after it had been once thoroughly eradicated.

The Indians were also taught the advantages to be derived from the cultivation of the earth. Large supplies of potatoes were purchased in San Francisco, at about double what they were worth in the vicinity of the reservations. There were only twenty-five thousand acres of public land available at each place for the growth of potatoes or any other esculent for which the hungry natives might have a preference; but it was much easier to purchase potatoes than to make farmers out of the white men employed to teach them how to cultivate the earth. Sixteen or seventeen men on each reservation had about as much as they could do to attend to their own private claims, and keep the natives from eating their private crops. It was not the policy of Government to reward its friends for their "adhesion to the Constitution" by requiring them to perform any practical labor at seventy-five or a hundred dollars a month, which was scarcely double the current wages of the day. Good men could obtain employment any where by working for their wages; but it required the best kind of administration men to earn extraordinary compensations by an extraordinary amount of idleness. Not that they were all absolutely worthless. On the contrary, some spent their time in hunting, others in riding about the country, and a considerable number in laying out and supervising private claims, aided by Indian labor and government provisions.

The official reports transmitted to Congress from time to time gave flattering accounts of the progress of the system. The extent and variety of the crops were fabulously grand. Immense numbers of Indians were fed and clothed—on paper. Like little children who cry for medicines, it would appear that the whole red race were so charmed with the new schools of industry that they were weeping to be removed there and set to work. Indeed many of them had already learned to work "like white men;" they were bending to it cheerfully, and could handle the plow and the sickle very skillfully, casting away their bows and arrows and adopting the more effective instruments of agriculture. No mention was made of the fact that these working Indians had acquired their knowledge from the settlers, and that if they worked after the fashion of the white men on the reservations, it was rarely any of them were obliged to go to the hospital in consequence of injuries resulting to the spinal column. The favorite prediction of the officers in charge was, that in a very short time these institutions would be self-sustaining—that is to say, that neither they nor the Indians would want any more money after a while.

It may seem strange that the appropriations demanded of Congress did not decrease in a ratio commensurate with these flattering reports. The self-sustaining period had not yet come. On the contrary, as the Indians were advancing into the higher branches of education—music, dancing, and the fine arts, moral philosophy and ethics, political economy, etc.—it required more money to teach them. The number had been considerably diminished by death and desertion; but then their appetites had improved, and they were getting a great deal smarter. Besides, politics were becoming sadly entangled in the State, and many agents had to be employed in the principal cities to protect the women and children from any sudden invasion of the natives, while the patriotic male citizens were at the polls depositing their votes.

The Department, no doubt, esteemed all this to be a close approximation to the Spanish Mission system, and in some respects it was. The priests sought the conversion of heathens, who believed neither in the Divinity nor the Holy Ghost; the Department the conversion of infidels, who had no faith in the measures of the administration. If there was any material difference, it was in the Head of the Church and the missionaries appointed to carry its views into effect.

But the most extraordinary feature in the history of this service in California was the interpretation given by the Federal authorities in Washington to the Independent Treasury Act of 1846. That stringent provision, prohibiting any public officer from using for private purposes, loaning, or depositing in any bank or banking institution any public funds committed to his charge; transmitting for settlement any voucher for a greater amount than that actually paid; or appropriating such funds to any other purpose than that prescribed by law, was so amended in the construction of the Department as to mean, "except in cases where such officer has rendered peculiar services to the party and possesses strong influences in Congress." When any infraction of the law was reported, it was subjected to the test of this amended reading; and if the conditions were found satisfactory, the matter was disposed of in a pigeon-hole. An adroit system of accountability was established by which no property return, abstract of issues, account current, or voucher, was understood to mean what it expressed upon its face, so that no accounting officer possessing a clew to the policy adopted could be deceived by the figures. Thus it was perfectly well understood that five hundred or a thousand head of cattle did not necessarily mean real cattle with horns, legs, and tails, actually born in the usual course of nature, purchased for money, and delivered on the reservations; but prospective cattle, that might come into existence and be wanted at some future period. For all the good the Indians got of them, it might as well be five hundred or a thousand head of voters, for they no more fed upon beef, as a general thing, than they did upon human flesh.

Neither was it beyond the capacity of the Department to comprehend that traveling expenses, on special Indian service, might just as well mean a trip to the Convention at Sacramento; that guides and assistants were a very indefinite class of gentlemen of a roving turn of mind; that expenses incurred in visiting wild tribes and settling difficulties among them did not necessarily involve the exclusion of difficulties among the party factions in the Legislature. In short, the original purpose of language was so perverted in the official correspondence that it had no more to do with the expression of facts than many of the employés had to do with the Indians. The reports and regulations of the Department actually bordered on the poetical. It was enough to bring tears into the eyes of any feeling man to read the affecting dissertations that were transmitted to Congress on the woes of the red men, and the labors of the public functionaries to meliorate their unhappy condition. Faith, hope, and charity abounded in them. "See what we are doing for these poor children of the forest!" was the burden of the song, in a strain worthy the most pathetic flights of Mr. Pecksniff; "see how faithful we are to our trusts, and how judiciously we expend the appropriations! Yet they die off in spite of us—wither away as the leaves of the trees in autumn! Let us hope, nevertheless, that the beneficent intentions of Congress may yet be realized. We are the guardians of these unfortunate and defenseless beings; they are our wards; it is our duty to take care of them; we can afford to be liberal, and spend a little more money on them. Through the judicious efforts of our public functionaries, and the moral influences spread around them, there is reason to believe they will yet embrace civilization and Christianity, and become useful members of society." In accordance with these views the regulations issued by the Department were of the most stringent character—encouraging economy, industry, and fidelity; holding all agents and employés to a strict accountability; with here and there some instructive maxim of morality—all of which, upon being translated, meant that politicians are very smart fellows, and it was not possible for them to humbug one another. "Do your duty to the Indians as far as you can conveniently, and without too great a sacrifice of money; but stand by our friends, and save the party by all means and at all hazards. Verbum sap!" was the practical construction.

When public clamor called attention to these supposed abuses, and it became necessary to make some effective demonstration of honesty, a special agent was directed to examine into the affairs of the service and report the result. It was particularly enjoined upon him to investigate every complaint affecting the integrity of public officers, collect and transmit the proofs of malfeasance with his own views in the premises, so that every abuse might be uprooted and cast out of the service. Decency in official conduct must be respected and the public eye regarded! Peremptory measures would be taken to suppress all frauds upon the Treasury. It was the sincere desire of the Administration to preserve purity and integrity in the public service.

From mail to mail, during a period of three years, the agent made his reports; piling up proof upon proof, and covering acres of valuable paper with protests and remonstrances against the policy pursued; racking his brains to do his duty faithfully; subjecting himself to newspaper abuse for neglecting it, because no beneficial result was perceptible, and making enemies as a matter of course. Reader, if ever you aspire to official honors, let the fate of that unfortunate agent be a warning to you. He did exactly what he was instructed to do, which was exactly what he was not wanted to do. In order to save time and expense, as well as further loss of money in the various branches of public service upon which he had reported, other agents were sent out to ascertain if he had told the truth; and when they were forced to admit that he had, there was a good deal of trouble in the Wigwam of the Great Chief. Not only did poor Yorick incur the hostility of powerful senatorial influences, but by persevering in his error, and insisting that he had told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, he eventually lost the respect and confidence of the "powers that be," together with his official head. I knew him well. He was a fellow of infinite jest. There was something so exquisitely comic in the idea of taking official instructions literally, and carrying them into effect, that he could not resist it. The humor of the thing kept him in a constant chuckle of internal satisfaction; but it was the most serious jest he ever perpetrated, for it cost him, besides the trouble of carrying it out, the loss of a very comfortable per diem.

The results of the policy pursued were precisely such as might have been expected. A very large amount of money was annually expended in feeding white men and starving Indians. Such of the latter as were physically able took advantage of the tickets-of-leave granted them so freely, and left. Very few ever remained at these benevolent institutions when there was a possibility of getting any thing to eat in the woods. Every year numbers of them perished from neglect and disease, and some from absolute starvation. When it was represented in the official reports that two or three thousand enjoyed the benefit of aid from Government within the limits of each district—conveying the idea that they were fed and clothed at public expense—it must have meant that the

OUT IN THE MOUNTAINS.

Territory of California originally cost the United States fifteen millions of dollars, and that the nuts and berries upon which the Indians subsisted, and the fig-leaves in which they were supposed to be clothed, were embraced within the cessions made by Mexico. At all events, it invariably happened, when a visitor appeared on the reservations, that the Indians were "out in the mountains gathering nuts and berries." This was the case in spring, summer, autumn, and winter. They certainly possessed a remarkable predilection for staying out a long time. Very few of them, indeed, have yet come back. The only difference between the existing state of things and that which existed prior to the inauguration of the system is, that there were then some thousands of Indians living within the limits of the districts set apart for reservation purposes, whereas there are now only some hundreds. In the brief period of six years they have been very nearly destroyed by the generosity of Government. What neglect, starvation, and disease have not done, has been achieved by the co-operation of the white settlers in the great work of extermination.

No pretext has been wanted; no opportunity lost, whenever it has been deemed necessary to get them out of the way. At Nome Cult Valley, during the winter of 1858-'59, more than a hundred and fifty peaceable Indians, including women and children, were cruelly slaughtered by the whites who had settled there under official authority, and most of whom derived their support either from actual or indirect connection with the reservation. Many of them had been in public employ, and now enjoyed the rewards of their meritorious services. True, a notice was posted up on the trees that the valley was public land reserved for Indian purposes, and not open to settlement; but nobody, either in or out of the service, paid any attention to that, as a matter of course. When the Indians were informed that it was their home, and were invited there on the pretext that they would be protected, it was very well understood that as soon as Government had spent money enough there to build up a settlement sufficiently strong to maintain itself, they would enjoy very slender chances of protection. It was alleged that they had driven off and eaten private cattle. There were some three or four hundred head of public cattle on the property returns, all supposed to be ranging in the same vicinity; but the private cattle must have been a great deal better, owing to some superior capacity for eating grass. Upon an investigation of this charge, made by the officers of the army, it was found to be entirely destitute of truth: a few cattle had been lost, or probably killed by white men, and this was the whole basis of the massacre. Armed parties went into the rancherias in open day, when no evil was apprehended, and shot the Indians down—weak, harmless, and defenseless as they were—without distinction of age or sex; shot down women with sucking babes at their breasts; killed or crippled the naked children that were running about; and, after they had achieved this brave exploit, appealed to the State Government for aid! Oh, shame, shame! where is thy blush, that white men should do this with impunity in a civilized country, under the very eyes of an enlightened Government! They did it, and they did more! For days, weeks, and months they ranged the hills of Nome Cult, killing every Indian that was too weak to escape; and, what is worse, they did it under a State Commission, which in all charity I must believe was issued upon false representations. A more cruel series of outrages than those perpetrated upon the poor Indians of Nome Cult never disgraced a community of white men. The State said the settlers must be protected, and it protected them—protected them from women and children, for the men are too imbecile and too abject to fight. The General Government folded its arms and said, "What can we do? We can not chastise the citizens of a State. Are we not feeding and clothing the savages, and teaching them to be moral, and is not that as much as the civilized world can ask of us?"

At King's River, where there was a public farm maintained at considerable expense, the Indians were collected in a body of two or three hundred, and the white settlers, who complained that Government would not do any thing for them, drove them over to the Agency at the Fresno. After an expenditure of some thirty thousand dollars a year for six years, that farm had scarcely produced six blades of grass, and was entirely unable to support over a few dozen Indians who had always lived there, and who generally foraged for their own subsistence. The new-comers, therefore, stood a poor chance till the agent purchased from the white settlers, on public account, the acorns which they (the Indians) had gathered and laid up for winter use at King's River. Notwithstanding the acorns they were very soon starved out at the Fresno, and wandered away to find a subsistence wherever they could. Many of them perished of hunger on the plains of the San Joaquin.—The rest are presumed to be in the mountains gathering berries.

At the Mattole Station, near Cape Mendocino, a number of Indians were murdered on the public farm within a few hundred yards of the head-quarters. The settlers in the valley alleged that Government would not support them, or take any care of them; and as settlers were not paid for doing it, they must kill them to get rid of them.

At Humboldt Bay, and in the vicinity, a series of Indian massacres by white men continued for over two years. The citizens held public meetings, and protested against the action of the General Government in leaving these Indians to prowl upon them for a support. It was alleged that the reservations cost two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, and yet nothing was done to relieve the people of this burden. Petitions were finally sent to the State authorities, asking for the removal of the Indians from that vicinity; and the State sent out its militia, killed a good many, and captured a good many others, who were finally carried down to the Mendocino reservation. They liked that place so well that they left it very soon, and went back to their old places of resort, preferring a chance of life to the certainty of starvation. During the winter of last year a number of them were gathered at Humboldt. The whites thought it was a favorable opportunity to get rid of them altogether. So they went in a body to the Indian camp, during the night when the poor wretches were asleep, shot all the men, women, and children they could at the first onslaught, and cut the throats of the remainder. Very few escaped. Next morning sixty bodies lay weltering in their blood—the old and the young, male and female—with every wound gaping a tale of horror to the civilized world. Children climbed upon their mothers' breasts, and sought nourishment from the fountains that death had drained; girls and boys lay here and there with their throats cut from ear to ear; men and women, clinging to each other in their terror, were found perforated with bullets or cut to pieces with knives—all were cruelly murdered! Let any who doubt this read the newspapers of San Francisco of that date. It will be found there in its most bloody and tragic details. Let them read of the Pitt River massacre, and of all the massacres that for the past three years have darkened the records of the State.

I will do the white people who were engaged in these massacres the justice to say that they were not so much to blame as the General Government. They had at least given due warning of their intention. For years they had burdened the mails with complaints of the inefficiency of the agents; they had protested in the newspapers, in public meetings, in every conceivable way, and on every possible occasion, against the impolicy of permitting these Indians to roam about the settlements, picking up a subsistence in whatever way they could, when there was a fund of $250,000 a year appropriated by Congress for their removal to and support on the reservations. What were these establishments for? Why did they not take charge of the Indians? Where were the agents? What was done with the money? It was repeatedly represented that unless something was done the Indians would soon all be killed. They could no longer make a subsistence in their old haunts. The progress of settlement had driven them from place to place till there was no longer a spot on earth they could call their own. Their next move could only be into the Pacific Ocean. If ever an unfortunate people needed a few acres of ground to stand upon, and the poor privilege of making a living for themselves, it was these hapless Diggers. As often as they tried the reservations sad experience taught them that these were institutions for the benefit of white men, not Indians. It was wonderful how the employés had prospered on their salaries. They owned fine ranches in the vicinity; in fact, the reservations themselves were pretty much covered with the claims of persons in the service, who thought they would make nice farms for white men. The principal work done was to attend to sheep and cattle speculations, and make shepherds out of the few Indians that were left.

What did it signify that thirty thousand dollars a year had been expended at the Tejon? thirty thousand at the Fresno? fifty thousand at Nome Lackee? ten thousand at Nome Cult? forty-eight thousand at Mendocino? sixteen thousand at the Klamath? and some fifty or sixty thousand for miscellaneous purposes? that all this had resulted in the reduction of a hundred thousand Indians to about thirty thousand? Meritorious services had been rewarded, and a premium in favor of public integrity issued to an admiring world.

I am satisfied, from an acquaintance of eleven years with the Indians of California, that had the least care been taken of them these disgraceful massacres would never have occurred. A more inoffensive and harmless race of beings does not exist on the face of the earth. But wherever they attempted to procure a subsistence they were hunted down; driven from the reservations by the instinct of self-preservation; shot down by the settlers upon the most frivolous pretexts; and abandoned to their fate by the only power that could have afforded them protection.

This was the result, in plain terms, of the inefficient and discreditable manner in which public affairs were administered by the Federal authorities in Washington. It was the natural consequence of a corrupt political system, which, for the credit of humanity, it is to be hoped will be abandoned in future so far as the Indians are concerned. They have no voice in public affairs. So long as they are permitted to exist, party discipline is a matter of very little moment to them. All they ask is the privilege of breathing the air that God gave to us all, and living in peace wherever it may be convenient to remove them. Their history in California is a melancholy record of neglect and cruelty; and the part taken by public men high in position in wresting from them the very means of subsistence, is one of which any other than professional politicians would be ashamed. For the Executive Department there is no excuse. There lay the power and the remedy; but a paltry and servile spirit, an abject submission to every shifting influence, an utter absence of that high moral tone which is the characteristic trait of genuine statesmen and patriots, have been the distinguishing features of this branch of our Government for some time past. Disgusted with their own handiwork; involved in debt throughout the State, after wasting all the money appropriated by Congress; the accounts in an inextricable state of confusion; the creditors of the Government clamoring to be paid; the "honest yeomanry" turning against the party in power; political affairs entangled beyond remedy; it was admitted to be a very bad business—not at all such as to meet the approval of the Administration. The appropriation was cut down to fifty thousand dollars. That would do damage enough. Two hundred and fifty thousand a year, for six or seven years, had inflicted sufficient injury upon the poor Indians. Now it was time to let them alone on fifty thousand, or turn them over to the State. So the end of it is, that the reservations are practically abandoned—the remainder of the Indians are being exterminated every day, and the Spanish Mission System has signally failed.

So much—and I could not say less—concerning the Indians of California. I now proceed in my account of the adventures of the Coast Rangers.

On leaving the head-quarters of the reservation we struck the beach about four miles to the northward, where we had a magnificent stretch of hard sand for five or six miles to the crossing at Ten Mile River. The whole party were in fine spirits, plunging their animals into the surf, running away from the heavy breakers, and racing over the sand-hills after the pack-mules. It was a morning to inspire enthusiastic visions of adventure. The air was fresh and bracing, and seemed almost to sparkle with the invigorating spray of the ocean. Every breath of it was worth a day's journey. Along the beach, at intervals of a few hundred yards, groups of Indians were engaged in catching and packing away in baskets a small species of fish resembling the sardine, which, at particular periods during the summer, abound in vast numbers on this part of the coast. The Indians catch them by means of a small hand-net, which they use in a peculiar and very dexterous manner. Holding the pole of the net in both hands, they watch the breakers as they roll in, and when they see one of suitable force and magnitude coming, they plunge into the surf and turn their backs upon the incoming wave. The moment it breaks they set their nets down firmly in the sand, and the fish are forced into it by the velocity of the receding current. I have seen them take out at a single catch an ordinary-sized bucket full. The old women of the different tribes take away the fish in large baskets to the rancherias, where they are dried in the sun and used as necessity requires. The coast Indians carry on a small trade with those of the mountains and interior valleys, in fish, dried abalone, mussels, shells, and various marine productions, in exchange for which they receive dried berries, acorns, and different kinds of nuts and roots. Of late years, however, they have been so harshly dealt with by the settlers that it is with great difficulty they can procure a scanty subsistence. They are in constant dread of being murdered, and even in the vicinity of the reservations have a startled and distrustful look whenever they are approached by white men.

At Ten Mile River we found the crossing a little dangerous on account of the tide, which sometimes renders it impassable for several hours, except by swimming. With some plunging, spurring, and kicking, the opposite side was gained in due time; and now commenced what might be considered the grand panorama of the coast. For a distance of more than a hundred miles, to Humboldt Bay, it is an almost constant series of ridges, spurs, cañons, and jagged rocks jutting out into the sea, over which runs the worst trail perhaps that ever was traveled by man on the back of any four-footed animal. The mountains that we, the Coast Rangers, climbed up in the course of our perilous expedition through this region; the fearful precipices that we slid down to the bottom of and reached alive; the endless intricacies of winding ridges, pine forests, brush, jungle, and chaparral, that we forced our way through without the loss of a single member; the bottomless gulches into which Captain Toby led us and induced us to pitch our camp, where man nor beast was never known to spend a night before, save Digger Indians and grizzly bears; the extraordinary amount of game that we slaughtered, including the most formidable wild beasts of the forest, and the roaring lions of the ocean—all these it is entirely beyond my powers to describe, and, indeed, if I possessed the faculty, it would be impossible to enter into a detail of each day's wonderful experiences. I can only here and there dash into the grand vortex of events, and rescue from oblivion some incident that may be floating upon the surface.

By referring to a rough note-book kept by Captain Toby, and politely furnished me by that gentleman at the close of the expedition, I find the following entry, under date of Monday, July 6th:

"This day, at 6 A.M., killed two fine bucks and wounded a large grizzly. Discovered a new trail during the forenoon which cuts off ten miles of the day's journey. At 4 P.M. saved the blue keg containing the vinegar."

There is nothing peculiar in the entry, except the main fact connected with the saving of the vinegar, which is altogether omitted. Captain Toby on the same occasion saved the life of our excellent friend Tom Fry, and as he is too modest to mention the incident, I will state the particulars.

But these must be reserved for another chapter.

INSECTS DESTRUCTIVE OF MAIZE.

—"Old Time's on wing,
And would ye partake of Heaven's joys,
The corn must be sown in Spring."

German Seed-sowing Song.

IF we, in imagination, could stand upon any of those high cliffs overlooking the rocky iron-bound shore around Plymouth: if our introspective faculties are sufficiently strong to bring before our vision the panorama of that momentous period when the white and the red man met for the first time on a continent whose existence men still thought a wondrous dream—what a picture it would be of antagonistic shadows, most gloomy and sad in every line, albeit the blue heavens were beaming above and the sea glowing in light beneath!

Those tall, lithe-limbed men of muscle, the dark-skinned flashing-eyed warriors of a dozen tribes, standing in their strength and power, bedizened with the barbaric spoils of a hundred victories in the forest, watching with silent eloquence the little heavy-laden storm-tossed skiff—the Mayflower of immortal name—gliding slowly over the phosphorescent sea, coming nearer and nearer, until those amazed and wondering heroes discern "the pale faces," can almost understand that their glory was even now vanishing away like the phantoms conjured up in the dark hours of the forest-night. Even now they feel the touch of the stronger arm, and shrink away from the intellect, intelligence, and indomitable will of the invading band gathered at the stem of that little ship, and looking defiance at the swarthy warriors who stand so silently watching those whose iron heels will soon crush out their identity, their individuality, even their names and language.

Slowly, but ever nearer, comes the tempest-tossed ship, her weary wings longing to be folded that she might know a little rest; and most gladly does the anchor slide into its oozy bed, and the Mayflower slumbers, lulled by the gentle waves which break in music upon the pebbly beach and against the sides of towering cliffs. Soon light and darkness meet—the civilized Christian and the barbarous, unrelenting savage.

The "pale face" has much to give, much to teach; the red man has little to give and much to learn, and oblivion to endure. Good-will must be encouraged on both sides: the "pale face" shows the wonders of the murderous weapon, and the red man gives his treasure—ears of Indian corn.

Fancy the offering made to these bold, fiery men. How they must have turned with disdain from these artless, impoverished children of the streams and valleys! How easy the conquest must have appeared—how near the result of annihilation when their places would know them no more, and the winds would find no echo when they called them in the forest glades, or beside the glowing rivers! But what a contrast is in these offerings—how significant, how suggestive of the Past and Present, and indicative of the overruling of a Supreme Power! What a glorious gift this was of the red man—how necessary to the existence of millions of human beings—for maize, in some form or another, is the daily subsistence of the greater part of the population of this country! Dismay and fear would seize the hearts of men if the corn crop should fail: and every American must say as did "enraptured Barlow,"

"All my bones are made of Indian corn.
Delicious grain!"

Maize, or Indian corn, the Zea Mays of Lin-næus, is a grass, one of the large family of Gramineæ. It is allowed by all botanists to be a native of America, although now distributed throughout every warm climate. Nothing can be more beautiful than a field of Indian corn, with its long, dazzlingly green, flag-like leaves, and the silken tassels hanging from the orifices of the ears, each so carefully wrapped in its protecting sheath.

There are many varieties of maize, red, chocolate-colored, yellow, crimson, and white: all of these are well known to the American planter. It does not thrive in Europe any where north of the basin of the Mediterranean, and poorly any where south of it. But in this country it grows luxuriantly, varying in height from two to eight feet, according to its variety. The albumen is sufficiently abundant and farinaceous to yield a flour. It does not contain so much starch as rice, but possesses mucilaginous substances found, equally nourishing to man and beast. It has been proved by trial that a man will work longer fed solely on Indian corn than on any other grain, and will retain his health unimpaired. Many men, West and South, live mostly the year round with very little addition to their bill of fare. A dish of good hominy is all the laborer asks at the South; and a bowl of "Sepawn" suffices for the wood-cutter and tiller of the ground "out West." The passion for it in a green state is extravagantly exhibited by men, women, and children all over the land during the summer months, and is no less active during winter for "Pop Corn." It is considered indispensable, under some form, on every table throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Corn is a precious, inexhaustible legacy left to the white man by his red-skinned brother; more lasting and eloquent than all the tumuli of their dead ancestors. Every ear of Indian corn is but a living epitaph to the memory of these fast fading wild children of the woods and winds; and when even their names have passed away from among us, a field of Indian corn will call them up to our fancy from every glade and valley in all their majesty and barbaric pomp.

Any thing injuring or militating against the quality and abundance of a staple second only to cotton in the estimation of the country becomes of paramount importance; and I propose to show you a few of the host which, if not kept under subjection by Omniscience, would soon render the land a desert, a vast grave-yard for man and beast.

The first on my list (Figure 1) is a large and beautiful moth, belonging to the Noctuæ. I can not suppose this insect to be so rare but that it may be found in almost any considerable collection in this country; but it is not described by any of our own entomologists, and is not known as a cut-worm. It would not be classed among the Agrotidæ if we accepted the imago alone, but its larva proclaims its affinity to this class so distinctly that it must be acceded. The specimen here represented is larger than ordinarily occurs, the larva having been well fed and tended. The Agrotis (i. e. "belonging to the country") Mayia—"Corn Cut-worm," has its fore-wings shaded in light and dark brown, deepening into black; the nervures are all white. The hind-wings are of a delicate brown; the bands heavy and black. The thorax is brown, with a lighter line running down it; the body is white, with black bands, a brown line running its length, a black one in the centre. The antennæ are pectinated in the males, and filiform in the females.

She appears in August and September, and deposits her eggs while the harvest is ripening; the small worm comes forth generally above ground, and feeds around on grass and other vegetation until it has cast its skin twice, when autumn finds it well advanced. As soon as the cold sets in it descends into the earth, and remains coiled up until the spring, when its food is prepared. We need not be amazed at finding every rootlet devoured, when we consider what their appetites must be after such a fast. But this cut-worm has a great deal of caution and moderation in its proceedings. It is a brown worm, naked (that is, free of hairs), with a horny, yellowish head, and a black line running through the segments. It first devours one side of the root of the corn, carefully abstaining from touching the main root springing from the grain. It then moves round to the other side. When it has obtained all it dares take without killing the plant outright, it moves off to another hill, leaving the first to turn yellow in leaf, droop, and almost die; but still sufficiently alive to cause the farmer to think "a nice little shower or more sun will bring all right." These come in time, but produce a dwarfish stem, and ears with spaces where no grains grow at all: in a word, yielding only the third of a crop. In this respect it differs from many other cut-worms which generally clip off the plant close to the surface, devouring all beneath it. It usually grows to the length of two inches, quite thick in the body, and changes its skin four times. When about to transform, it descends into the earth, where it takes nearly three days to go into pupa.

The pupa-case is represented in Figure 1, b. When the insect is ready to emerge, the lid bursts open, as you perceive, the moth having withdrawn its tube from the case (at c) before the division takes place. It creeps out wet, weak, and languid, grasping at any thing near by, to which it clings, gradually moving its wings to and fro and discharging a quantity of liquid of a dark-brown color. This continues three or four hours before the imago has gained its full expansion. When in the open air, she would now seek her mate; but if kept in confinement, she commences to deposit her eggs in a few days on any thing, and then dies. These eggs are sterile, being unimpregnated. The pupa-case is of a rich claret-red color, with lighter segments.

There is a singular provision allowed the moths which come out during warm weather. They can manage—but how, I can not tell you—to rise to the surface of the earth, so as to obtain as much heat as possible. You may bury them a foot below, but in a little while you will find them reposing on the surface. They seem to be aware that they have no time to lose. Again, with the moths that remain over the winter, you can not keep them on the surface. These you can see descending. They roll, and wriggle, and twist themselves until they are hid from the light. The colder the weather the lower they descend. How beautiful are all these provisions made by Providence for creatures esteemed by many so very useless and insignificant!

The next (Figures 2, 3) belongs to the family of Rhyncophorus, or “Weevils;” order, Coleoptera; sub-genus, Sphenaphorus. It corresponds in so many particulars with Say’s R. Immunis, that there is little doubt that it is the same insect seen at different stages. Early in the season it is quite brown, growing darker with age until it is very nearly black. It is familiarly called at the South and West, “Bill-bug,” “Corn-borer,” and “Cane-piercer”—it is a great nuisance under any name. The mother weevil bores into the stalk just above the ground, where she deposits her eggs. The grubs, when hatched, work up the stalk, eating their way in runs, if it is far enough advanced to allow of many inhabitants. In time the stalk dies, when suckers shoot up which, of course, give but half a crop at most.

The grub at first is short and cylindrical—whitish, with a brown head. It changes its skin four times, and becomes more slender and of a darker color. When ready to transform it throws out a few loose threads; gathering up the debris of its food it packs it around, making a cavity where it passes into pupa, remaining until the next season, when it comes out a perfect insect. The antennæ are placed on the rostrum, or beak, and are always elbowed, or bent, at an angle. The beak is horny and strong, and has the mouth at its extremity. The mandibles, or jaws, are obtuse or blunt. The other parts are very indistinct. The weevil is not punctured very roughly on the thorax, which gives it rather a polished appearance, very different from many of its confrères. The wing-cases are very full of punctures, and do not at all times quite cover the abdomen. It is apt to be distended more or less before she deposits her eggs. They are easily destroyed by burning the corn-stalks, or placing them in pits, covering them with lime or ashes; the insects are thus killed, and a good manure remains from the stalks.

The third insect on my list is the Gortyna Zea, the famous “Spindle-Worm”—(Figure 4)—so called from its destroying the “spindle,” or small stalk, which is hidden between the leaves when the corn is very young. If you examine the corn closely you will see a small hole in the side of the stalk through which the worm has entered, when hatched from the egg, on the exterior. When you discover the mischief you may draw the whole up—spindle, leaves, and all—for they are all detached by this little creature. Cut the spindle open, and then you will see the cause of the trouble. It will be perforated every way, up and down, by the caterpillar, whose castings will be packed cunningly around the hole, to prevent the evaporation of the juices. It is smooth, naked, and yellowish, with the head and first and last rings of the top black. There are bands of black dots running double round each segment. From each of these, with a high magnifier, you will perceive a strong black hair, growing to the length of an inch and a half. When full grown, is in bulk the size of a quill. When ready to transform, it spins a loose cocoon in the cavity which it has eaten out, and there turns into a chrysalis; it is of a dark reddish-brown; the edges of the last four segments are made irregular by small points, and four short spines turn up on the back extremity of the body.

This Gortyna Zea—"Spindle-moth of the Corn"—is a very pretty creature. The forewings are a rusty red, marked in bands, and mottled over with gray. There is a tawny spot at the tip of each fore-wing, which are to be seen distinctly only when the insect has newly emerged. The hind-wings are gray, mixed with yellow, with dark grayish spots in the centre, from which run two slight bands of gray. The head and thorax are reddish, with tufts of tawny feathers on each, the body is pale brown with the tawny tufts in a row down the centre. It expands, when a fine specimen, over an inch and a half.

You perceive, by comparing them, how very similar are the destructive habits of the two last insects of which I have treated, in the larva state; but examine closer, and you will note that the moth can only commit her injuries when the stalk is very young and tender, while the mission of the weevil's grub is to be carried out when it becomes stronger and harder in texture. There are yet three more of each of these insects, who, at alternate seasons, assist in this destruction.

You have before you (Figure 5) one of the wonders of creation—a very common, everyday production, but not the less marvelous on this account. The Aphis Mayis, the "Plant-louse of the Corn," as it is familiarly called, belongs to the order Hemiptera—the genus Aphis—sub-genus Eriosoma. The Aphidæ are scattered throughout the vegetable kingdom. Every plant, flower, bush, and tree, has its own peculiar Aphis attendant, differing somewhat in appearance but still retaining their individual habits and similitudes. They serve to keep down the redundancy of vegetation, and are the bonbons of the insect kingdom, serving as food to a great number of other insects.

This little creature, minute, common, and justly considered by us a great nuisance, has occupied the attention of naturalists of every age—has had treatises upon it read before the Académie des Sciences at Paris—has consumed months of their valuable time in experiments—Bazin, Lyonnet, Trembley, Bonnet, Reaumur, and a dozen others have found them a marvel and most worthy their deepest study. The first three were appointed by the Academy to test the experiments made by Bonnet, who proved that they brought forth young without pairing; “that the mother of ninety-five Aphides had never paired.” Trembley affirmed that they paired before birth, but this is considered now very erroneous. In subsequent experiments Bonnet ascertained (having seen up to the fifth generation in succession produce young without pairing) that the female after a time is deprived of her fecundity and becomes exhausted, when pairing is absolutely necessary to fertilize the female. And strange it is, after pairing she is no longer viviparous—that is, producing her young alive—but deposits eggs. This, you perceive, is a beautiful provision of nature. The tender young would be killed by the severity of the winter; but the eggs remain unscathed, and produce the young early in spring, who go on peopling the Aphis world as their ancestors did before them, without pairing. Another singularity is, that no males are produced until toward the close of the season.

These naturalists stopped here, but I have gone on a step farther. The female Aphis continues to bring forth young when she has changed her skin three times. She then becomes exhausted, which is near the time the males are produced, who gain their growth very rapidly, and obtain their wings at the fourth moulting. These exhausted females now cast their fourth skin, under which were hidden their wings; when they fly forth to meet their mates, depositing eggs for the future supply of the next year. They now pair until they have obtained their wings. Males and females are found feeding and living together until the fall is far advanced. You will find them of all shades, delicate green, almost white, dark green, pale brown, red, and nearly black, in the same crowd. But these are only individuals of different ages, and changed by the juices of the plants they are feeding upon. This is a beautiful experiment, which you can make any month in summer by closing up a large Aphis in a box with a glass cover; giving her fresh food several times a day of the plant from which you have taken her. You can convince yourself of this phenomenon occurring under your eyes every hour—nay, minute—of the day, from early spring until late in the autumn.

But let us examine this Aphis of the Corn. It differs in many particulars from those of the rose, the oak, the willow, and many others. The haustellum, or sucker, is not so long, but stouter and stronger, for it has a harder substance to penetrate. They are found only on the stem or stalk of the ear of corn, where they cluster, sucking the juice; thereby reducing the nourishment of the leaves and grains on the cob, which gives that wrinkled and withered look which ears of corn often exhibit. The sucker, when not in use, is carried, bent under, between the legs. It is a delicate transparent tube, the point acting as a perforator, and contains two small brownish looking instruments. But these are so exceedingly minute and tender that you can only prove this by pressing the sucker, which will not allow dissecting in this variety, from its flabbiness after death. When multiplied to thousands and tens of thousands they demonstrate their capabilities of injury most unmistakably. They have two tubes, called "honey-tubes," at the extremity of the body, through which passes the "honey-dew;" so long a marvelous production to naturalists, but which is now proved to be ejected from these tubes as food for the young who are not capable of perforating for themselves. This is the reason why you always find black and red ants clambering up the corn-stalks. They are accused of stealing grains from the ears when they simply have been seeking this their favorite food, and coaxing their friends, the Aphides, by every affectionate caress, to give them this delicacy—which these generous little creatures never refuse. The instinctive gourmands: it is quite amusing to see them lapping it up with such apparent delight.

This variety—the Eriosoma—has another peculiarity of ejecting from every segment fibres of a white cottony material; not so long and thick as that belonging to the Apple and Honey-suckle Aphides, but quite sufficient to shelter the young from extreme heat or cold. And here, among this cottony stuff, you will find granulated lumps of honey-dew, which you will often see ants carrying off in their jaws to store away in their own nests. This variety, which is called in England "the American Apple Blight," was long considered to belong alone to this country; but it is now well ascertained to be quite as prolific in the Netherlands, France, and the south of Europe, as with us.

I hope you will look upon these little creatures with more curiosity than hitherto. They are indeed a marvel, and a subject of thought to every reflecting mind.

Tinea Maisinia—"Corn-silk Moth" (Figure 6). I wish it was in my power to place this little moth under a magnifier before the eyes of every reader. It is certainly one of the most beautiful little creatures in existence. The Tinea Maisinia feeds only on the efflorescence or silk of the corn. It is, indeed, a marvel of beauty. Let me describe it as well as the pen will paint. First, it is silvery white—those dots on the front wings are two shades of brown: dark and paler at the edges; the little dots on the exterior encircling them are black; they are raised like feathers on the breast of a bird, the white shimmering around them like hoar-frost. The hindwings are the same, except having only one large brown spot and a double row of black dots on each. The head and thorax are both covered with scales of burnished gold, scintillating with every ray of light, and throwing them off in shades as if from a prism. The body is silvery white, with dots of black feathers. The light is so reflected from the dazzling commingling of these colors that she looks as if incased in spun glass, and makes your eyes ache with its brilliancy.

A friend brought me an ear of variegated corn, with a very full efflorescence of silk falling from it, upon which a minute white worm, with a pinkish head, was feeding. Four days after, it spun its cocoon amidst the silk as you see (Figure 6, c), and in two weeks it came forth this beautiful winged creature. It was the admiration of a number of persons; but one, more anxious to see it closer, approached the window, and away she flew like a golden spangle out into the world—an atom of exquisite finish and beauty. I was well pleased that I had painted her, and more so that she had flown away. I could not reconcile myself to the thought that, like other bright loved ones of earth, so much beauty must fade, perish, and become dust.

Phytometra Zea—"Half-looper Moth of the Corn" (Figure 7). This insect has exercised a vast number of minds in discussing its identity with the celebrated "Boll-worm" of the cotton plant. But on comparing the perfect moths a great discrepancy will be found, although there is so much resemblance between the larvæ.

Neither of them are what is called by entomologists "nice eaters;" that is, refusing any other but the one particular plant. The boll-worm will not starve, but she certainly has a choice. The moth Phytometra Zea, in the larva state, will devour young grass seeds, and thrive equally as well as upon corn, or wheat in the milk, or rice; in fact, upon any thing succulent and juicy. But you could not feed the boll-worm on corn, or on any of the Gramineæ. This moth is found throughout the country wherever Indian corn grows; but the "Boll-worm moth" never strays from the cotton-fields. The worm is at first greenish, turning to a brownish hue near the time it is about to moult, and appearing of intermediate shades in the interval. It is naked, or covered with a line of hairs on the back after the last moult: it has a yellow stripe running through the segments with black dots intervening. It is only found when corn is in the milky state, and descends into the earth for transformation when the grain hardens. It has the oddest, most uncouth position when it first starts to walk, as if the tail was not its own; but after the arch in its half-expansion is once formed, it travels over the ground quite rapidly. The eggs are deposited by the moth in a cluster on the very apex of the young ear, where they are protected by the sheath leaves until the grains are forming, when they commence to eat downward, as you perceive, sheltered by the leaves, which are withdrawn to show the habit of these larvæ. They are very destructive while they last, and very wasteful, often eating out only the kernel of every grain and leaving the rest. When ready to descend it falls gently by a long thread to the ground. When on the surface it rolls and twists its body until it sinks into a cavity, which it lines with silk very slightly, binding and gumming the grains of sand over it until a rough cocoon is formed. Here it changes into a bright-brown chrysalis, with its wings very distinctly marked, and remains over until the next season.

The moth, if the worm has been well fed, expands nearly two inches. It is a leonine yellow on the upper wings, with two bands running across of a more tawny yellow, with an irregular and darker spot in the centre of each. In some specimens they are quite crescent-shaped. The under wings are of a lighter color, with bands of brown, almost black, on the margins, with a crescent-shaped spot in the centre of each. The thorax and body are a mixture of black, dark brown, and yellow hairs.

Sitophilus Granaria—"Corn Weevil" (Figure 8). This insect, although not very common, is daily on the increase. It was first sent to me found in some seed-corn procured from the Patent-office at Washington. It belongs to the Coleoptera order, genus Calandra, and sub-genus Sitophilus, and is without doubt the Curculio granarius of Linnæus. It has a long thorax, which, as well as the wings, are deeply punctured; they do not cover the abdomen entirely. It is of a pitch-red color. They are principally found on corn which has been "husked," or shelled from the cob. The mother weevil bores a hole in the grain, in which she drops an egg, going from grain to grain until she has deposited nearly two hundred eggs. The grub is rather cylindrical at first, but as it grows older it becomes more slender. It is of a yellowish white, with a few black hairs on the head. Sometimes it has a lead-colored tinge; then, again, red or brown, if the corn is colored. It eats only the one grain it is placed in, which suffices for its larder and cradle, where it spins a slight envelope of silk, and turns into a pupa, remaining over until the next season, when it comes out a perfect weevil, ready to recommence its depredations. You may multiply this insect to any extent by leaving old grain about, or keeping dusty, unswept granaries. They will eat any kind of grain, but always prefer corn.

Pyralis Farinalis—"Meal Moth," or "Corn Moth" (Figure 9). Here is a very pretty little, brisk, active body, which resembles somewhat a pigeon when her wings are folded and she is at rest. The Pyralis Farinalis is indifferent whether she places her eggs on the husky portion at the base of the grain, or in the meal, or on the grooves of the barrel or box it is kept in. When she chooses the grain the caterpillars devour it entirely, and go off to others, until they have fed their appointed time. The grains are eaten in a very irregular manner, quite different from the way of eating exhibited by the grubs of the weevils. The caterpillar is pink, sometimes red, and about a quarter of an inch long when full grown. The cocoon is made of corn-dust and other particles, bound together with silk. It is oval in shape, very bushy with odds and ends. It is either attached to the outside of the grain, or between two or three shells drawn round it, or against any wood-work near by, or hid away flat in a corner of the bin or box, wherever it may be when ready to transform. The chrysalis is very delicate, of a pale brown, with the wing-cases quite transparent. It is a very pretty insect. The upper wings are of a chestnut-brown, crossed by two curved lines of white, with small dark spots near the centre, with lighter edges around them, and chocolate-brownish colored spots at the tip of each. The under wings are of a light brown, and deeply fringed. The head, thorax, and body are brown, with dark hairs sprinkled over them.

I know no little moth that is so fond of being perched in our parlors as this. She is very sociable, and can be seen all summer visiting our pantries, and spying into meal-boxes and corn-bins. She is, I am sorry to say, a very foolish little moth, always "allured by taper's gleaming light," and can be found in numbers around the lamps in farm-houses during the summer months.

Tinea Zea—"Meal Moth" (Fitch) (Figure 10). The Meal Moth is a very common, sedate-looking insect. Her fore-wings are gray and bluish, dappled with white; there are bands and spots of tawny yellow on the tips, but they are so very indistinct that they are scarcely perceptible, except when she has just emerged and newly dried. The hind-wings are white, with a leaden tinge over them, with long silken fringe; the body is a medley of yellow, black, white, and gray hairs. No color is paramount or in excess. The caterpillar is shining; a yellowish brown; has a hard, horny head, and sixteen feet. The eggs are scattered through the meal on which the caterpillars feed when hatched. When it is ready to transform it spins a loose cocoon against a post, or the barrel or box in which the meal is kept, and changes into a pale-yellow chrysalis, with brown lines on the segments. The eyes are more prominent than is usually seen. The favorite place is between the cakes of yeast used in most houses, in which corn-meal is the principal ingredient on which it feeds. In one of them it will form a cavity, which it lines with silk, covering itself nicely over with the same. Here it will remain hidden, unless disturbed, until ready to creep between the interstices, and comes out a perfect insect. They are very common every where North and South.

a. The Beetle.—b. The Grub.—c. Grubs feeding —d. Pupæ between Grains.—e. Head and Thorax of Sylvanus.—f. Antennæ.

Colydium Obliveata—"Flat Corn Beetle" (Figure 11). This belongs to the Coleoptera order, genus Colydium. It has been classed by some authors with the Sylvanus—a subgenus of the Ipsites. This is erroneous. This last has eleven joints in the antennæ; the thorax and head are broader than in the former, becoming quite narrow where it joins the abdomen. You can compare the two. The Colydium is very straight, flat, and narrow, and has twelve joints in the antennæ. It is of a bright chestnut-brown color; the wing-cases, or exterior wings, slightly punctured. She is so very flat that she creeps in between the grains on the cob, depositing her eggs at the base of the kernels. The grubs, as soon as hatched, eat into the grains, eventually devouring all the starchy parts of the interior, leaving the grains still standing but loosened. A whole ear can be thus destroyed, and only show exteriorly a transparent appearance when held up to the light. But strike it against something, and out they will tumble—beetles and larvæ by the hundred. The latter are very downy and whitish, scarcely differing in color from the corn itself. When ready to go into pupæ they spin a slight envelope between the grains, and change each into a brownish red chrysalis, remaining over as long as the negligence of the planter or farmer allows them.

You must not conclude that you have here all the insects destructive to Indian corn. These are only a few selections from the host, which is always on the look-out to perform their missions. Some orders, which are equally injurious, are not represented at all, as my space would not allow me to treat of them. But from these you can always be able to class a goodly number; for all weevils puncture alike, and all beetles gnaw or eat in the same manner. The larvæ or caterpillars of moths exhibit their difference to those of the Coleoptera, which are grubs; and by a close examination of these you can know where to find their abodes in the earth around the corn and in the grain.

With thankful hearts to the Giver of all good for the immense crops spared to us, even with such odds against us, we feel willing to join in the refrain of the German seed-sowing song:

"Fall gently and still, good corn,
Lie warm in thy earthy bed,
And stand so yellow some morn,
For beast and man must be fed."

THE FIGHT AT ORISKANY.*

AUGUST 5, 1777.

ON the fifth of August, in the morn,
I was plowing between the rows of corn,
When I heard Dirck Bergen blow his horn.

I let the reins in quiet drop;
I bade my horse in the furrow stop,
And the sweet green leaves unheeded crop.

Down at the fence I waited till
Dirck galloped down the sloping hill, Blowing his conch-horn with a will.

"Ho, neighbor! stop!" to Dirck I cried,
"And tell me why so fast you ride—
"What is the news you scatter wide?"

He drew the rein, and told me then
How with his seventeen hundred men
St. Leger vexed the land again.

A fiendish crew around him stood—
The Tory base, the Hessian rude,
The painted prowler of the wood—

The savage Brant was in his train,
Before whose hatchet, quick to brain,
Fell patriot blood in scarlet rain—

How all this force, to serve the crown,
And win in civil strife renown,
Before Fort Schuyler settled down,

Where Gansevoort close with Willett lay—
Their force too weak for open fray—
Bristling like hunted bucks at bay.

And Dirck, by Herkimer, the stout,
Was sent to noise the news about,
And summon all to arm and out.

Far must he spread the word that day,
So, bidding me come to join the fray,
And blowing his horn, he rode away.

I had been married then a year;
My wife to me was doubly dear,
For a child had come our home to cheer.

I had not mingled in the strife
That swept the land; my aim in life
To tend my farm, and cheer my wife.

I watched my flocks and herds increase,
And plowed my land and held my peace:
Men called me the Tory, Abner Reece.

Yet now the country needed all
Her manly sons to break her thrall;
Could I be deaf to her piteous call?

I thought me of the cruel foe,
The red-skinned Mingo, skulking low,
The midnight raid, the secret blow—

* ORISKANY is a village in Central New York, about eight miles west of Utica. The battle fought here on the 5th of August, 1777, was one of the most desperate of the whole Revolutionary war. The incidents given in the following ballad are historically accurate. The taunts which forced Herkimer to advance before he wished; his reply to his officers; the ambush; the "brave old Dutchman" sorely wounded sitting under a tree, smoking his pipe, and giving his orders; the thunder-storm which for a time interrupted the fight; the stratagem of Johnson, detected by Gardinier, and the flight of the Indians, are all detailed by Mr. Lossing, in his "Field-Book of the Revolution." Herkimer died of his wound nine days after the battle. His leg, shattered by the ball which had killed his horse, was amputated. The surgeon, a young Frenchman, was drunk and unable to stanch the blood. The General seeing his end approaching called for a Bible, read aloud the 38th Psalm, then closed the book, and died. No portrait of him is known to exist. All that Mr. Lossing could learn of his appearance was that he was "a large, square-built Dutchman."—Peter Gansevoort, who commanded at Fort Schuyler, was a native of Albany. For his gallant defense of the fort he received the thanks of Congress. He died in 1812, aged sixty-two years, having held several important offices of trust.—Marinus

PETER GANSEVOORT.

MARINUS WILLETT.

Hessians and Brunswickers, the leers
Of Europe's cup of miseries,
And brutal Tories, worse than these—

Britons, with rude, relentless hand:
All these made up the cruel band
Which came to spoil and vex the land.

I felt my heart in anger leap—
"No!" cried my spirit from its deep,
"I will not here ignobly creep.

"I have a strong arm for the fray;
"I have a rifle sure to slay;
"I fear no man by night nor day.

"When prowling wolves have left their den,
"The hunter's craft is needed then—
"The country must not lack for men."

So from the corn-rows, green and tall,
I led my plow-horse to the stall,
Then took my rifle from the wall.

I slung my pouch and powder-horn,
I kissed my babe scarce three months born,
And bade my wife farewell that morn.

I journeyed steadily all that day—
Through brake and brier I made my way;
For stream or hill I did not stay.

At set of sun I made my camp,
Mid alder bushes thick and damp,
And at the dawn resumed my tramp.

I reached the meeting-place at eight,
But, though no laggard, I came too late—
They had not thought for me to wait.

Oh, fatal haste, so soon to stir!
Yet not the fault of Herkimer,
Who knew his foe too well to err.

Rash, headstrong men the others led,
Who mocked at what the General said,
And heaped contumely on his head.

"You know not what you seek," he cried;
"Those are but fools who foes deride;
"And prudence dwells with courage tried.

"My messenger left at set of sun;
"When once his errand has been done,
"Will sound Fort Schuyler's signal-gun.

"Wait till that cannon's voice you hear,
"And then we'll fall upon their rear,
"As Gansevoort to their van draws near."

Said Colonel Paris then, "Not so!
"We left our homes to strike a blow;
"So lead us quickly to the foe.

Willett, who acted such an important part at Oriskany, for which a sword was presented to him by Congress, was a native of Jamaica, Long Island. He was elected Mayor of New York in 1807; in 1824 he was President of the Electoral College of the State. He died in 1830, aged ninety-one years.

The sketch of the Battle-Field was made in 1848, by Mr. Lossing, for his "Field-Book of the Revolution." The frame-work in the centre of the picture is the remains of the platform erected for the speakers at the celebration held upon the battle-ground in 1844. Fifteen thousand people were collected. The principal speakers were Hon. D. S. Dickinson and Hon. John A. Dix, recently appointed Major-General of the United States Army. The platform was erected on the spot where Herkimer fell. A dark spot in the centre of the field behind indicates the place where the beech-tree stood, under which the wounded General sat when delivering his orders. The Indian ambush was placed upon the high ground in the middle of which the barn now stands. The hottest part of the fight took place upon the high plain between the ravine in the fore-ground and another ravine farther to the right.

THE BATTLE-GROUND AT ORISKANY.

"Else all may see those do not err
 "Who brand you as a coward cur
 "And skulking Tory, Herkimer."

But Herkimer only smiled at first—
 He knew those merely words at worst
 That from hot-headed rashness burst.

"I have been placed your path to guide,
 "And shall I lead you then," he cried,
 "To the jaws of ruin gaping wide?"

But Cox replied, "This talk is vain;
 "If Herkimer fears he may be slain,
 "Let him in safety here remain."

Flashed Herkimer's eyes with fire at this,
 And sank his voice to an angry hiss—
 "Such shafts," he cried, "my honor miss.

"March on! but if I judge aright,
 "You'll find when comes our foe in sight,
 "The loudest boaster first in flight."

And so they were marching through a glen Not far from the mouth of Oriskany, when I overtook their hindmost men.

I saw Dirck Bergen's honest face
 Among the rest; he had reached the place
 An hour before me in the race.

He wrung my hand and told me all—
 "Look out," said he, "for a rain of ball,
 "And the thickest shower that well can fall.

"For Brant is watching round about,
 "And long ere this by many a scout
 "He knows his foes are armed and out.

"We'll have it heavily, by-and-by;
 "But that's no matter—one can but die—
 "And safer it is to fight than fly."

I laughed a little my fear to hide;
 But I felt my memory backward glide
 To the home I left on the river-side.

I saw that cabin of logs once more,
 The ceiling low and the sanded floor,
 And my wife the cradle leaning o'er.

I saw her bending with girlish grace,
 And I knew the mother was trying to trace
 The father's look in the infant's face.

The house-dog pricked his watchful ear—
 He heard some traveler passing near—
 She listened my coming step to hear.

But soon dispersed that pleasant scene,
 And I glanced with vision clear and keen
 Through the close-set boughs of the forest green.

A deep ravine was in our way,
 Marshy and damp, and o'er it lay
 A causeway formed of logs and clay.

The spot was pleasant—stilly down
 Fell forest shadows cool and brown,
 From branch and bough and lofty crown.

Fringing the fore-ground of the scene,
 I saw the slender birches lean
 Lovingly o'er the tussocks green.

The leaves were thickly set o'erhead,
 The low-growth dense around was spread—
 But suddenly filled my heart with dread.

A sight, a sound the soul to shock—
 A dark face, peering past a rock,
 The clicking of a rifle lock.

Forth from a jet of fiery red
 Leapt to its mark the deadly lead—
 Dirck Bergen fell beside me dead.

To life the sleeping echoes woke,
 As from each rock and tree there broke
 A flash of fire, a wreath of smoke.

Then rang around us yell on yell,
 As though the very fiends of hell
 Had risen in that gloomy dell.

And though the foe we scarce could see,
 Still from each bush and rock and tree
 He poured his fire incessantly.

From a sheltering trunk I glanced around—
 Dying and dead bestrewed the ground,
 Though some by flight scant safety found.

Ay, flight! as Herkimer had said,
 Appalled at blood-drops raining red,
 The rear-guard all like dastards fled.

But Herkimer blenched not—clearer then
 His accents rang throughout the glen,
 Cheering the spirits of his men.

And though his horse was slain, and he
 Was wounded sorely in the knee,
 A cooler man there could not be.

He was not chafed nor stirred the least.
 But, gay as a guest at a wedding-feast,
 He bade them strip his dying beast.

A famous seat the saddle made
 Beneath a beech-tree's spreading shade,
 From whence the battle he surveyed.

All through the hottest of the fight
 He sat there with his pipe alight,
 And gave his orders left and right.

Whoever could gaze at him and flee,
 The basest of poltroons would be—
 The sight chased every fear from me.

None shrank the foe, though sore bested.
 Each from his tree the bullet sped,
 And paid them back with dead for dead.

The battle-shout, the dying groan,
 The hatchet's crash, the rifle's tone,
 Mixed with the wounded's painful moan.

Full many a stout heart bounding light,
 Full many a dark eye beaming bright,
 Were still'd in death, and closed in night.

I was not idle through the fray;
But there was one alone that day
I had a fierce desire to slay.

I had seen the face and marked it well,
That peered from the rock when Bergen fell;
And I watched for that at every yell.

No hound on scent more rapt could be,
As I scanned the fight from behind the tree;
And five I slew, but neither was he.

At length I saw a warrior brain
A neighbor's son, young Andrew Lane,
And stoop to scalp the fallen slain.

'Twas he! my brain to throb began,
My eager hands to the gun-stock ran,
And I dropped fresh priming in the pan.

His savage work was speedily through;
He raised and gave the scalp-halloo;
Sure aim I took, and the trigger drew.

Off to its mark the bullet sped;
Leapt from his breast a current red;
And the slayer of honest Dirck was dead.

Upon us closer now they came;
We formed in circles walled with flame,
Which way they moved our front the same.

Sore galled and thinned came Butler's men,
With a bayonet charge to clear the glen,
And gallantly we met them then.

Our wrath upon the curs to deal,
There, hand to hand and steel to steel,
We made their close-set column reel.

Fiercely we fought 'mid fire and smoke,
With rifle shot and hatchet stroke,
When over our heads the thunder broke.

And I have heard the oldest say
That ne'er before that bloody day
Such storm was known as stopped our fray.

'Twas one of the cloud-king's victories—
Down came the rain in gusty seas,
Driving us under the heaviest trees.

But short the respite that we got;
The rain and thunder lasted not,
And strife again grew fierce and hot.

At the foot of a bank I took my stand,
To pick out a man from a coming band,
When I felt on my throat a foeman's hand.

At the tightening grasp my eyes grew dim;
But I saw 'twas a Mingo, stout of limb,
And fierce was the struggle I made with him.

Deep peril hung upon my life;
My foot gave way in the fearful strife;
The wretch was o'er me with his knife.

In my hair his eager fingers played;
I felt the keen edge of his blade;
But I struggled the harder undismayed.

I had sunk before his deadly blow,
When suddenly o'er me fell my foe—
A friendly ball had laid him low.

The Mohawks wavered—Brant in vain
Would bring them to the charge again,
For the chiefest of their braves were slain.

We heard a firing far away
In the distance where Fort Schuyler lay—
'Twas Willett with Johnson making play.

Advancing then with friendly cries,
A band of patriots met our eyes—
The Tories of Johnson in disguise.

They came as though to aid our band,
With cheerful front and friendly hand—
An artful trick and ably planned.

We hailed their coming with a cheer;
But the keen eye of Gardinier Saw through their mask as they drew near.

"They think," he cried, "by tricks like these "To lock our sense, and bear the keys—
"Look! those are Johnson's Refugees!"

A deadly purpose in us rose;
There might be quarter for our foes
Of Mingo breed, but none for those.

For cabins fired, and old men slain,
And outraged women pleading vain,
Cried vengeance on those sons of Cain.

A hurtling volley made to tell,
And then, with one wild, savage yell,
Resistless on their ranks we fell.

The Mohawks see their allies die;
Dismayed, they raise the warning cry
Of "Oonah!" then they break and fly.

A panic seized the startled foe;
They show no front, they strike no blow,
As through the forest in rout they go.

We could not follow—weak and worn
We stood upon the field that morn;
Never was triumph so forlorn.

For of our band who fought that day
One half or dead or wounded lay,
When closed that fierce and fearful fray.

And on that field, ere daylight's close,
We buried our dead, but mourned not those
We laid to rest beside our foes.

Revenge, not grief our souls possess—
We heaped the earth upon each breast,
And left our brothers to their rest.

CHAPTER XIII.

GUILTY, OR NOT GUILTY.

UNFORTUNATELY for Mr. Furnival, the intruder was Mrs. Furnival—whether he pleased or whether he did not please. There she was in his law chamber, present in the flesh, a sight pleasing neither to her husband nor to her husband's client. She had knocked at the outside door, which, in the absence of the fag, had been opened by Mr. Crabwitz, and had immediately walked across the passage toward her husband's room, expressing her knowledge that Mr. Furnival was within. Mr. Crabwitz had all the will in the world to stop her progress, but he found that he lacked the power to stay it for a moment.

The advantages of matrimony are many and great—so many and so great that all men, doubtless, ought to marry. But even matrimony may have its drawbacks; among which unconcealed and undeserved jealousy on the part of the wife is perhaps as disagreeable as any. What is a man to do when he is accused before the world—before any small fraction of the world—of making love to some lady of his acquaintance? What is he to say? What way is he to look? “My love, I didn't. I never did, and wouldn't think of it for worlds. I say it with my hand on my heart. There is Mrs. Jones herself, and I appeal to her.” He is reduced to that! But should any innocent man be so reduced by the wife of his bosom?

I am speaking of undeserved jealousy, and it may therefore be thought that my remarks do not apply to Mrs. Furnival. They do apply to her as much as to any woman. That general idea as to the strange goddesses was on her part no more than a suspicion; and all women who so torment themselves and their husbands may plead as much as she could. And for this peculiar idea as to Lady Mason she had no ground whatever. Lady Mason may have had her faults, but a propensity to rob Mrs. Furnival of her husband's affections had not hitherto been one of them. Mr. Furnival was a clever lawyer, and she had great need of his assistance; therefore she had come to his chambers, and therefore she had placed her hand in his. That Mr. Furnival liked his client because she was good-looking may be true. I like my horse, my picture, the view from my study window for the same reason. I am inclined to think that there was nothing more in it than that.

“My dear!” said Mr. Furnival, stepping a little back, and letting his hands fall to his sides. Lady Mason also took a step backward, and then with considerable presence of mind recovered herself, and put out her hand to greet Mrs. Furnival.

“How do you do, Lady Mason?” said Mrs.

Furnival, without any presence of mind at all. “I hope I have the pleasure of seeing you very well. I did hear that you were to be in town—shopping; but I did not for a moment expect the—gratification of finding you here.” And every word that the dear, good, heart-sore woman spoke told the tale of her jealousy as plainly as though she had flown at Lady Mason's cap with all the bold, demonstrative energy of Spitalfields or St. Giles.

“I came up on purpose to see Mr. Furnival about some unfortunate law business,” said Lady Mason.

“Oh, indeed! Your son Lucius did say—shopping.”

“Yes; I told him so. When a lady is unfortunate enough to be driven to a lawyer for advice, she does not wish to make it known. I should be very sorry if my dear boy were to guess that I had this new trouble; or, indeed, if any one were to know it. I am sure that I shall be as safe with you, dear Mrs. Furnival, as I am with your husband.” And she stepped up to the angry matron, looking earnestly into her face.

To a true tale of woman's sorrow Mrs. Furnival's heart could be as soft as snow under the noonday sun. Had Lady Mason gone to her and told her all her fears and all her troubles, sought counsel and aid from her, and appealed to her motherly feelings, Mrs. Furnival would have been urgent night and day in persuading her husband to take up the widow's case. She would have bade him work his very best without fee or reward, and would herself have shown Lady Mason the way to Old Square, Lincoln's Inn. She would have been discreet too, speaking no word of idle gossip to any one. When he, in their happy days, had told his legal secrets to her, she had never gossiped, had never spoken an idle word concerning them. And she would have been constant to her friend, giving great consolation in the time of trouble, as one woman can console another. The thought that all this might be so did come across her for a moment, for there was innocence written in Lady Mason's eyes. But then she looked at her husband's face; and as she found no innocence there her heart was again hardened. The woman's face could lie—“the faces of such women are all lies,” Mrs. Furnival said to herself—but in her presence his face had been compelled to speak the truth.

“Oh dear, no; I shall say nothing of course,” she said. “I am quite sorry that I intruded. Mr. Furnival, as I happened to be in Holborn—at Mudie's for some books—I thought I would come down and ask whether you intend to dine at home to-day. You said nothing about it either last night or this morning; and nowadays one really does not know how to manage in such matters.”

"I told you that I should return to Birmingham this afternoon; I shall dine there," said Mr. Furnival, very sulkily.

"Oh, very well. I certainly knew that you were going out of town. I did not at all expect that you would remain at home; but I thought that you might, perhaps, like to have your dinner before you went. Good-morning, Lady Mason; I hope you may be successful in your—lawsuit." And then, courtesying to her husband's client, she prepared to withdraw.

"I believe I have said all that I need say, Mr. Furnival," said Lady Mason; "so that if Mrs. Furnival wishes—" And she also gathered herself up as though she were ready to leave the room.

"I hardly know what Mrs. Furnival wishes," said the husband.

"My wishes are nothing," said the wife, "and I really am quite sorry that I came in." And then she did go, leaving her husband and the woman of whom she was jealous once more alone together. Upon the whole, I think that Mr. Furnival was right in not going home that day to his dinner.

As the door closed somewhat loudly behind the angry lady—Mr. Crabwitz having rushed out hardly in time to moderate the violence of the slam—Lady Mason and her imputed lover were left looking at each other. It was certainly hard upon Lady Mason, and so she felt it. Mr. Furnival was fifty-five, and endowed with a bluish nose; and she was over forty, and had lived for twenty years as a widow without incurring a breath of scandal.

"I hope I have not been to blame," said Lady Mason in a soft, sad voice; "but perhaps Mrs. Furnival specially wished to find you alone."

"No, no; not at all."

"I shall be so unhappy if I think that I have been in the way. If Mrs. Furnival wished to speak to you on business I am not surprised that she should be angry, for I know that barristers do not usually allow themselves to be troubled by their clients in their own chambers."

"Nor by their wives," Mr. Furnival might have added, but he did not.

"Do not mind it," he said; "it is nothing. She is the best-tempered woman in the world; but at times it is impossible to answer even for the best tempered."

"I will trust you to make my peace with her."

"Yes, of course; she will not think of it after to-day; nor must you, Lady Mason."

"Oh no; except that I would not for the world be the cause of annoyance to my friends. Sometimes I am almost inclined to think that I will never trouble any one again with my sorrows, but let things come and go as they may. Were it not for poor Lucius I should do so."

Mr. Furnival, looking into her face, perceived that her eyes were full of tears. There could be no doubt as to their reality. Her eyes were full of genuine tears, brimming over and running down; and the lawyer's heart was melted. "I do not know why you should say so," he said. "I do not think your friends begrudge any little trouble they may take for you. I am sure at least that I may so say for myself."

"You are too kind to me; but I do not on that account the less know how much it is I ask of you."

"The labor we delight in physics pain," said Mr. Furnival, gallantly. "But, to tell the truth, Lady Mason, I can not understand why you should be so much out of heart. I remember well how brave and constant you were twenty years ago when there really was cause for trembling."

"Ah, I was younger then."

"So the almanac tells us; but if the almanac did not tell us I should never know it. We are all older, of course. Twenty years does not go by without leaving its marks, as I can feel myself."

"Men do not grow old as women do, who live alone and gather rust as they feed on their own thoughts."

"I know no one whom time has touched so lightly as yourself, Lady Mason; but if I may speak to you as a friend—"

"If you may not, Mr. Furnival, who may?"

"I should tell you that you are weak to be so despondent, or rather so unhappy."

"Another lawsuit would kill me, I think. You say that I was brave and constant before, but you can not understand what I suffered. I nerved myself to bear it, telling myself that it was the first duty that I owed to the babe that was lying on my bosom. And when standing there in the Court, with that terrible array around me, with the eyes of all men on me, the eyes of men who thought that I had been guilty of so terrible a crime, for the sake of that child who was so weak I could be brave. But it nearly killed me. Mr. Furnival, I could not go through that again; no, not even for his sake. If you can save me from that, even though it be by the buying off of that ungrateful man—"

"You must not think of that."

"Must I not? ah me!"

"Will you tell Lucius all this, and let him come to me?"

"No; not for worlds. He would defy every one and glory in the fight; but after all it is I that must bear the brunt. No; he shall not know it—unless it becomes so public that he must know it."

And then, with some further pressing of the hand, and further words of encouragement which were partly tender as from the man, and partly forensic as from the lawyer, Mr. Furnival permitted her to go, and she found her son at the chemist's shop in Holborn as she had appointed. There were no traces of tears or of sorrow in her face as she smiled on Lucius while giving him her hand, and then when they were in a cab together she asked him as to his success at Liverpool.

"I am very glad that I went," said he, "very glad indeed. I saw the merchants there who are the real importers of the article, and I have made arrangements with them."

"Will it be cheaper so, Lucius?"

"Cheaper! not what women generally call cheaper. If there be any thing on earth that I hate, it is a bargain. A man who looks for bargains must be a dupe or a cheat, and is probably both."

"Both, Lucius. Then he is doubly unfortunate."

"He is a cheat because he wants things for less than their value; and a dupe because, as a matter of course, he does not get what he wants. I made no bargain at Liverpool, at least no cheap bargain; but I have made arrangements for a sufficient supply of a first-rate unadulterated article at its proper market-price, and I do not fear but the results will be remunerative." And then, as they went home in the railway carriage the mother talked to her son about his farming as though she had forgotten her other trouble, and she explained to him how he was to dine with Sir Peregrine.

"I shall be delighted to dine with Sir Peregrine," said Lucius, "and very well pleased to have an opportunity of talking to him about his own way of managing his land; but, mother, I will not promise to be guided by so very old-fashioned a professor."

Mr. Furnival, when he was left alone, sat thinking over the interview that had passed. At first, as was most natural, he bethought himself of his wife; and I regret to say that the love which he bore to her, and the gratitude which he owed to her, and the memory of all that they had suffered and enjoyed together, did not fill his heart with thoughts toward her as tender as they should have done. A black frown came across his brow as he meditated on her late intrusion, and he made some sort of resolve that that kind of thing should be prevented for the future. He did not make up his mind how he would prevent it—a point which husbands sometimes overlook in their marital resolutions. And then, instead of counting up her virtues, he counted up his own. Had he not given her every thing; a house such as she had not dreamed of in her younger days? servants, carriages, money, comforts, and luxuries of all sorts? He had begrudged her nothing, had let her have her full share of all his hard-earned gains; and yet she could be ungrateful for all this, and allow her head to be filled with whims and fancies as though she were a young girl—to his great annoyance and confusion. He would let her know that his chambers, his law chambers, should be private even from her. He would not allow himself to become a laughing-stock to his own clerks and his own brethren through the impertinent folly of a woman who owed to him every thing; and so on! I regret to say that he never once thought of those lonely evenings in Harley Street, of those long days which the poor woman was doomed to pass without the only companionship which was valuable to her. He never thought of that vow which they had both made at the altar, which she had kept so loyally, and which required of him a cherishing, comforting, enduring love. It never occurred to him that in denying her this he as much broke his promise to her as though he had taken to himself in very truth some strange goddess, leaving his wedded wife with a cold ceremony of alimony or such like. He had been open-handed to her as regards money, and therefore she ought not to be troublesome! He had done his duty by her, and therefore he would not permit her to be troublesome! Such, I regret to say, were his thoughts and resolutions as he sat thinking and resolving about Mrs. Furnival.

And then, by degrees, his mind turned away to that other lady, and they became much more tender. Lady Mason was certainly both interesting and comely in her grief. Her color could still come and go, her hand was still soft and small, her hair was still brown and smooth. There were no wrinkles in her brow though care had passed over it; her step could still fall lightly, though it had borne a heavy weight of sorrow. I fear that he made a wicked comparison—a comparison that was wicked although it was made unconsciously.

But by degrees he ceased to think of the woman and began to think of the client, as he was in duty bound to do. What was the real truth of all this? Was it possible that she should be alarmed in that way because a small country attorney had told his wife that he had found some old paper, and because the man had then gone off to Yorkshire? Nothing could be more natural than her anxiety, supposing her to be aware of some secret which would condemn her if discovered; but nothing more unnatural if there were no such secret. And she must know! In her bosom, if in no other, must exist the knowledge whether or no that will were just. If that will were just, was it possible that she should now tremble so violently, seeing that its justice had been substantially proved in various courts of law? But if it were not just—if it were a forgery, a forgery made by her, or with her cognizance—and that now this truth was to be made known! How terrible would that be! But terrible is not the word which best describes the idea as it entered Mr. Furnival's mind. How wonderful would it be; how wonderful would it all have been! By whose hand in such case had those signatures been traced? Could it be possible that she, soft, beautiful, graceful as she was now, all but a girl as she had then been, could have done it, unaided—by herself?—that she could have sat down in the still hour of the night, with that old man on one side and her baby in his cradle on the other, and forged that will, signatures and all, in such a manner as to have carried her point for twenty years—so skillfully as to have baffled lawyers and jurymen and resisted the eager greed of her cheated kinsman? If so, was it not all wonderful! Had she not been a woman worthy of wonder!

And then Mr. Furnival's mind, keen and almost unerring at seizing legal points, went eagerly to work, considering what new evidence might now be forthcoming. He remembered at once the circumstances of those two chief witnesses, the clerk who had been so muddle-headed, and the servant-girl who had been so clear. They had certainly witnessed some deed, and they had done so on that special day. If there had been a fraud, if there had been a forgery, it had been so clever as almost to merit protection! But if there had been such fraud, the nature of the means by which it might be detected became plain to the mind of the barrister—plainer to him without knowledge of any circumstances than it had done to Mr. Mason after many of such circumstances had been explained to him.

But it was impossible. So said Mr. Furnival to himself, out loud—speaking out loud in order that he might convince himself. It was impossible, he said again; but he did not convince himself. Should he ask her? No; it was not on the cards that he should do that. And, perhaps, if a further trial were forthcoming, it might be better for her sake that he should be ignorant. And then, having declared again that it was impossible, he rang his bell. “Crabwitz,” said he, without looking at the man, “just step over to Bedford Row, with my compliments, and learn what is Mr. Round’s present address—old Mr. Round, you know.”

Mr. Crabwitz stood for a moment or two with the door in his hand, and Mr. Furnival, going back to his own thoughts, was expecting the man’s departure. “Well,” he said, looking up and seeing that his myrmidon still stood there.

Mr. Crabwitz was not in a very good humor, and had almost made up his mind to let his master know that such was the case. Looking at his own general importance in the legal world, and the inestimable services which he had rendered to Mr. Furnival, he did not think that that gentleman was treating him well. He had been summoned back to his dingy chamber almost without an excuse, and now that he was in London was not permitted to join even for a day the other wise men of the law who were assembled at the great congress. For the last four days his heart had been yearning to go to Birmingham, but had yearned in vain; and now his master was sending him about town as though he were an errand-lad.

“Shall I step across to the lodge and send the porter’s boy to Round and Crook’s?” asked Mr. Crabwitz.

“The porter’s boy! no; go yourself; you are not busy. Why should I send the porter’s boy on my business?” The fact probably was, that Mr. Furnival forgot his clerk’s age and standing. Crabwitz had been ready to run any where when his employer had first known him, and Mr. Furnival did not perceive the change.

“Very well, Sir; certainly I will go if you wish it; on this occasion that is. But I hope, Sir, you will excuse my saying—”

“Saying what?”

“That I am not exactly a messenger, Sir. Of course I’ll go now, as the other clerk is not in.”

“Oh, you’re too great a man to walk across to Bedford Row, are you? Give me my hat, and I’ll go.”

“Oh no, Mr. Furnival, I did not mean that. I’ll step over to Bedford Row, of course—only I did think—”

“Think what?”

“That perhaps I was entitled to a little more respect, Mr. Furnival. It’s for your sake as much as my own that I speak, Sir; but if the gentlemen in the Lane see me sent about like a lad of twenty, Sir, they’ll think—”

“What will they think?”

“I hardly know what they’ll think, but I know it will be very disagreeable, Sir—very disagreeable to my feelings. I did think, Sir, that perhaps—”

“I’ll tell you what it is, Crabwitz, if your situation here does not suit you, you may leave it to-morrow. I shall have no difficulty in finding another man to take your place.”

“I am sorry to hear you speak in that way, Mr. Furnival, very sorry—after fifteen years, Sir—”

“You find yourself too grand to walk to Bedford Row!”

“Oh no. I’ll go now, of course, Mr. Furnival.” And then Mr. Crabwitz did go, meditating as he went many things to himself. He knew his own value, or thought that he knew it; and might it not be possible to find some patron who would appreciate his services more justly than did Mr. Furnival?

CHAPTER XIV.

DINNER AT THE CLEEVE.

LADY MASON on her return from London found a note from Mrs. Orme asking both her and her son to dine at The Cleeve on the following day. As it had been already settled between her and Sir Peregrine that Lucius should dine there in order that he might be talked to respecting his mania for guano the invitation could not be refused; but as for Lady Mason herself, she would much have preferred to remain at home.

Indeed, her uneasiness on that guano matter had been so outweighed by worse uneasiness from another source, that she had become, if not indifferent, at any rate tranquil on the subject. It might be well that Sir Peregrine should preach his sermon, and well that Lucius should hear it; but for herself it would, she thought, have been more comfortable for her to eat her dinner alone. She felt, however, that she could not do so. Any amount of tedium would be better than the danger of offering a slight to Sir Peregrine, and therefore she wrote a pretty little note to say that both of them would be at The Cleeve at seven.

“Lucius, my dear, I want you to do me a great favor,” she said, as she sat by her son in the Hamworth fly.

“A great favor, mother! of course I will do any thing for you that I can.”

“It is that you will bear with Sir Peregrine to-night.”

“Bear with him! I do not know exactly what you mean. Of course I will remember that he is an old man, and not answer him as I would one of my own age.”

“I am sure of that, Lucius, because you are a gentleman. As much forbearance as that a young man, if he be a gentleman, will always show to an old man. But what I ask is something more than that. Sir Peregrine has been farming all his life.”

“Yes; and see what are the results! He has three or four hundred acres of uncultivated land on his estate, all of which would grow wheat."

"I know nothing about that," said Lady Mason.

"Ah, but that's the question. My trade is to be that of a farmer, and you are sending me to school. Then comes the question, Of what sort is the schoolmaster?"

"I am not talking about farming now, Lucius."

"But he will talk of it."

"And can not you listen to him without contradicting him—for my sake? It is of the greatest consequence to me—of the very greatest, Lucius, that I should have the benefit of Sir Peregrine's friendship."

"If he would quarrel with you because I chanced to disagree with him about the management of land, his friendship would not be worth having."

"I do not say that he will do so; but I am sure you can understand that an old man may be tender on such points. At any rate I ask it from you as a favor. You can not guess how important it is to me to be on good terms with such a neighbor."

"It is always so in England," said Lucius, after pausing for a while. "Sir Peregrine is a man of family, and a baronet; of course all the world, the world of Hamworth that is, should bow down at his feet. And I too must worship the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Fashion, has set up!"

"Lucius, you are unkind to me."

"No, mother, not unkind; but like all men, I would fain act in such matters as my own judgment may direct me."

"My friendship with Sir Peregrine Orme has nothing to do with his rank; but it is of importance to me that both you and I should stand well in his sight." There was nothing more said on the matter; and then they got down at the front door, and were ushered through the low wide hall into the drawing-room.

The three generations of the family were there—Sir Peregrine, his daughter-in-law, and the heir. Lucius Mason had been at The Cleeve two or three times since his return from Germany, and on going there had always declared to himself that it was the same to him as though he were going into the house of Mrs. Arkwright, the doctor's widow at Hamworth—or even into the kitchen of Farmer Greenwood. He rejoiced to call himself a democrat, and would boast that rank could have no effect on him. But his boast was an untrue boast, and he could not carry himself at The Cleeve as he would have done and did in Mrs. Arkwright's little drawing-room. There was a majesty in the manner of Sir Peregrine which did awe him; there were tokens of birth and a certain grace of manner about Mrs. Orme which kept down his assumption; and even with young Peregrine he found that though he might be equal he could by no means be more than equal. He had learned more than Peregrine Orme, had ten times more knowledge in his head, had read books of which Peregrine did not even know the names and probably never would know them; but on his side also young Orme possessed something which the other wanted. What that something might be Lucius Mason did not at all understand.

Mrs. Orme got up from her corner on the sofa to greet her friend, and with a soft smile and two or three all but whispered words, led her forward to the fire. Mrs. Orme was not a woman given to much speech or endowed with outward warmth of manners, but she could make her few words go very far; and then the pressure of her hand, when it was given, told more than a whole embrace from some other women. There are ladies who always kiss their female friends, and always call them "dear." In such cases one can not but pity her who is so bekissed. Mrs. Orme did not kiss Lady Mason, nor did she call her dear; but she smiled sweetly as she uttered her greeting, and looked kindness out of her marvelously blue eyes; and Lucius Mason, looking on over his mother's shoulders, thought that he would like to have her for his friend in spite of her rank. If Mrs. Orme would give him a lecture on farming it might be possible to listen to it without contradiction; but there was no chance for him in that respect. Mrs. Orme never gave lectures to any one on any subject.

"So, Master Lucius, you have been to Liverpool, I hear," said Sir Peregrine.

"Yes, Sir; I returned yesterday."

"And what is the world doing at Liverpool?"

"The world is wide awake there, Sir."

"Oh, no doubt; when the world has to make money it is always wide awake. But men sometimes may be wide awake and yet make no money—may be wide awake, or at any rate think that they are so."

"Better that, Sir Peregrine, than willfully go to sleep when there is so much work to be done."

"A man when he's asleep does no harm," said Sir Peregrine.

"What a comfortable doctrine to think of when the servant comes with the hot water at eight o'clock in the morning!" said his grandson.

"It is one that you study very constantly, I fear," said the old man, who at this time was on excellent terms with his heir. There had been no apparent hankering after rats since that last compact had been made, and Peregrine had been doing great things with the H. H.; winning golden opinions from all sorts of sportsmen, and earning a great reputation for a certain young mare which had been bred by Sir Peregrine himself. Foxes are vermin as well as rats, as Perry in his wickedness had remarked; but a young man who can break an old one's heart by a predilection for rat-catching may win it as absolutely and irretrievably by prowess after a fox. Sir Peregrine had told to four different neighbors how a fox had been run into, in the open, near Alston, after twelve desperate miles, and how on that occasion Peregrine had been in at the death with the huntsman and only one other.

"And the mare, you know, is only four years old and hardly half trained," said Sir Peregrine, with great exultation. "The young scamp, to have ridden her in that way!" It may be doubted whether he would have been a prouder man or said more about it if his grandson had taken honors.

And then the gong sounded, and Sir Peregrine led Lady Mason into the dining-room. Lucius, who as we know thought no more of the Ormes than of the Joneses and Smiths, paused in his awe before he gave his arm to Mrs. Orme; and when he did so he led her away in perfect silence, though he would have given any thing to be able to talk to her as he went. But he be-thought himself that unfortunately he could find nothing to say. And when he sat down it was not much better. He had not dined at The Cleeve before, and I am not sure whether the butler in plain clothes and the two men in livery did not help to create his confusion—in spite of his well-digested democratic ideas.

The conversation during dinner was not very bright. Sir Peregrine said a few words now and again to Lady Mason, and she replied with a few others. On subjects which did not absolutely appertain to the dinner, she perhaps was the greatest talker; but even she did not say much. Mrs. Orme, as a rule, never spoke unless she were spoken to in any company consisting of more than herself and one other; and young Peregrine seemed to imagine that carving at the top of the table, asking people if they would take stewed beef, and eating his own dinner, were occupations quite sufficient for his energies. "Have a bit more beef, Mason, do. If you will, I will." So far he went in conversation, but no farther while his work was still before him.

When the servants were gone it was a little better, but not much. "Mason, do you mean to hunt this season?" Peregrine asked.

"No," said the other.

"Well, I would if I were you. You will never know the fellows about here unless you do."

"In the first place, I can't afford the time," said Lucius; "and, in the next place, I can't afford the money." This was plucky on his part, and it was felt to be so by every body in the room; but perhaps, had he spoken all the truth, he would have said also that he was not accustomed to horsemanship.

"To a fellow who has a place of his own, as you have, it costs nothing," said Peregrine.

"Oh, does it not?" said the baronet; "I used to think differently."

"Well, not so much, I mean, as if you had every thing to buy. Besides, I look upon Mason as a sort of Croesus. What on earth has he got to do with his money? And then as to time—upon my word I don't understand what a man means when he says he has not got time for hunting."

"Lucius intends to be a farmer," said his mother.

"So do I," said Peregrine. "By Jove, I should think so. If I had two hundred acres of land in my own hand I should not want any thing else in the world, and would never ask any one for a shilling."

"If that be so, I might make the best bargain at once that ever a man made," said the baronet. "If I might take you at your word, Master Perry—"

"Pray don't talk of it, Sir," said Mrs. Orme.

"You may be quite sure of this, my dear—that I shall not do more than talk of it." Then Sir Peregrine asked Lady Mason if she would take any more wine; after which the ladies withdrew, and the lecture commenced.

But we will in the first place accompany the ladies into the drawing-room for a few minutes. It was hinted, in one of the first chapters of this story, that Lady Mason might have become more intimate than she had done with Mrs. Orme, had she so pleased it; and by this it will of course be presumed that she had not so pleased. All this is perfectly true. Mrs. Orme had now been living at The Cleeve the greater portion of her life, and had never while there made one really well-loved friend. She had a sister of her own, and dear old friends of her childhood, who lived far away from her in the northern counties. Occasionally she did see them, and was then very happy; but this was not frequent with her. Her sister, who was married to a peer, might stay at The Cleeve for a fortnight, perhaps once in the year; but Mrs. Orme herself seldom left her own home. She thought, and certainly not without cause, that Sir Peregrine was not happy in her absence, and therefore she never left him. Then, living there so much alone, was it not natural that her heart should desire a friend?

But Lady Mason had been living much more alone. She had no sister to come to her, even though it were but once a year. She had no intimate female friend, none to whom she could really speak with the full freedom of friendship, and it would have been delightful to have bound to her by ties of love so sweet a creature as Mrs. Orme, a widow like herself—and like herself a widow with one only son. But she, warily picking her steps through life, had learned the necessity of being cautious in all things. The countenance of Sir Peregrine had been invaluable to her, and might it not be possible that she should lose that countenance? A word or two spoken now and then again, a look not intended to be noticed, an altered tone, or perhaps a change in the pressure of the old man's hand, had taught Lady Mason to think that he might disapprove such intimacy. Probably at the moment she was right, for she was quick at reading such small signs. It behooved her to be very careful, and to indulge in no pleasure which might be costly; and therefore she had denied herself in this matter—as in so many others.

But now it had occurred to her that it might be well to change her conduct. Either she felt that Sir Peregrine's friendship for her was too confirmed to be shaken, or perhaps she fancied that she might strengthen it by means of his daughter-in-law. At any rate she resolved to accept the offer which had once been tacitly made to her, if it were still open to her to do so.

"How little changed your boy is!" she said, when they were seated near to each other, with their coffee-cups between them.

"No; he does not change quickly; and, as you say, he is a boy still in many things. I do not know whether it may not be better that it should be so."

"I did not mean to call him a boy in that sense," said Lady Mason.

"But you might; now your son is quite a man."

"Poor Lucius! yes; in his position it is necessary. His little bit of property is already his own; and then he has no one like Sir Peregrine to look out for him. Necessity makes him manly."

"He will be marrying soon, I dare say," suggested Mrs. Orme.

"Oh, I hope not. Do you think that early marriages are good for young men?"

"Yes, I think so. Why not?" said Mrs. Orme, thinking of her own year of married happiness. "Would you not wish to see Lucius marry?"

"I fancy not. I should be afraid lest I should become as nothing to him. And yet I would not have you think that I am selfish."

"I am sure that you are not that. I am sure that you love him better than all the world besides. I can feel what that is myself."

"But you are not alone with your boy as I am. If he were to send me from him, there would be nothing left for me in this world."

"Send you from him! Ah, because Orley Farm belongs to him. But he would not do that; I am sure he would not."

"He would do nothing unkind; but how could he help it if his wife wished it? But nevertheless I would not keep him single for that reason; no, nor for any reason if I knew that he wished to marry. But it would be a blow to me."

"I sincerely trust that Peregrine may marry early," said Mrs. Orme, perhaps thinking that babies were preferable either to rats or foxes.

"Yes, it would be well, I am sure, because you have ample means, and the house is large; and you would have his wife to love."

"If she were nice, it would be so sweet to have her for a daughter. I also am very much alone, though perhaps not so much as you are, Lady Mason."

"I hope not—for I am sometimes very lonely."

"I have often thought that."

"But I should be wicked beyond every thing if I were to complain, seeing that Providence has given me so much that I had no right to expect. What should I have done in my loneliness if Sir Peregrine's hand and door had never been opened to me?" And then for the next half hour the two ladies held sweet converse together, during which we will go back to the gentlemen over their wine.

"Are you drinking claret?" said Sir Peregrine, arranging himself and his bottles in the way that was usual to him. He had ever been a moderate man himself, but nevertheless he had a business-like way of going to work after dinner, as though there was a good deal to be done before the drawing-room could be visited.

"No more wine for me, Sir," said Lucius.

"No wine!" said Peregrine the elder.

"Why, Mason, you'll never get on if that's the way with you," said Peregrine the younger.

"I'll try, at any rate," said the other.

"Water-drinker, moody thinker," and Peregrine sang a word or two from an old drinking-song.

"I am not quite sure of that. We Englishmen, I suppose, are the moodiest thinkers in all the world, and yet we are not so much given to water-drinking as our lively neighbors across the Channel."

Sir Peregrine said nothing more on the subject, but he probably thought that his young friend would not be a very comfortable neighbor. His present task, however, was by no means that of teaching him to drink, and he struck off at once upon the business he had undertaken. "So your mother tells me that you are going to devote all your energies to farming."

"Hardly that, I hope. There is the land, and I mean to see what I can do with it. It is not much, and I intend to combine some other occupation with it."

"You will find that two hundred acres of land will give you a good deal to do—that is, if you mean to make money by it."

"I certainly hope to do that, in the long-run."

"It seems to me the easiest thing in the world," said Peregrine.

"You'll find out your mistake some day; but with Lucius Mason it is very important that he should make no mistake at the commencement. For a country gentleman I know no prettier amusement than experimental farming; but then a man must give up all idea of making his rent out of the land."

"I can't afford that," said Lucius.

"No; and that is why I take the liberty of speaking to you. I hope that the great friendship which I feel for your mother will be allowed to stand as my excuse."

"I am very much obliged by your kindness, Sir; I am indeed."

"The truth is, I think you are beginning wrong. You have now been to Liverpool, to buy guano, I believe."

"Yes, that and some few other things. There is a man there who has taken out a patent—"

"My dear fellow, if you lay out your money in that way, you will never see it back again. Have you considered, in the first place, what your journey to Liverpool has cost you?"

AT THE OLEIVE.

"Exactly nine and sixpence per cent. on the money that I laid out there. Now that is not much more than a penny in the pound on the sum expended; and is not for a moment to be taken into consideration in comparison with the advantage of an improved market."

There was more in this than Sir Peregrine had expected to encounter. He did not for a moment doubt the truth of his own experience, or the folly and danger of the young man's proceedings; but he did doubt his own power of proving either the one or the other to one who so accurately computed his expenses by percentages on his outlay. Peregrine opened his eyes and sat by, wondering in silence. What on earth did Mason mean by an improved market?

"I am afraid, then," said the baronet, "that you must have laid out a large sum of money."

"A man can't do any good, Sir Peregrine, by hoarding his capital. I don't think very much of capital myself—"

"Don't you?"

"Not of the theory of capital—not so much as some people do; but if a man has got it, of course it should be expended on the trade to which it is to be applied."

"But some little knowledge—some experience is perhaps desirable before any great outlay is made."

"Yes; some little knowledge is necessary—and some great knowledge would be desirable, if it were accessible; but it is not, as I take it."

"Long years, perhaps, devoted to such pursuits—"

"Yes, Sir Peregrine; I know what you are going to say. Experience, no doubt, will teach something. A man who has walked thirty miles a day for thirty years will probably know what sort of shoes will best suit his feet, and perhaps also the kind of food that will best support him through such exertion; but there is very little chance of his inventing any quicker mode of traveling."

"But he will have earned his wages honestly," said Sir Peregrine, almost angrily. In his heart he was very angry, for he did not love to be interrupted.

"Oh, yes; and if that were sufficient we might all walk our thirty miles a day. But some of us must earn wages for other people, or the world will make no progress. Civilization, as I take it, consists in efforts made not for one's self but for others."

"If you won't take any more wine we will join the ladies," said the baronet.

"He has not taken any at all," said Peregrine, filling his own glass for the last time and emptying it.

"That young man is the most conceited puppy it was ever my misfortune to meet," said Sir Peregrine to Mrs. Orme, when she came to kiss him and to take his blessing, as she always did before leaving him for the night.

"I am sorry for that," said she, "for I like his mother so much."

"I also like her," said Sir Peregrine; "but I can not say that I shall ever be very fond of her son."

"I'll tell you what, mamma," said young Peregrine, the same evening in his mother's dressing-room, "Lucius Mason was too many for the governor this evening."

"I hope he did not tease your grandfather."

"He talked him down regularly, and it was plain enough that the governor did not like it."

And then the day was over.

CHAPTER XV.

A MORNING CALL AT MOUNT PLEASANT VILLA.

ON the following day Lady Mason made two visits, using her new vehicle for the first time. She would fain have walked had she dared; but she would have given terrible offense to her son by doing so. He had explained to her, and with some truth, that as their joint income was now a thousand a year, she was quite entitled to such a luxury; and then he went on to say that as he had bought it for her, he should be much hurt if she would not use it. She had put it off from day to day, and now she could put it off no longer.

Her first visit was by appointment at The Cleeve. She had promised Mrs. Orme that she would come up, some special purpose having been named; but with the real idea, at any rate on the part of the latter, that they might both be more comfortable together than alone. The walk across from Orley Farm to The Cleeve had always been very dear to Lady Mason. Every step of it was over beautiful ground, and a delight in scenery was one of the few pleasures which her lot in life had permitted her to enjoy. But to-day she could not allow herself the walk. Her pleasure and delight must be postponed to her son's wishes! But then she was used to that.

She found Mrs. Orme alone, and sat with her for an hour. I do not know that any thing was said between them which deserves to be specially chronicled. Mrs. Orme, though she told her many things, did not tell her what Sir Peregrine had said as he was going up to his bedroom on the preceding evening, nor did Lady Mason say much about her son's farming. She had managed to gather from Lucius that he had not been deeply impressed by any thing that had fallen from Sir Peregrine on the subject, and therefore thought it as well to hold her tongue. She soon perceived also, from the fact of Mrs. Orme saying nothing about Lucius, that he had not left behind him any very favorable impression. This was to her cause of additional sorrow, but she knew that it must be borne. Nothing that she could say would induce Lucius to make himself acceptable to Sir Peregrine.

When the hour was over she went down again to her little carriage, Mrs. Orme coming with her to look at it, and in the hall they met Sir Peregrine.

"Why does not Lady Mason stop for lunch?" said he. "It is past half-past one. I never knew any thing so inhospitable as turning her out at this moment."

"I did ask her to stay," said Mrs. Orme.

"But I command her to stay," said Sir Peregrine, knocking his stick upon the stone floor of the hall. "And let me see who will dare to disobey me. John, let Lady Mason's carriage and pony stand in the open coach-house till she is ready." So Lady Mason went back and did remain for lunch. She was painfully anxious to maintain the best possible footing in that house, but still more anxious not to have it thought that she was intruding. She had feared that Lucius, by his offense, might have estranged Sir Peregrine against herself; but that, at any rate, was not the case.

After lunch she drove herself to Hamworth and made her second visit. On this occasion she called on one Mrs. Arkwright, who was a very old acquaintance, though hardly to be called an intimate friend. The late Mr. Arkwright—Dr. Arkwright as he used to be styled in Hamworth—had been Sir Joseph's medical attendant for many years, and therefore there had been room for an intimacy. No real friendship, that is no friendship of confidence, had sprung up; but nevertheless the doctor's wife had known enough of Lady Mason in her younger days to justify her in speaking of things which would not have been mentioned between merely ordinary acquaintance. "I am glad to see you have got promotion," said the old lady, looking out at Lady Mason's little phaeton on the gravel sweep which divided Mrs. Arkwright's house from the street. For Mrs. Arkwright's house was Mount Pleasant Villa, and therefore was entitled to a sweep.

"It was a present from Lucius," said the other, "and as such must be used. But I shall never feel myself at home in my own carriage."

"It is quite proper, my dear Lady Mason, quite proper. With his income and with yours I do not wonder that he insists upon it. It is quite proper, and just at the present moment peculiarly so."

Lady Mason did not understand this; but she would probably have passed it by without understanding it, had she not thought that there was some expression more than ordinary in Mrs. Arkwright's face. "Why peculiarly so at the present moment?" she said.

"Because it shows that this foolish report which is going about has no foundation. People won't believe it for a moment when they see you out and about, and happy-like."

"What rumor, Mrs. Arkwright?" And Lady Mason's heart sunk within her as she asked the question. She felt at once to what it must allude, though she had conceived no idea as yet that there was any rumor on the subject. Indeed, during the last forty-eight hours, since she had left the chambers of Mr. Furnival, she had been more at ease within herself than during the previous days which had elapsed subsequent to the ill-omened visit made to her by Miriam Dockwrath. It had seemed to her that Mr. Furnival anticipated no danger, and his manner and words had almost given her confidence. But now—now that a public rumor was spoken of, her heart was as low again as ever:

"Sure, haven't you heard?" said Mrs. Arkwright. "Well, I wouldn't be the first to tell you, only that I know that there is no truth in it."

"You might as well tell me now, as I shall be apt to believe worse than the truth after what you have said."

And then Mrs. Arkwright told her. "People have been saying that Mr. Mason is again going to begin those law proceedings about the farm; but I for one don't believe it."

"People have said so!" Lady Mason repeated. She meant nothing; it was nothing to her who the people were. If one said it now, all would soon be saying it. But she uttered the words because she felt herself forced to say something, and the power of thinking what she might best say was almost taken away from her.

"I am sure I don't know where it came from," said Mrs. Arkwright; "but I would not have alluded to it if I had not thought that of course you had heard it. I am very sorry if my saying it has vexed you."

"Oh no," said Lady Mason, trying to smile.

"As I said before, we all know that there is nothing in it; and your having the pony chaise just at this time will make every body see that you are quite comfortable yourself."

"Thank you, yes; good-by, Mrs. Arkwright." And then she made a great effort, feeling aware that she was betraying herself, and that it behooved her to say something which might remove the suspicion which her emotion must have created. "The very name of that lawsuit is so dreadful to me that I can hardly bear it. The memory of it is so terrible to me, that even my enemies would hardly wish that it should commence again."

"Of course it is merely a report," said Mrs. Arkwright, almost trembling at what she had done.

"That is all—at least I believe so. I had heard myself that some such threat had been made, but I did not think that any tidings of it had got abroad."

"It was Mrs. Whiting told me. She is a great busy-body, you know." Mrs. Whiting was the wife of the present doctor.

"Dear Mrs. Arkwright, it does not matter in the least. Of course I do not expect that people should hold their tongue on my account. Good-by, Mrs. Arkwright." And then she got into the little carriage, and did contrive to drive herself home to Orley Farm.

"Dear, dear, dear, dear!" said Mrs. Arkwright to herself when she was left alone. "Only to think of that; that she should be knocked in a heap by a few words—in a moment as we may say." And then she began to consider of the matter. "I wonder what there is in it! There must be something, or she would never have looked so like a ghost. What will they do if Orley Farm is taken away from them after all!" And then Mrs. Arkwright hurried out on her daily little toddle through the town, that she might talk about this and be talked to on the same subject. She was by no means an ill-natured woman, nor was she at all inclined to direct against Lady Mason any slight amount of venom which might alloy her disposition. But then the matter was of such importance? The people of Hamworth had hardly yet ceased to talk of the last Orley Farm trial; and would it not be necessary that they should talk much more if a new trial were really pending? Looking at the matter in that light, would not such a trial be a godsend to the people of Hamworth? Therefore I beg that it may not be imputed to Mrs. Arkwright as a fault that she toddled out and sought eagerly for her gossips.

Lady Mason did manage to drive herself home; but her success in the matter was more owing to the good faith and propriety of her pony than to any skillful workmanship on her own part. Her first desire had been to get away from Mrs. Arkwright, and having made that effort she was for a time hardly able to make any other. It was fast coming upon her now. Let Sir Peregrine say what comforting words he might, let Mr. Furnival assure her that she was safe with ever so much confidence, nevertheless she could not but believe, could not but feel inwardly convinced, that that which she so dreaded was to happen. It was written in the book of her destiny that there should be a new trial.

And now, from this very moment, the misery would again begin. People would point at her, and talk of her. Her success in obtaining Orley Farm for her own child would again be canvassed at every house in Hamworth; and not only her success, but the means also by which that success had been obtained. The old people would remember and the young people would inquire; and, for her, tranquillity, repose, and that retirement of life which had been so valuable to her, were all gone.

There could be no doubt that Dockwrath had spread the report immediately on his return from Yorkshire; and had she well thought of the matter she might have taken some comfort from this. Of course he would tell the story which he did tell. His confidence in being able again to drag the case before the Courts would by no means argue that others believed as he believed. In fact, the enemies now arraigned against her were only those whom she already knew to be so arraigned. But she had not sufficient command of her thoughts to be able at first to take comfort from such a reflection as this. She felt, as she was being carried home, that the world was going from her, and that it would be well for her, were it possible, that she should die.

But she was stronger when she reached her own door than she had been at Mrs. Arkwright's. There was still within her a great power of self-maintenance, if only time were allowed to her to look about and consider how best she might support herself. Many women are in this respect as she was. With forethought and summoned patience they can endure great agonies; but a sudden pang, unexpected, overwhelms them. She got out of the pony carriage with her ordinary placid face, and walked up to her own room without having given any sign that she was uneasy; and then she had to determine how she should bear herself before her son. It had been with her a great object that both Sir Peregrine and Mr. Furnival should first hear of the tidings from her, and that they should both promise her their aid when they had heard the story as she would tell it. In this she had been successful; and it now seemed to her that prudence would require her to act in the same way toward Lucius. Had it been possible to keep this matter from him altogether, she would have given much to do so; but now it would not be possible. It was clear that Mr. Dockwrath had chosen to make the matter public, acting no doubt with forethought in doing so; and Lucius would be sure to hear words which would become common in Hamworth. Difficult as the task would be to her, it would be best that she should prepare him. So she sat alone till dinner-time planning how she would do this. She had sat alone for hours in the same way planning how she would tell her story to Sir Peregrine; and again as to her second story for Mr. Furnival. Those whose withers are unwrung can hardly guess how absolutely a sore under the collar will imbitter every hour for the poor jade who is so tormented!

But she met him at dinner with a smiling face. He loved to see her smile, and often told her so, almost upbraiding her when she would look sad. Why should she be sad, seeing that she had every thing that a woman could desire? Her mind was burdened with no heavy thoughts as to feeding coming multitudes. She had no contests to wage with the desultory chemists of the age. His purpose was to work hard during the hours of the day—hard also during many hours of the night; and it was becoming that his mother should greet him softly during his few intervals of idleness. He told her so, in some words not badly chosen for such telling; and she, loving mother that she was, strove valiantly to obey him.

During dinner she could not speak to him, nor immediately after dinner. The evil moment she put off from half-hour to half-hour, still looking as though all were quiet within her bosom as she sat beside him with her book in her hand. He was again at work before she began her story: he thought at least that he was at work, for he had before him on the table both Prichard and Latham, and was occupied in making copies from some drawings of skulls which purposed to represent the cerebral development of certain of our more distant Asiatic brethren.

"Is it not singular," said he, "that the jaws of men born and bred in a hunter state should be differently formed from those of the agricultural tribes?"

"Are they?" said Lady Mason.

"Oh yes; the maxillary profile is quite different. You will see this especially with the Mongolians, among the Tartar tribes. It seems to me to be very much the same difference as that between a man and a sheep, but Prichard makes no such remark. Look here at this fellow: he must have been intended to eat nothing but flesh, and that raw, and without any knife or fork."

"I don't suppose they had many knives or forks."

"By close observation I do not doubt that one could tell from a single tooth not only what food the owner of it had been accustomed to eat, but what language he had spoken. I say close observation, you know. It could not be done in a day."

"I suppose not." And then the student again bent over his drawing. "You see it would have been impossible for the owner of such a jaw as that to have ground a grain of corn between his teeth, or to have masticated even a cabbage."

"Lucius," said Lady Mason, becoming courageous on the spur of the moment, "I want you to leave that for a moment and speak to me."

"Well," said he, putting down his pencil and turning round. "Here I am."

"You have heard of the lawsuit which I had with your brother when you were an infant?"

"Of course I have heard of it; but I wish you would not call that man my brother. He would not own me as such, and I most certainly would not own him. As far as I can learn, he is one of the most detestable human beings that ever existed."

"You have heard of him from an unfavorable side, Lucius; you should remember that. He is a hard man, I believe; but I do not know that he would do any thing which he thought to be unjust."

"Why, then, did he try to rob me of my property?"

"Because he thought that it should have been his own. I can not see into his breast, but I presume that it was so."

"I do not presume any thing of the kind, and never shall. I was an infant, and you were a woman—a woman at that time without many friends, and he thought that he could rob us under cover of the law. Had he been commonly honest it would have been enough for him to know what had been my father's wishes, even if the will had not been rigidly formal. I look upon him as a robber and a thief."

"I am sorry for that, Lucius, because I differ from you. What I wish to tell you now is this—that he is thinking of trying the question again."

"What! thinking of another trial now?" and Lucius Mason pushed his drawings and books from him with a vengeance.

"So I am told."

"And who told you? I can not believe it. If he intended any thing of the kind I must have been the first person to hear of it. It would be my business now, and you may be sure that he would have taken care to let me know his purpose."

And then by degrees she explained to him that the man himself, Mr. Mason of Groby, had as yet declared no such purpose. She had intended to omit all mention of the name of Mr. Dockwrath, but she was unable to do so without seeming to make a mystery with her son. When she came to explain how the rumor had arisen, and why she had thought it necessary to tell him this, she was obliged to say that it had all arisen from the wrath of the attorney. "He has been to Groby Park," she said, "and now that he has returned he is spreading this report."

"I shall go to him to-morrow," said Lucius, very sternly.

"No, no; you must not do that. You must promise me that you will not do that."

"But I shall. You can not suppose that I shall allow such a man as that to tamper with my name without noticing it! It is my business now."

"No, Lucius. The attack will be against me rather than you—that is, if an attack be made. I have told you because I do not like to have a secret from you."

"Of course you have told me. If you are attacked, who should defend you if I do not?"

"The best defense, indeed the only defense till they take some active step, will be silence. Most probably they will not do any thing, and then we can afford to live down such reports as these. You can understand, Lucius, that the matter is grievous enough to me; and I am sure that for my sake you will not make it worse by a personal quarrel with such a man as that."

"I shall go to Mr. Furnival," said he, "and ask his advice."

"I have done that already, Lucius. I thought it best to do so when first I heard that Mr. Dockwrath was moving in the matter. It was for that that I went up to town."

"And why did you not tell me?"

"I then thought that you might be spared the pain of knowing any thing of the matter. I tell you now because I hear to-day in Hamworth that people are talking on the subject. You might be annoyed, as I was just now, if the first tidings had reached you from some stranger."

He sat silent for a while, turning his pencil in his hand, and looking as though he were going to settle the matter off-hand by his own thoughts. "I tell you what it is, mother; I shall not let the burden of this fall on your shoulders. You carried on the battle before, but I must do so now. If I can trace any word of scandal to that fellow Dockwrath, I shall indict him for a libel."

"Oh, Lucius!"

"I shall, and no mistake!"

What would he have said had he known that his mother had absolutely proposed to Mr. Furnival to buy off Mr. Dockwrath's animosity, almost at any price?

CHAPTER XVI.

MR. DOCKWRATH IN BEDFORD ROW.

MR. DOCKWRATH, as he left Leeds and proceeded to join the bosom of his family, was not discontented with what he had done. It might not improbably have been the case that Mr. Mason would altogether refuse to see him, and having seen him, Mr. Mason might altogether have declined his assistance. He might have been forced as a witness to disclose his secret, of which he could make so much better a profit as a legal adviser. As it was, Mr. Mason had promised to pay him for his services, and would no doubt be induced to go so far as to give him a legal claim for payment. Mr. Mason had promised to come up to town, and had instructed the Hamworth attorney to meet him there; and under such circumstances the Hamworth attorney had but little doubt that time would produce a considerable bill of costs in his favor.

And then he thought that he saw his way to a great success. I should be painting the Devil too black were I to say that revenge was his chief incentive in that which he was doing. All our motives are mixed; and his wicked desire to do evil to Lady Mason in return for the evil which she had done to him was mingled with professional energy, and an ambition to win a cause that ought to be won—especially a cause which others had failed to win. He said to himself, on finding those names and dates among old Mr. Usbech's papers, that there was still an opportunity of doing something considerable in this Orley Farm Case, and he had made up his mind to do it. Professional energy, revenge, and money considerations would work hand in hand in this matter; and therefore, as he left Leeds in the second-class railway carriage for London, he thought over the result of his visit with considerable satisfaction.

He had left Leeds at ten, and Mr. Moulder had come down in the same omnibus to the station, and was traveling in the same train in a first-class carriage. Mr. Moulder was a man who despised the second-class, and was not slow to say so before other commercials who traveled at a cheaper rate than he did. "Hubbles and Grease," he said, "allowed him respectably, in order that he might go about their business respectable; and he wasn't going to give the firm a bad name by being seen in a second-class carriage, although the difference would go into his own pocket. That wasn't the way he had begun, and that wasn't the way he was going to end." He said nothing to Mr. Dockwrath in the morning, merely bowing in answer to that gentleman's salutation. "Hope you were comfortable last night in the back drawing-room," said Mr. Dockwrath; but Mr. Moulder in reply only looked at him.

At the Mansfield station, Mr. Kantwise, with his huge wooden boxes, appeared on the platform, and he got into the same carriage with Mr. Dockwrath. He had come on by a night train, and had been doing a stroke of business that morning. "Well, Kantwise," Moulder holloed out from his warm, well-padded seat, "doing it cheap and nasty, eh?"

"Not at all nasty, Mr. Moulder," said the other. "And I find myself among as respectable a class of society in the second-class as you do in the first; quite so—and perhaps a little better," Mr. Kantwise added, as he took his seat immediately opposite to Mr. Dockwrath. "I hope I have the pleasure of seeing you pretty bobbish this morning, Sir." And he shook hands cordially with the attorney.

"Tidy, thank you," said Dockwrath. "My company last night did not do me any harm; you may swear to that."

"Ha! ha! ha! I was so delighted that you got the better of Moulder; a domineering party, isn't he? quite terrible! For myself, I can't put up with him sometimes."

"I didn't have to put up with him last night."

"No, no; it was very good, wasn't it now? very capital, indeed. All the same I wish you'd heard Busby give us 'Beautiful Venice, City of Song!' A charming voice has Busby; quite charming." And there was a pause for a minute or so, after which Mr. Kantwise resumed the conversation. "You'll allow me to put you up one of those drawing-room sets?" he said.

"Well, I am afraid not. I don't think they are strong enough where there are children."

"Dear, dear; dear, dear; to hear you say so, Mr. Dockwrath! Why, they are made for strength. They are the very things for children, because they don't break, you know."

"But they'd bend terribly."

"By no means. They're so elastic that they always recovers themselves. I didn't show you that; but you might turn the backs of them chairs nearly down to the ground, and they will come straight again. You let me send you a set for your wife to look at. If she's not charmed with them I'll—I'll—I'll eat them."

"Women are charmed with any thing," said Mr. Dockwrath. "A new bonnet does that."

"They know what they are about pretty well, as I dare say you have found out. I'll send express to Sheffield and have a completely new set put up for you."

"For twelve seventeen six, of course?"

"Oh! dear no, Mr. Dockwrath. The lowest figure for ready money, delivered free, is fifteen ten."

"I couldn't think of paying more than Mrs. Mason."

"Ah! but that was a damaged set; it was, indeed. And she merely wanted it as a present for the curate's wife. The table was quite sprung, and the music-stool wouldn't twist."

"But you'll send them to me new?"

"New from the manufactory; upon my word we will."

"A table that you have never acted upon—have never shown off on; standing in the middle, you know?"

"Yes; upon my honor. You shall have them direct from the workshop, and sent at once; you shall find them in your drawing-room on Tuesday next."

"We'll say thirteen ten."

"I couldn't do it, Mr. Dockwrath—" And so they went on, bargaining half the way up to town, till at last they came to terms for fourteen eleven. "And a very superior article your lady will find them," Mr. Kantwise said, as he shook hands with his new friend at parting.

One day Mr. Dockwrath remained at home in the bosom of his family, saying all manner of spiteful things against Lady Mason, and on the next day he went up to town and called on Round and Crook. That one day he waited in order that Mr. Mason might have time to write; but Mr. Mason had written on the very day of the visit to Groby Park, and Mr. Round, junior, was quite ready for Mr. Dockwrath when that gentleman called.

Mr. Dockwrath when at home had again cautioned his wife to have no intercourse whatever "with that swindler at Orley Farm," wishing thereby the more thoroughly to imbue poor Miriam with a conviction that Lady Mason had committed some fraud with reference to the will. "You had better say nothing about the matter any where; d'you hear? People will talk; all the world will be talking about it before long. But that is nothing to you. If people ask you, say that you believe that I am engaged in the case professionally, but that you know nothing further." As to all which Miriam of course promised the most exact obedience. But Mr. Dockwrath, though he only remained one day in Hamworth before he went to London, took care that the curiosity of his neighbors should be sufficiently excited.

Mr. Dockwrath felt some little trepidation at the heart as he walked into the office of Messrs. Round and Crook in Bedford Row. Messrs. Round and Crook stood high in the profession, and were men who in the ordinary way of business would have had no personal dealings with such a man as Mr. Dockwrath. Had any such intercourse become necessary on commonplace subjects Messrs. Round and Crook's confidential clerk might have seen Mr. Dockwrath, but even he would have looked down upon the Hamworth attorney as from a great moral height. But now, in the matter of the Orley Farm Case, Mr. Dockwrath had determined that he would transact business only on equal terms with the Bedford Row people. The secret was his—of his finding; he knew the strength of his own position, and he would use it. But nevertheless he did tremble inwardly as he asked whether Mr. Round was within; or if not Mr. Round, then Mr. Crook.

There were at present three members in the firm, though the old name remained unaltered. The Mr. Round and the Mr. Crook of former days were still working partners—the very Round and the very Crook who had carried on the battle on the part of Mr. Mason of Groby twenty years ago; but to them had been added another Mr. Round, a son of old Round, who, though his name did not absolutely appear in the nomenclature of the firm, was, as a working man, the most important person in it. Old Mr. Round might now be said to be ornamental and communicative. He was a hale man of nearly seventy, who thought a great deal of his peaches up at Isleworth, who came to the office five times a week—not doing very much hard work, and who took the largest share in the profits. Mr. Round, senior, had enjoyed the reputation of being a sound, honorable man, but was now considered by some to be not quite sharp enough for the practice of the present day.

Mr. Crook had usually done the dirty work of the firm, having been originally a managing clerk; and he still did the same—in a small way. He had been the man to exact penalties, look after costs, and attend to any criminal business, or business partly criminal in its nature, which might chance find its way to them. But latterly in all great matters Mr. Round, junior, Mr. Matthew Round—his father was Richard—was the member of the firm on whom the world in general placed the greatest dependence. Mr. Mason's letter had in the ordinary way of business come to him, although it had been addressed to his father, and he had resolved on acting on it himself.

When Mr. Dockwrath called Mr. Round, senior, was at Birmingham, Mr. Crook was taking his annual holiday, and Mr. Round, junior, was reigning alone in Bedford Row. Instructions had been given to the clerks that if Mr. Dockwrath called he was to be shown in, and therefore he found himself seated, with much less trouble than he had expected, in the private room of Mr. Round, junior. He had expected to see an old man, and was therefore somewhat confused, not feeling quite sure that he was in company with one of the principals; but nevertheless, looking at the room, and especially at the arm-chair and carpet, he was aware that the legal gentleman who motioned him to a seat could be no ordinary clerk.

The manner of this legal gentleman was not, as Mr. Dockwrath thought, quite so ceremoniously civil as it might be, considering the important nature of the business to be transacted between them. Mr. Dockwrath intended to treat on equal terms, and so intending would have been glad to have shaken hands with his new ally at the commencement of their joint operations. But the man before him—a man younger than himself too—did not even rise from his chair. "Ah! Mr. Dockwrath," he said, taking up a letter from the table, "will you have the goodness to sit down?" And Mr. Matthew Round wheeled his own arm-chair toward the fire, stretching out his legs comfortably, and pointing to a somewhat distant seat as that intended for the accommodation of his visitor. Mr. Dockwrath seated himself in the somewhat distant seat, and deposited his hat upon the floor, not being as yet quite at home in his position; but he made up his mind as he did so that he would be at home before he left the room.

"I find that you have been down in Yorkshire with a client of ours, Mr. Dockwrath," said Mr. Matthew Round.

"Yes, I have," said he of Hamworth.

"Ah! well—; you are in the profession yourself, I believe?"

"Yes; I am an attorney."

"Would it not have been well to have come to us first?"

"No, I think not. I have not the pleasure of knowing your name, Sir."

"My name is Round—Matthew Round."

"I beg your pardon, Sir; I did not know," said Mr. Dockwrath, bowing. It was a satisfaction to him to learn that he was closeted with a Mr. Round, even if it were not the Mr. Round. "No, Mr. Round, I can't say that I should have thought of that. In the first place, I didn't know whether Mr. Mason employed any lawyer, and in the next—"

"Well, well; it does not matter. It is usual among the profession; but it does not in the least signify. Mr. Mason has written to us, and he says that you have found out something about that Orley Farm business."

"Yes; I have found out something. At least, I rather think so."

"Well, what is it, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"Ah! that's the question. It's rather a ticklish business, Mr. Round; a family affair, as I may say."

"Whose family?"

"To a certain extent my family, and to a certain extent Mr. Mason's family. I don't know how far I should be justified in laying all the facts before you—wonderful facts they are too—in an off-hand way like that. These matters have to be considered a great deal. It is not only the extent of the property. There is much more than that in it, Mr. Round."

"If you don't tell me what there is in it, I don't see what we are to do. I am sure you did not give yourself the trouble of coming up here from Hamworth merely with the object of telling us that you are going to hold your tongue."

"Certainly not, Mr. Round."

"Then what did you come to say?"

"May I ask you, Mr. Round, what Mr. Mason has told you with reference to my interview with him?"

"Yes; I will read you a part of his letter—'Mr. Dockwrath is of opinion that the will under which the estate is now enjoyed is absolutely a forgery.' I presume you mean the codicil, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"Oh yes! the codicil of course."

"And he has in his possession documents which I have not seen, but which seem to me, as described, to go far to prove that this certainly must have been the case.' And then he goes on with a description of dates, although it is clear that he does not understand the matter himself—indeed he says as much. Now of course we must see these documents before we can give our client any advice." A certain small portion of Mr. Mason's letter Mr. Round did then read, but he did not read those portions in which Mr. Mason expressed his firm determination to reopen the case against Lady Mason, and even to prosecute her for forgery if it were found that he had any thing like a fair chance of success in doing so. "I know that you were convinced," he had said, addressing himself personally to Mr. Round, senior, "that Lady Mason was acting in good faith. I was always convinced of the contrary, and am more sure of it now than ever." This last paragraph, Mr. Round, junior, had not thought it necessary to read to Mr. Dockwrath.

"The documents to which I allude are in reference to my confidential family matters; and I certainly shall not produce them without knowing on what ground I am standing."

"Of course you are aware, Mr. Dockwrath, that we could compel you."

"There, Mr. Round, I must be allowed to differ."

"It won't come to that, of course. If you have any thing worth showing, you'll show it; and if we make use of you as a witness, it must be as a willing witness."

"I don't think it probable that I shall be a witness in the matter at all."

"Ah, well; perhaps not. My own impression is that no case will be made out; that there will be nothing to take before a jury."

"There again, I must differ from you, Mr. Round."

"Oh, of course! I suppose the real fact is that it is a matter of money. You want to be paid for what information you have got. That is about the long and the short of it; eh, Mr. Dockwrath?"

"I don't know what you call the long and the short of it, Mr. Round; or what may be your way of doing business. As a professional man, of course I expect to be paid for my work—and I have no doubt that you expect the same."

"No doubt, Mr. Dockwrath; but—as you have made the comparison, I hope you will excuse me for saying so—we always wait till our clients come to us."

Mr. Dockwrath drew himself up with some intention of becoming angry, but he hardly knew how to carry it out; and then it might be a question whether anger would serve his turn. "Do you mean to say, Mr. Round, if you had found documents such as these you would have done nothing about them—that you would have passed them by as worthless?"

"I can't say that till I know what the documents are. If I found papers concerning the client of another firm, I should go to that firm if I thought that they demanded attention."

"I didn't know any thing about the firm—how was I to know?"

"Well! you know now, Mr. Dockwrath. As I understand it, our client has referred you to us. If you have any thing to say, we are ready to hear it. If you have any thing to show, we are ready to look at it. If you have nothing to say, and nothing to show—"

"Ah, but I have; only—"

"Only you want us to make it worth your while. We might as well have the truth at once. Is not that about it?"

"I want to see my way, of course."

"Exactly. And now, Mr. Dockwrath, I must make you understand that we don't do business in that way."

"Then I shall see Mr. Mason again myself."

"That you can do. He will be in town next week, and, as I believe, wishes to see you. As regards your expenses, if you can show us that you have any communication to make that is worth our client's attention, we will see that you are paid what you are out of pocket, and some fair remuneration for the time you may have lost—not as an attorney, remember, for in that light we can not regard you."

"I am every bit as much an attorney as you are."

"No doubt; but you are not Mr. Mason's attorney; and as long as it suits him to honor us with his custom, you can not be so regarded."

"That's as he pleases."

"No; it is not, Mr. Dockwrath. It is as he pleases whether he employs you or us; but it is not as he pleases whether he employs both on business of the same class. He may give us his confidence, or he may withdraw it."

"Looking at the way the matter was managed before, perhaps the latter may be the better for him."

"Excuse me, Mr. Dockwrath, for saying that that is a question I shall not discuss with you."

Upon this Mr. Dockwrath jumped from his chair and took up his hat. "Good-morning to you, Sir," said Mr. Round, without moving from his chair; "I will tell Mr. Mason that you have declined making any communication to us. He will probably know your address—if he should want it."

Mr. Dockwrath paused. Was he not about to sacrifice substantial advantage to momentary anger? Would it not be better that he should carry this impudent young London lawyer with him if it were possible? "Sir," said he, "I am quite willing to tell you all that I know of this matter at present, if you will have the patience to hear it."

"Patience, Mr. Dockwrath! Why, I am made of patience. Sit down again, Mr. Dockwrath, and think of it."

Mr. Dockwrath did sit down again, and did think of it; and it ended in his telling to Mr. Round all that he had told to Mr. Mason. As he did so, he looked closely at Mr. Round's face, but there he could read nothing. "Exactly," said Mr. Round. "The fourteenth of July is the date of both. I have taken a memorandum of that. A final deed for closing partnership, was it? I have got that down. John Kenneby and Bridget Bolster. I remember the names—witnesses to both deeds, were they? I understand; nothing about this other deed was brought up at the trial? I see the point—such as it is. John Kenneby and Bridget Bolster—both believed to be living. Oh, you can give their address, can you? Decline to do so now? Very well; it does not matter. I think I understand it all now, Mr. Dockwrath; and when we want you again you shall hear from us. Samuel Dockwrath, is it? Thank you. Good-morning. If

Mr. Mason wishes to see you he will write, of course. Good-day, Mr. Dockwrath."

And so Mr. Dockwrath went home, not quite contented with his day's work.

THE SWORD AND THE PEN.

I ADMIT it, O Major of the New York State Militia! This old pen-holder of mine, which, under Providence, gives me my daily bread, is an exceedingly humble instrument when matched against your long ramrod; and this short, thick roll of spoiled paper called MS.—this poem nine times the rejected of wary and, no doubt, wise booksellers, what is it to that spoonful of powder and that ounce of lead which, being neatly adjusted and manipulated, may be the very last ration, absolutely incapable of digestion, which some poor soldier may receive; a leaded article quite unlike mine, which, although I make them as fierce as ever I can, have never been known to kill any body or any thing except the unfortunate newspapers in which they were printed? To be sure, we men of the journals are not unmindful of our dignity; we, too, have our leading columns; we, too, make a great many charges, and, not seldom, in spite of our ninth story arsenals, are in danger of assault and the enemy's foot. All of us in the word-war have been wounded in our feelings; and some of us in the other way! And do we not call that conglomeration of bunting and brass bands, and bellowing and incessant bull-dog brilliancy of the leading article description—do we not call it "a campaign?"—crying out: "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" "Strike for your altars and your fires!" "Come as the waves come!"—emitting other senile slogans and flaming formulas of placard-patriotism; legitimate heir-looms of fierce Anglo-Saxon turbulence; nay, of wild "irrepressible" Greek canvasses, likened of Solon to a sea lashed into fury by the wind of orators? Old John Zisca's skin made a good drum-head enough; but what was all its noise compared with the never ending, still beginning, devil's tattoo of The Daily Tambour, price only two cents, and clubs furnished upon the usual terms? Who arouses the people? I do—I mean "We" do! Once aroused, who keeps them so? I do—I mean "We" do! Who secured the election of Higgins Smith, Esq., of the Hon. Smith Jones Thompson? I did—I mean "We" did! Who came in for the beef and beer after the canvass? "We" did—I mean the Hon. S. J. T. did! And who came in for simply the bones? I did—that is, "We" did! But let it go! The President knows my opinion of his conduct. Much he cares for it! Very little, I suppose. I am still at my post, while the jolly American ambassadors are packing their trunks and buying their steamer tickets, and even little Flimflam has the consulate at Deadman's Island! "There are some obligations," says Goldsmith, "too great for gratitude." The Administration's to me, for instance! But I say no more. Ha! ha! "History," says old Bernard Gilpin, "makes mention of a people called Anthropophagi—eaters of men—which all men's hearts abhor to hear of; and yet, alas! by St. Paul's rules, England is full of such. Every man envieth another; every man biteth and grinneth upon another with venomous adder's tongues far more noisome than any teeth." What would Gilpin have said, if he had lived here and now and had remarked the recent scrambles? The foundations of the Government giving way—civil war raising its horrid front—the minds of all the good and generous and gentle full of fearful forebodings—and yet that steady stream of selfish expectants pours into Washington, every man of it crying, "Give! give!" mixed with terrible telegrams which told us that the bloody business had commenced, came such words as these: "Snooks expects the Little Peddlington Post-office, but I think that Jones has the inside track." O Heavens! that the minds of men will never rise to the dignity of the present—that the sublime of history must be seen by us through bleared antiquarian eyes, and events be recognized only when ticketed and red-taped and pigeon-holed in the Circumlocution Office! It is really refreshing to me now, though in a painfully advanced stage of impecuniosity, to think that I have asked for nothing. Especially as it is quite evident that the poor President has but little to give. Once in four years we expect the Head of the Government to re-enact the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, and as often are we notably disappointed. And yet—

Flimflam preferred to myself for the coveted Consulate! I really can not get over it. I am a victim of the popular mania! All my philosophy, of which I have a great stock, can not dissuade me from still hoping. If the President would but write to me to say that he wished to express to me the assurances of his distinguished consideration! Alas, he does not answer my letters at all! Wherefore, let me find consolation in a little slip-slop philosophy. Involving myself in my virtue, as Horace has it, let me take notice how this foolish old world permits its rheumy old eyes to tell falsehoods to its addled old brains—how it will believe in nothing upon which it can not lay its cautious finger—how it still spins about in a muddle of optical delusions—how it will still put its faith in noise drowning the still small voice—how it best likes to think in herds, and to be virtuous in copartnership—how it finds consolation in jostling crowds, and prefers to be saved in mass-meeting. We are so apt to think of men merely as millions making their finest figure in election returns, and we are so democratically disdainful of the one domineering mind; we are so accustomed to revere only what is just above a low average of mediocrity; we have such wholesome fear of subjecting our precious independence to any undue influences, that we fall into lamentable and contemptible straits in stormy weather when only a strong hand at the helm can save us from the savage shore. We have thousands and tens of thousands of politicians who are all made after the same pattern, think the same thoughts, speak the same speeches, and tread the same routine. In the days of the Revolution, and in the earlier days of the Republic, the popular eye, educated by pressing dangers, and made wary by unceasing emergencies, was sure to recognize the true man upon the instant of his appearance. He had but to speak and all were listeners; he had but to command and all were obedient; he was a leader by the importunate election of an endangered people, and a ruler by the divine right of a superior nature.

The clear and original thinker, who, from the study of all histories, had come thrice-armed to create a new one, understood that all human action, to find a permanent embodiment in human society, must be moved by a vital principle, true of itself, and, in spite of low and temporary vicissitudes, as true in the hour of defeat as at the moment of victory. Hence the philosophical accuracy of the language of the Declaration of Independence. Hence the erudite arguments of John Adams—eloquent, indeed, and illustrated by all the fire of his passionate nature, but based upon all the learning of all the civilians, and made impregnable by the whole law of England. Hence the uncommon common-sense of Franklin, sublime in its simplicity, beautiful in its homely vigor, equable always, and equal to any fortune, our finest specimen of the unshaken, solid, Roman mind. For centuries our fathers had been accustomed to battle, but never to battle without a reason. The first great martyr of the English Revolution, from which, humanly speaking, our own arose, was its finest parliamentary debater, and by far its ablest political manager. The soldiers of these great days are indeed remembered, and should never be forgotten; but above them, for the affectionate reverence of the age, stands that sacred form of our divinest singer, and looks down upon us that face so full of light from within that we forget those darkened orbs and that blindness, which was John Milton's contribution to English liberty and the liberty of nations. Nor must we forget, in our rapt contemplation of that awful form, a lesser servant of social freedom—lesser in all else save unquestioning devotion and the greater penalty which he paid for his fidelity. All honor, say I, in the language of Tindall, his biographer, to "the worthy memory of James Harrington, a bright ornament of useful learning, a hearty lover of his native country, and a generous benefactor to the whole world; a person who obscured the false lustre of our modern politicians, and that equaled, if not exceeded, all the ancient legislators." As I write the old folio is before me, worn in the service of one hundred and sixty years of time; full of quaint learning, and of that earnest pedantry which is restless to find ancient precedents even for modern truth; confused and crude; not pleasant reading I fancy to the men of its time—very little read, I think, by the men of our time; but over its yellow pages, and in every line and circle of its antique type, there is the halo of humanity; and from it, in sad sincerity, breathes a wail for the follies of man and an aspiration for juster methods, and a divine order in the world's affairs. Harrington, diffuse as he was, concentrated all political truth in a single aphorism. "The errors and sufferings of the people," he said, "are from their governors." The Declaration of Independence says no more. The Constitution of the United States says no more. Fresh from the study of Harrington, James Otis said no more when he thundered against Writs of Assistance. Fourth of July orators can say no more, however deftly they may embroider their rhetoric. Praise be to the honest aphorism, for it is the convenient artillery of revolutions for the right! It is the sharp, decisive wisdom which sternly silences silly contention. It is the previous question put to abate the hopeless jangle of the world's debate, and to arrange the Babel of Congressional helplessness.

One is almost ashamed, in these days of multitudinous clangor and loud-tongued pretense, to invoke the presence of still another and a saintly shade even in the seclusion of humble study. The world, which remembers with all the tenacity of a gossip's memory, and with something of a gossip's invention, the weakness of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, while it reads with salacious relish the long-drawn libels of De Quincey or the anile traditions of Cottle, shows no particular appetite for the quiet and patient speculations of "The Friend." Most men understand of this political thinker only that he was a Radical in his youth and a Tory in his old age; but of what he thought as a Radical, or of what he wrote as a Tory, they have a notion which it would be complimentary to call confused. Sharp, querulous, fussy scribblers—polyphonic performers upon platforms—dogmatic Quarterly Reviewers, all joined in scolding chorus, and with indignant scream hailed him renegade, traitor, and poltroon. Fidelity, with these men, meant fidelity to some proposed Act of Parliament, and courage consisted in braving Lord Eldon's decisions and Mr. Pitt's warrants. The Radicalism of England—with no undue disrespect be it mentioned—is wiser now, and is seeking loftier ends by larger means; and that it is so, and is doing so, is due, partly at least, to Coleridge, who was bold enough to say: "The majority of Democrats appear to me to have attained that portion of knowledge which infidels possess in religion;" and sharp enough to say of another class, not unrepresented here: "On the report of French victories they blaze into republicanism; at a tale of French excesses they darken into aristocrats." "The dough-baked patriots," as Coleridge nicknamed them, were of course indignant; but I beg leave to think that their indignation, while it may have sadly unsettled many things, really settled nothing. The thoughts of Coleridge had nothing of a party bias; for to the end of his long life he rebuked all parties by turns—a fact always conveniently forgotten by his detractors. His only partisan influence was impartially exerted to raise them all to a more elevated ideal of rational endeavor. He secured for the two great political antagonistic parties of England such leaders as Lord Brougham and Sir Robert Peel. For we find that with the growth of English thought the virulence of English politics is sensibly abated; and party lines long since lost the strictness of their tension. Venerable gentlemen still snarl; Parliamentary dogs still howl for the lash of the whipper-in; but never in English history—except perhaps at the period of the Orange revolution—have honest men been so disdainful of party trammels. The words of Coleridge are now the creed of Whig, of Tory, and of Radical alike: "It is a mockery of our fellow-creatures' wrongs to call them equal in rights, when, by the bitter compulsion of their wants, we make them inferior to us in all that can soften the heart or dignify the understanding." This is the opinion of all England now; there are none left to gainsay it; the Premier agrees to it, and so does Mr. Punch. All thinking people have come in time to believe in "those comforts and that illumination which far beyond all political ordinances are the true equalizers of men."

There is yet another noble name which can not be forgotten in such discussions as these. It is that of one whose character has been made the subject of much impertinent criticism; of one whose sun went down not in glory but in gloom; of one who was called simply "The Dean" in his own time, but who living had more power in Ireland than the Lord-Lieutenant or the Lord-Lieutenant's Lord. All Irish men of letters—to their eternal good fame and name let it be said—have been patriotic. In song and in story, in the wail of despair or in the prophetic peans of sunrise and of hope, away from the immediate presence of Ireland's sufferings, amidst the seductions of a more fortunate civilization, or bearing at home their bitter portion of her penury with the multitude around them—poets, and statesmen, and orators have never forgotten the sore state of their weeping country, the common mother of them all. The nature of Jonathan Swift was not poetical, if it is to be judged by modern æsthetical standards or by the clever social verses with which he beguiled the solitude of his life; but no biography known to us is such a grand Æschylian tragedy as, if faithfully and artistically written, his would be. He lived—and this was one of the cruel misfortunes of his life—he lived in an age in which the statesman was shallow, the politician venal, the church a shop, and the man of letters a sycophant; and yet all his views of public duty were broad and deep; all his performance of that duty was inadequately rewarded; while all his pastoral labor was performed with rigid fidelity, and the best of his works were scornful and merciless rebukes of human folly in high places. Whatever else may be said of him, it can not with truth be said that he abased himself to coronets, or while all other men were trading away their souls around him, that he sold his country for a bishopric. If the Castle was the kindly custodian of Irish rights and the nurse of Irish liberty, he was with the Castle; but as no project for the further enslavement of the most humble peasant escaped his attention, so no projector escaped the poisoned thong of his satire. In defiance of ministers he flung ballads into the public streets. He bombarded Mr. William Wood's brass mint with a broadside of pamphlets, and not an Irishman would touch the spurious coin of that adventurer. He loved the Church proudly if not tenderly; and when by audacious lampoons he proved his devotion, the antiquity of Rome and the novelty of dissent were involved in a common ridicule. When his position in Ireland became permanent, and that dream of preferment, the infirmity of his noble mind, had faded away, the cause of Irishmen became his own, and woeful was the fate of any man who betrayed it. His was a patriotism, if not of the highest, at least of the most passionate type; and it was the more creditable to his generosity because it was based upon resolute self-abnegation—because Dublin was not to him a place of residence voluntarily chosen or personally pleasant—because Irishmen, much as he loved them, continually vexed him, especially by their thriftlessness. At last he was left utterly alone. The friends of his youth—Pope, Gay, Arbuthnot, Bolingbroke—were far away; the fair women who once relieved by their smiling elegance the rigidity of his demeanor, lived only in sad and thick-coming memories—both had departed; a terrible disease, capable of alleviation had it been recognized by his physicians, crushed his intellect; and if not “a show,” at least a speechless “driveler,” he stalked in voiceless agony to the place prepared for him. Yet he still lives in Irish hearts and upon Irish lips, by general distinction and notoriety, as “The Dean.” If his life had but small practical influence upon the Ireland of his day—and little enough then and long after could any individual mind do for her—he is yet among her most priceless possessions: a great name in her history whenever her history shall be complete enough to write.

When Weimar saw the interview between Goethe and Napoleon there was much agreeable chat between them, as Hegel relates, concerning, among other things, the Destiny of the Greeks, which the Emperor insisted had been replaced, in modern politics, by what his Majesty was pleased to term policy. The courtly poet was too civil, without doubt, to say any thing to the great man before him, of the impolicy of attempting the subjugation of Germany, then not only thrilling with an affectionate patriotism, but wonderfully strengthened for philosophical endeavor and endurance by the recent revival of popular thought and intelligence. The Napoleonic notion of governing the world without ideas other than military ended in Corsica, in St. Helena, in very vulgar battles with Sir Hudson Lowe about bread, beans, and beef, in which, if we may judge by the still diminishing rations at Longwood, Providence seems to have been upon the side, not of the man who carried the most guns—in fact, upon the side of a vulgar baronet. I presume if Bonaparte could have silenced Johann Gottlieb Fichte by the loss of a dozen of his best regiments, or by the spiking of five hundred French guns, that he would have had infinitely the best of the bargain. The great philosophic teacher, laughed at by the conqueror as a dreamer, yet pined to be a soldier. “If the orator,” he said, “must content himself with speech—if he can not fight in your ranks to prove the truth of his principles by his actions, by his contempt of danger and of death, by his presence in the most perilous places of the combat—this is only the fault of the age, which has separated the calling of the scholar from that of the warrior. But he feels that if he had been taught to carry arms he would have been behind none in courage; he laments that his age has denied him the privilege accorded to Æschylus and Cervantes, to make good his words by manlike deeds. Since he may only speak, he would speak fire and sword.” To this truth Fichte was always loyal. His was the one tongue in Germany which Napoleon never silenced. Driven from Berlin by the French occupation, he continued to speak boldly at Königsberg. The battle of Eylau drove him to Copenhagen, whence, after the partial evacuation, he returned to Berlin, still seeking only the regeneration of Prussia, and delivering his celebrated “Addresses to the People” while the French drums sounded under the windows of his lecture-room in which French spies were lurking to make due report of his patriotic language. The day of deliverance came; but alas! it was the day of Fichte's deliverance also. He lived only to learn, in a lucid interval, of the expulsion of the French from Germany. “Give me no more medicine,” said he; “I am well:” and so, in a pleasant slumber, he passed away—the chivalrous man of letters, the patriot and the philosopher.

Great events develop many different phases of character, and among these that of the timid conservative is the most melancholy—that of the bold conservative exceedingly respectable. In the frightened philosopher, be it admitted, there is often much to admire and reverence, if we do not turn away at first in sorrow, when we discover the lack of a vital and central manliness. Niebuhr, at almost every point except that of studious earnestness, was the opposite of Fichte. Niebuhr despaired—Fichte could only despair with the renunciation of his philosophy. Niebuhr brought from his wanderings among the wrecks of empire a hopelessness of reconstruction; Fichte planted himself upon the eternal present. Niebuhr trembled for rule, for religion, for race; Fichte calmly said, while all Europe was under one foot: “Every true and good action prospers, and every bad action fails; and all things must work together for good to those who truly love goodness.” In learning they were equal; perhaps in mere erudition Fichte was the inferior; but the stalwart and indomitable spirit which animated the strong frame of the giant philosopher was of the strain to enact and create events which it is the lower duty of the historian to record. Niebuhr's timidity at last became ludicrous. Even in 1809 he thought that "the great judgment-day of the world" had come; and he added: "It is a hard task to learn how to live without hope." Only a few months before Fichte was delivering his "Addresses to the German People," surrounded by the soldiers and spies of the autocrat. Fichte was doing while Niebuhr and Goethe were dreaming. The last years of the great historian were a succession of alarming seasons. In 1828 he gloomily wrote of England: "Its rapidly accelerating decline is a very remarkable and mournful phenomenon; it is a mortal sickness for which there is no remedy. I liken the English of the present day to the Romans of the third century after Christ." Again, in the same letter: "Woe be to poor, divided, decaying Germany." Soon came the Second French Revolution to cap the climax of his apprehension. "We in Germany," he cried, "are rapidly hastening toward barbarism, and it is not much better in France." He died at last a martyr to his anxiety. He was strongly interested in the trial of the ministers of Charles the Tenth; in going to the news-room he caught a cold; and in a week the wonderful antiquary was himself an antiquity.

I suppose if Niebuhr had but recovered from that fatal cold, he would ever after have held newspapers in mortal contempt; and even in this land of morning and evening editions, he would have had many to share that contempt with him. It is the misfortune of the newspapers that they pretend to do, not merely more than they can do, but more than they intend to do; and that their manufacture is, of necessity, a hasty one. All that can be fairly asked of them is—1. A statement of facts; and, 2. A statement of opinion. All the rest is simply superfluous. In both these divisions, of duty and responsibility, it is intelligence—though in different senses of the word—that is needed. And by the statement of opinion I do not mean Mr. Raymond's opinion of Colonel Webb, nor yet Mr. Bennett's opinion of Mr. Horace Greeley. The world, trust me, can make up its mind upon these important points without assistance. Nor do I any more mean a dry, judicial summing-up of the evidence, thus without law making every man a jurymen, to the destruction of that serenity which befits the morning meal. In the delivery of his views I would by no means limit the exuberance of the honest editor, nor the exhibition of his good gifts of wit, fancy, humor, imagination, persuasion, and invective. All I ask is that the subject-matter of discussion shall be kept closely in hand, and that no little excursions shall be made for the purposes of assault and battery. When I was younger than I am now, and not so wise, an unfortunate newspaper was under my control; and, directed by me, it went triumphantly into bankruptcy in an incredibly short space of time. It was long ago; but I remember that I had but two formulas of command to my subalterns. One was, "Smash!"

and the other, "Crack up!" Since that time all things are infinitely changed for the better. In the competition of news-giving the popular mind has that which it most needs—an ample armory of substantial facts. I do not mean to say that there are no mistakes, nor that there are not too often bold, bald, prepossessing mendacities; but what I do mean to say is, that, in the long-run, a lie has no chance of life. Every newspaper stands guard over the veracity of its neighbors, to whom also its ruin would be a cheerful diversion. Out of this jealousy the public wins. To those who base opinion upon fancy—who never believe when belief will be unpleasant—who think only the thought of the caucus, and who tread scrupulously in the footsteps of the committee—who consider all men of their mind to be sheep, and all men not of their mind to be goats, the newspaper, if honestly and wisely conducted, can be of small value only. As its power is in its facts, in their clear statement and dexterous arrangement, each with its prominence philosophically determined by its importance; so, these conditions being observed, the newspaper is to the man of thought priceless and precious. The world moves fast. Railways and steamships and the telegraph give us no rest. The topic of the day, or at least certain phases of it, must be digested at once; for to-morrow will bring new occasions and new duties with them. The vulgar phrase, "posted up," expresses exactly the service which a good newspaper renders.

I have said nothing of the poets; for within the limits of this paper, upon so broad a theme, what can be worthily said—what more than mere mention can we accord to the martial or satiric singer? As I dream of these, I hear the harp of Tyrtæus resounding through the Lacedæmonian camp; and, for the love of the poetic art, I am ready to forget that Alcæus fled from battle, and that Horace left his shield at Philippi. I see Domitian writhe under the flail of Juvenal, and seeking escape from such fearful censure in the banishment of the rebuking bard. Nearer still, I hear the blood-stirring songs of Scotland's Burns, of England's Dibdin, of Ireland's Moore, and that one glorious lyric of our own Key; while through the lurid night of French delusion comes, chanted by ten thousand hoarse and hungry voices, the fitful notes of the Marseillaise. But enough of this.

Enough, because all our sweet singers have already tuned their lyres, and the Poets' Columns in the newspapers have become almost as formidable as those of General Scott. It is not given to all—ah! it is given but to few—worthily to weave the eternal lyric verses, and to sway whole peoples by the enchantment. But he who in days of public danger stands steadfast; he who yields to no sordid passion, to no selfish impulse, to no base promptings of interest; he who by the daily beauty of his life makes treason hideous; he who is true to his God, and so true to his country and his children—the soldier, in the far-away camp and thinking of his home—the statesman, by whose prudence we are to be saved, and whose ear is shut against every venal whisper—the mother, giving her loved ones to the land—the rich man and the poor man, each offering all—the child, raising his tiny flag and saluting it with his young, fresh voice—all these are poets—patriots, if you will—yes, patriot-poets!

THE SEED PEARL.

I.

EARL HUNTER and his friend Messmate—a yellow, ugly-looking dog—lounged in the shade of the fine old hickory-trees which stood their ground, like faithful sentinels, between the grove and the High School of Liberty Street.

The old man was waiting till the recess-bell should sound; then, he knew, he would find market for the fruit and Deft's pin-cushions, which Messmate guarded with such jealous eyes. The basket also was protected by the shade, and the old man was resting while he waited. It was in truth no light burden he had brought hither on his left, his only, arm. His only arm. On the fourth day of July, just eighteen years ago, the right arm of Earl Hunter had departed this life; it perished by the premature discharge of a gun he was proudly loading. So Earl Hunter, the gallant sailor, had retired from the high road to promotion to manage his aspiring spirit as he might.

It happened not rarely that the old man waited many minutes in this place the sounding of the bell which should send the boys flying and shouting through the High School doors. When the windows of the lower floor were open he could distinctly hear the voices of lads in recitation. He had a good memory; he liked facts; his boyhood had no schooling. At home he had a daughter of whose intelligence he was justly proud; he liked to seem not ignorant in her eyes, her tender, loving eyes. If these points are rightly put together, and justly apprehended, the reader will see how Earl Hunter's memory came to bear a singular resemblance to the leaves of the "odd volume."

To-day he listened while a lad translated the story of Polycrates. A most strange tale it sounded to his ears, and peaches and pin-cushions were forgotten as he stood thinking it over. But soon the boys came swarming round him like bees about a flower-bed, for never the shout of welcome failed Earl Hunter on this ground. He might have been Socrates, by the students' eager pressing and bright looks! Alas, they were clamoring for peaches, and the sage must own to pocketing their pence in payment for his marketable treasure!

So they disturbed his reflections. Carrying an empty basket, and the old purse heavy with copper, he walked slowly from the ground when the bell had recalled the students. But Earl Hunter had made good this time of recess—he had bought cheap, with some of his best fruit, new recitation of the tale of Polycrates, from the boy he had heard read it. He meant, as I said, to take this story home with him. He took it, but it proved a little burdensome as he sauntered along the dock with Messmate. It weighed upon him as he struck into the path that led beside the rocky shore to the stone-house and the light-house. When Deft came down to meet him and he looked into his daughter's happy face, it was almost with the relief a person feels when wakened from nightmare.

Deft was Earl Hunter's only child; born in the fiftieth year of her father's life, and the second of his residence at Light-house Corner. She was now sixteen years old, a "nut-browne mayde," in whom might be recognized, by the knowing, her father's energy and thoughtfulness, and her lost mother's feeling heart. No coarse "crockery" came of this common earth. The lamp was porcelain, and the flame quite pure. Her stature and form were noble; the winds and the waves and the unconquerable heavens had much to do with it. She had an eye that would hold such mortals to the truth as of the truth were capable; an eye calm, but not cold. It seemed to say, however narrow, and however poor her fortunes might be in this life, they would not cramp the spirit; it could not lose its way when it escaped its daily revolution for the circle of eternity. My school-girl, mark that passage, and turn to it again when exhausted by the splendors of your rhetoric. I can not startle you with epithets in this day of endless exaggeration, yet would fain have you understand what is here claimed for Deft.

This father and this daughter were the best of friends. They trusted each other; were contented. Such measure of helplessness as Earl Hunter suffered from the loss of his arm was made painless as possible by his daughter's efficiency. Nominally he was the keeper of the light-house, but it was Deft who performed the duties. It was she who suggested the summer marketing, when she saw how heavily time hung on the old man's hands. It was she who was ready to take the blame of extravagance upon herself when her father brought home another second-hand volume that had tempted him as he passed by the book-stall. Deft was Earl Hunter's boast when he gossiped with the dock hands; the school-boys knew her name, and bought her pin-cushions; the old man loved her better than he would have loved his ship, had the brave purpose of his manly youth been realized.

As she came to meet her father the smile that had made her face bright all day still shone from Deft. Messmate leaped at the sight of her, and barked to the purpose. Earl Hunter showed his empty basket and full purse, and laughed as heartily as Messmate barked. So they went side by side to the house, talking over business. Supper was ready on the table, and when Deft had drawn her father's mug of beer they sat down, and while they ate Earl Hunter told his daughter about old-time Polycrates, whose name he had forgotten. Supper over he must rest, and while he slept Deft went to walk on the broad path of stone and gravel which led to the light-house.

Walking there she sang some pretty songs—songs that were favorites with Captain King. She had heard them sung so often she could but know them well. This Captain King was the master of a warehouse on the dock. He had a fine voice for singing, and was very fond of music, and whenever he came to the light-house, which was not seldom, he did not fail to visit also the stone house, where Earl Hunter lived.

He liked to talk with the gallant sailor, who never forgot that he had followed the seas; but he could talk of other things than sea-life. For a man of books was Captain King, and an author would have loved him for his reverence and discernment. There was no end to the ballads he knew and could repeat and sing. He was of course proud of his acquirements, for he had made these things his own. He possessed them—rhymes, thoughts, imaginations, all—and found abundant excuse for the display he made of his knowledge at Light-house Corner. Deft Hunter's pleasure was his full apology.

He might have been a member of the family, so pleasant was the house to him. Indeed, he regarded himself as such, and gave many an evidence of this. He believed also—it was his firm conviction, much joy he had of it!—that Deft Hunter's heart would never be won by any man but him. A high-minded, pure-hearted girl he knew her to be, and in all his calculations for the future he included her. His great aim was to acquire a fortune, and the foundation was already strongly laid. When he married, he often said, he meant to have a fine house of his own—a house and garden; there should be no end to the flowers of that garden. Nobody smiled when he made these remarks. Every body knew that he succeeded in every thing he set out to do. That he had found his own way out of obscurity and poverty, and was already taking rapid steps toward a prominent place among the dock-men. He was not ashamed of any fact concerning his early life; he carried with him from its poverty a pity for the poor which money-getting never could destroy.

If of those concerned by the sympathy of friendship one was prouder than the rest of his prosperity, it was Deft Hunter. The young man's life did not control, but it did influence hers mightily. She sang his songs and remembered his ballads. He could make her shudder when he would repeat "The Wandering Jew," and smile at the "Nut-browne Mayde," and her Squire of low degree. And how he would read that last verse of "Lenora,"

"Be patient, though thyne hert should breke,
Arrayne not heaven's decree;
Thou nowe art of thie bodie refte,
Thie soule forgiven bee!"

These ballads, with which he was so familiar, and which he spent many a Sunday reading to her, quickened the beat of heart, action of thought, and life of imagination. Deft loved not her home the less that it seemed to him so pleasant; and when she observed the respect with which the Captain (they called him Captain, but he was really no more entitled to the title than are all these generals and majors we meet with every day true coin of the pure metal) always treated her father, she was grateful for the grace, and loved him none the less. For deference and respect Earl Hunter did not always meet. He was in a measure helpless, and helplessness among the enlightened is not always reverently guarded, as idiots are among those people who are just wide awake enough to see their sacredness.

Often Deft Hunter and the Captain had walked together this smooth, hard path she and her father made; they could distinctly hear at this distance the military music of the band belonging to the regiment quartered at the fort. The Captain said the stars were brighter in their shining as seen from this quiet spot: here one must watch the moon to know her beauty; here one must wait the sunset. He loved the Light-house Corner—that was the amount of it.

Now, as Deft walked alone, she thought over the story of Polycrates as her father told it. The next time Captain King came down—and a good many days had now passed since his last visit—she would ask him what that story meant. But the tale did not set her to thinking very seriously. She trembled not for the safety of any treasure. She was not a king—she had no successes that could fill her with misgiving as to the good-will of the gods.

II.

The next day, a little after noon, Messmate came barking and bounding to the house, full of joy, if one might judge; and looking from her window Deft saw her father following after; and still beyond him, and beyond the light-house, the white sails of a boat whose name she would have dared to guess. But usually, when Captain King came down, he fastened his sail-boat to the stakes and came himself on his own errand; besides, as she knew very well, other parties often landed at Light-house Corner, and sometimes climbed the tower. Whoever had now come something was wanting. Deft went to meet her father.

"Get your bonnet," said Earl Hunter. "The Captain is down there with his cousin. You are all going to the fort for some music."

"I never heard of his cousin." Deft answered the prominent point contained in the summons without manifesting any design of acting upon the invitation.

"She is a pretty girl," said her father. "Hurry! You won't have too much time; take the day while it is bright;" and he turned about and retraced his steps, leaving Deft to go into the house, get her bonnet and shawl, and follow him. He went back to see the pretty cousin.

At the helm waited King, and a very pleasing and altogether surprising sight was that upon which Deft looked when the Captain arose to help her into the boat. In the stern sat the young girl whom he introduced as his cousin Sophie. She was not only a stranger to Deft, but a marvel to her eyes. She looked young, yet old; seemed timid, and yet her manners betokened self-possession; joyful, yet in moments of repose her face was grave and sad. Deft considered her a child, but she was older than Deft. When she stepped into the boat, and took her place between the Captain and his cousin, Sophie leaned forward and gave Deft a bunch of flowers.

"The Captain bought the basket for us," said she, "and I made this for you as we came. He told me which flowers you liked best."

Deft took the lovely flowers, and she praised them, turning the bouquet round and round, doing homage to each bud and blossom. She saw the pleased face of the child as she thus expressed her pleasure, and once or twice was near to saying—to herself—She is no child.

The young girl's face was of an olive hue, hair and eyes black, in person slender and tall, a grace in her every motion. Her voice was rich and soft and clear—a voice to exercise an influence. It could plead well, was insinuating—in joy, or in grief, or in danger, its appeals must be irresistible.

When she took off her flat, broad-brimmed straw-hat, and wound a myrtle wreath around the crown, Deft Hunter looked at the fanciful young creature with amazement. Child, fairy, woman, it was difficult for her to account for the Captain's cousin, who talked and sang in one breath, played with the flowers, and grew rapturous over the delight of sailing about on such a day. She enjoyed it as those do not enjoy who have all things at their command; who have known many pleasures; who have had no sorrows; who bear no mere responsibilities.

Captain King shared her enjoyment with a boy's generous enthusiasm. He was constantly pointing out to her whatever could attract, or had ever attracted his observation. The town, the fort, the banner of stars and stripes floating from the walls, the light-house, and the window where Deft nightly placed the lamp for the safety of all homeward-bound vessels.

By-and-by the Captain claimed his reward—he asked Sophie to sing. The instant he made the request she took up her guitar, which lay wrapped in a shawl at her feet. Deft looked on in wonder.

"I know what you like best—that first," said Sophie; and she sang a song which Captain King had often sang for Deft. "Why don't you sing?" she asked him, after the first verse. At the close of the second he joined in the chorus.

"She is a child," thought Deft Hunter. "Strange he never told me of his cousin."

At length, after much singing, Sophie put down her guitar, folded her hands, and became quiet. Neither the Captain nor Deft asked her for more. They could not in reason. The Captain steered the boat in the direction of the fort, and the wind brought them quickly to the land.

They came in silence to the shore; those songs had made them silent; but as the boat grated against the beach, Sophie's mood, which had controlled the spirits of her companions, changed in its manifestations—the soft shadow passed from her face, she was ready again for laughter and jesting. But Deft was not quite pleased at this—if she could not resist the girl's influence, and she could not resist it; to understand her was the least she might expect. When Sophie went forward from the boat, with guitar in one hand and flower-basket in the other, she said to Captain King, who looked at her while he made the boat fast, as if he expected some remark,

"Your cousin is a pretty creature, Captain."

It seemed hardly worth saying, but it pleased him.

"She is a wonderful girl," he replied. "I wish I could tell you all about her. Be kind to her for my sake, Deft; she has seen a great deal of trouble, poor girl."

"Has she seen trouble? So young! You never told me about her; maybe I could have helped her."

"Perhaps it's not too late," answered the Captain. "Look at her, Deft. By George!"

Sophie was returning to them when Captain King bade Deft look at her. Deft's eyes were not too slow. She saw what is not seen so often by any one as to be forgotten ever again. Having beheld Rachel we know well that repetition of that genius under other name is quite impossible, though we go up and down the world gazing at all great beauty, and witnessing the marvelous achievements. We walk on foot among the mourners to that grave of Rachel in the Jew cemetery, knowing that we shall lament no other with precisely our grief for her, a Hebrew of the Hebrews. And no emotion true, legitimate, is ever repeated.

Deft Hunter, borne through every phase of passion, every circle of knowledge, could never know, or feel again, what she understood and experienced as her eyes obeyed the direction given them by Captain King's word, "Look at her!" Exceeding grace, and an almost regal beauty, that seemed atmospheric rather than defined, Deft Hunter saw. The burning bush and fiery pillar were revelations—so is a lily or a rose; so is a bee or bird; so also was this child, fairy, woman, that seemed to float and not to walk—that smiled herself, to the fancy of poor Deft, like a sunbeam in betwixt black threatening walls, whose outlet was a mystery. She joined the Captain and Deft, and they all set out together for the fort. But the child was picking up shells and pebbles, and singing snatches of song, and could not, though she tried, walk in a quiet manner. Every step seemed the preparation of a dance. She appeared to move to the sound of the music which was unheard of her companions—spiritual music, which was spiritually discerned.

They went up to see the soldiers. Their evolutions filled her with delight, the strange music, the order, the uniform, she wanted all explained. They sat on the grass to listen and to rest. The delicious breeze, the bright day, the splendid view, the fine music, were inspiring surroundings—the pleasure he had conferred on the girls by bringing them thither was the main cause of the Captain's serene satisfaction. He told stories, recited ballads, and last of all his dire favorite, "Lenora."

It was this ballad that reminded Deft Hunter, at such a time, to repeat the story her father brought home yesterday from the classic ground of High School.

"Such a curious thing as I heard yesterday from father," she began.

"What was that?" the Captain asked.

"About an old king—I don't know his name; father don't—whose fortune was so good always, that a friend wrote to him that he must throw away the thing he valued most."

"Put it away in such a manner that he should never see it again," said the Captain, taking up the story when Deft hesitated for a second. "Because it must certainly be some tremendous bad fate that was in store for the man who was always fortunate. That man, Deft, was Polycrates."

Deft Hunter was not surprised when Captain King took the story thus out of her mouth. She felt embarrassed the moment she began to speak in the hearing of Sophie, for Sophie's eyes bent on her as no other eyes she had ever met could possibly have done. She felt relieved that he knew the story already; and was always prepared for the evidences of his learning. Perhaps he could explain this tale. She now in turn looked at Sophie while the Captain spoke. The girl was leaning against the trunk of the tree in whose shade they sat, seriously listening; no smile about her mouth—no laughter in her eyes.

"Was his name Polycrates?" asked Deft.

"Yes. When he received the letter you speak of from his friend he set to work, like a sensible fellow, to find out what it was that he valued most of all his great possessions. At last he decided. What do you think it was, Sophie?"

"What was it?" she asked, so very carelessly as to draw the attention of both listeners, and both saw her brush away a tear.

"Guess," said the Captain, with a loud voice.

Sophie looked at Deft, the expression of Deft's face made her smile, but she was not otherwise enlightened.

"Why, think for yourself," said the Captain, again.

"Maybe it was his crown—he was a king."

"No, a ring."

"A ring!" repeated the child, wondering and serious. "Tell the rest, Captain."

"Polycrates stood as stiff for ceremony as some others. He ordered out a barge manned by fifty oarsmen, and went in state to throw the ring into the sea. Having performed that feat, he thought he was safe till the judgment-day; so he went home again lamenting. But here comes the wonder: there was an odd fish in the water that was caught by the emerald—it swallowed the ring, and forthwith came to destruction; for a fisherman caught the fish, and must needs make it a present to the king, it was so exceeding beautiful. But when the time came to dress the fish for dinner behold the wonderful seal-ring of Polycrates! Well, in the end the old fellow was crucified. That was the sum of his luck. If he had thrown away his rapacious temper, and kept his paltry ring, he would have done well enough. Poor fool! But it seems to me, Deft, we are rather late in the day lamenting over him. He lied about the ring worse than Ananias. He got his reward. Let him alone."

The Captain now struck from the subject, bearing down on one nearer home; but in spite of all his effort the little party seemed not as carelessly gay as it had been before. Deft had the information she desired to get by asking the Captain what the story meant; and when he manifested his wish to drop the heathen implicated without further discussion, she understood, and let Polycrates go.

While they sat in the shade of the tree the wind began to shake it, and Captain King perceived a dark cloud gathering in the West.

"We'll go home in fine style," said he, rising. "And we had better lose no time."

He lost no time in leading the way. So they all went quickly to the beach, the Captain furled the sails, and they embarked in the rocking-boat. They were like children of the sea, and felt no fear. Sophie wrapped her guitar in the folds of her dress, for the Captain insisted on her wearing her shawl, and himself pinned it around her. She sat upright, facing the gale, in tune for the increasing tumult of the storm. She felt such confidence in the Captain's skill, and Deft Hunter was so unmoved, she would have betrayed no fear much though she had felt.

The Captain watched her as they went. When he spoke, which was not often, it was to her, with some word of assurance; but in spite of the courage on board, and his own fearlessness, he heartily wished the girls ashore. When he rowed into the little cove just beyond the light-house, he said to Deft, "I am going to leave Sophie with you, if you will keep her. I can manage the boat better alone. You will keep her to-night, won't you?"

"And you, too, Captain," Deft answered, helping Sophie ashore.

"Do not go. We shall have a flood." She spoke very earnestly, and her words were instantly made good, for large drops of rain fell in their faces.

The Captain laughed at the entreaty, in which Sophie joined, and with the strong motion of his arm the boat shot out of the cove as the rain began to fall. The girls retreated into the light-house; climbing the stairs, they watched him from the balcony. When the little boat was hid from their sight by jutting rocks their eyes turned toward the sea—the great deep that was "boiling like a pot." Already the sudden storm gave signs of lessening fierceness; the clouds were breaking, the wind was not so violent, and the rain was passing beyond them: they saw it pouring from the black masses of cloud that hung above the town. Deft found herself in a curious position while they watched the lightening of those masses. Sophie was troubled and fearful on the Captain's account; and Deft herself anxious, felt constrained to hide her anxiety, and assure her companion of the impossibility that any danger could overpower him. She had seen him out in worse storms, and if his strong boat were capsized, or even broken, he was still as safe on the water as on the land, being so good a swimmer.

Assured by Deft's confidence, Sophie made no more mention of her fear, and they went merrily up to the stone house. Earl Hunter had slept through the storm; but the sudden return of sunshine and quiet roused him and brought him to the door, and when he saw the girls he stood to meet them, wide awake.

Even the friendly feeling the day had aroused failed to inspire Deft Hunter with perfect confidence in herself as the entertainer of this girl. But she was soon relieved by the progress made by Sophie and her father. Nothing seemed to come amiss to Sophie. She was at home in the boat, or at the fort, or in this stone house of Earl Hunter. And if she had seen "trouble," it must have been of a strange character, for its effect seemed to have been the establishment of her confidence in all with whom she came in contact. She seemed to have no reserves, no cares to-night, and her face was too bright to warrant the imputation of very extreme anxiety, when now and then she went to the door or window and looked out, and was followed by Hunter's immediate

"Oh, don't bother about him! The Captain's ashore, and about his business by this time."

When the old man looked curiously at Sophie's guitar, mistaking it for a violin, she took it up and played and sang for him, without his asking her. He would have gone a long while without asking, and she divined his wish. The graceful act and the sweet voice were sufficient to invest her with an instant glory. Earl was like one enchanted. He believed in mermaids; in every thing incredible that was at the same time lovely. If not, what meant that little shelf of sea-shells, dainty as rose leaves, into which his eyes so often peered? He was the owner of those floating palaces before his Deft was born.

In the evening they sat around the fire and talked like life-long friends. Earl Hunter had many a tale to tell, and Sophie's heart was thrown wide open by his praises. Her time came when the old man began to manifest some curiosity as to her fortunes and her relationship with Captain King, for he as well as Deft had been ignorant even of her existence until to-day.

When asked about her cousin Sophie hesitated a moment. She looked at Deft; but Deft looked grave, she was so curious to hear the answer to this question.

"Oh," said she, then looking at Earl, and laughing outright, "he called me so. He did not mean it. I thought you knew. Captain King is very kind to me, but he is not my cousin. I have had a great deal of trouble."

"You have!" exclaimed Hunter, seizing upon what seemed to him the main point of her words. "Why, you look as if you had grown in a bower like a pretty flower. There's a rhyme if you take it in time."

Sophie smiled at this, but Deft rose up quickly and walked to the window. There for many minutes she stood, looking out upon the cloudless night. Listening to the noise of breaking waves? No. Harkening to the quieter voices within. But she was not smiling as her father smiled to hear what they were hearing. Captain King had deceived her. Who and what was this girl? Presently the conversation by the fireside drew her back to her place. The old man had questioned their guest with an interest and sympathy so manifest that she was telling him her story. If Deft Hunter would know who and what the girl was, let her listen. She was telling how her father died, when she was a child, greatly in debt to the manager of a theatre for whom they played. She had been brought up a dancer, and that was her business in life, to dance. But not in a theatre now. She had a school for children. She did not, however, express any emotion of gratitude for escape from the boards of the stage.

Captain King had been very kind to her. When she first saw him she was in great distress. She trusted in the kindness of his face, and asked him to help her. And he had helped her; so greatly, that now she owed every thing to him. It seemed as if she could not say enough in his praise, and Earl Hunter attested that he was worthy of it all.

Deft Hunter, looking at the young girl while she talked of him, saw how much her heart had to do with the words spoken. She marked the changes in Sophie's voice, she saw the tears that started to Sophie's eyes when she said,

"He has done every thing for me. Saved me. I can only thank him, and wonder if there are other men like him in the world. Before I saw him every body seemed so cruel. Yes, all—the whole world was against me. But now every body seems to be my friend, all because of him. When you come to my room, Deft, you'll see what a happy life I lead. But you never can know, I hope, what a miserable time I had before. I owe every thing to him. But some day I shall pay him for all—except—how can I pay him! But I will wish every thing for him, and a great many times my wishes have come true. But then I don't know what I could throw away, Deft, if you told me to give up what I held most precious, as that king was told."

Earl Hunter believed all the girl had said. Many times while she was speaking he wiped his eyes, looked solemnly into the fire, and let the pauses in her story, which might have been properly filled by some word of his, pass without comment. Used as he was to privation, hardship, pain, the recital of what this young girl had endured touched his heart. Deft listened in silence. Even to those last words which were addressed to her she made no answer.

Whether Sophie was troubled by this silence, or because the subject interested her so much, she did not drop it when they were left alone after old Hunter went to bed.

She had answered much—now was her time to question. And she chose to hear the Captain spoken of by Deft. So she asked if they had known each other long, and knew very well that Deft would answer, "Always."

Then she would fain learn something of his boyhood; and moved by an impulse stirred partly by pride in him and his successes, and partly by the felt right to talk of him, which she could not recognize so entirely in another, perhaps also that she saw another legitimate result of this speaking, on which she unconsciously relied, Deft told Sophie how laborious his life had been—how he had educated himself in spite of every obstacle, for Captain King's reading had made him, to Deft's thinking, a very learned man. She told how his heart's desire, when a lad, would have led him to seek his fortune on the sea; how he had staid on shore because he was his mother's only one, and she had wept so sorely when he thought of going away. She told of the struggle that decision cost him; how he had lived on docks and wharves since that time, and did seek fortune of the sea, though it must be as a landsman; and how he used to come, while his mother and hers were alive, and spend the long Sunday with them—they were all like one family. They had passed through sorrow and had wept together. With every recollection of her childhood had this Captain King to do.

She told of his decision, after his mother died, to remain on shore, and continue in the course which had her blessing; how he had prospered ever since. How he had the sailor's warm heart and courage, though he never went to sea. He knew all about the foreign lands for which the vessels sailed. Many a tale she had to tell of him.

She even told this listener how once, when her poor father was surrounded by drunken revelers who made him their sport, taking advantage of his partial helplessness, Captain King had dashed in among them and scattered the drivelers like chaff, taking such immediate and fiery vengeance as made a broad path, clear and safe, for the old man to walk in ever after.

The listener shared in the speaker's every mood as she went through these reminiscences.

"Yes, yes," came forth like an indorsement at every recital or assertion. Sophie expected all this. She was surprised by nothing, and manifestly she would not soon weary of this talk.

But Deft Hunter wearied, or else the inward passion which incited all this outbreak of speech, so strange and so unlooked-for, had, in its outflow, exhausted her. When she had told about that defense of her father, she stooped and stroked the head of Messmate, the faithful watch-dog

Captain gave her father, then she arose. Sophie, she said, must sleep and rest.

So she lighted her guest to bed, left her in the chamber that stood ready for whatever guest desired the hospitality of the stone house. But she went not to bed herself till long after midnight.

Her candle burned out; the fire turned to ashes. She sat and thought. The impulse that had urged her to this speech being exhausted, her heart was shamed by its own nakedness. She had kept back nothing. But that which Sophie thought of, smiling, as she lay wakeful on her bed, was not of any self-betrayal for which Deft Hunter had reason to blush. She had merely heard frank speech like her own.

But it was not in the nature of Deft to revolve around herself—this was not one of the laws of her being. And from herself her thoughts turned to these others whom the past day's events also concerned. Not a word that Captain King had spoken, not a look or act of his, escaped in this recapitulation. She seemed to listen with enlightened understanding now to every word of Sophie's speaking—and if there was some profanity in Deft's touch when she dealt with that gratitude the girl had been so free to confess, marvel not.

No wonder the Captain loved her, she mused in that doleful, lonesome night. She was so beautiful—she sang so wonderfully. She had sung sometimes for the Captain when he asked her; she blushed to think of it—she wept some bitter tears to think of it. But, marvel not.

Now she understood why his visits had been so few this summer, for she suddenly discovered that in comparison with other times and seasons those visits had been few. Envy and jealousy, whose tokens she had never known before, tormented her. She was afraid of herself, of the wishes, the thoughts, which like demons tormented this estranged self. They filled the dark room with darker shadows. She could not recognize what was unknown to her until now, the prospect which unfolds before the evil eye of jealousy. Had the fairest of all the forms of beauty she had ever looked upon appeared before her only to destroy her peace—the glad peace of Deft Hunter, who had loved beauty, and served it as she was able, until now?

Until now! But in this night there came an hour of marvel—a breaking of light long before the moment when the first ray of sunlight should flash across the sea. From the midst of her dark thinking, Deft Hunter stood up in the midnight with a thought that must have shone as far as heaven. She thought of him who was required to throw his dearest treasure, though it must be with much lamentation, into oblivion. Trembling in every nerve she stood, as before the dark presence of Fate, who called her to surrender, oh what! For she remembered Ananias, and dared not lie unto her soul. Was she not stronger than this Sophie? Had she ever suffered much? The girl had passed through fortunes she could not recall without a shudder. Poor Sophie, who had found a haven at last in the deep calm life of Captain King!

"Be patient, though thyne hert should breke,
Arrayne not heaven's decree;
Thou nowe art of thie bodie refte,
Thie soule forgiven bee!"

She had no more a right to the love which fear had defined to her this night with fatal precision. Ah, no danger did she apprehend of swimming against her soul in this love's renunciation!.....Could it be renounced?.....But she could remove all its dross; she could destroy her self from out this love.....Thus, oh Poly-crates, passed that night away.

III.

No suspicion of the phantoms with which the soul of Deft had struggled, in the manner that the strong fight always with the beasts, could have crossed the mind either of Earl Hunter or of Sophie the next morning. Yes; Sophie was a child, and must be comforted with every human comfort. How kindly did the voice of Deft address her! what noble grace was in the dignity with which she moved about performing her duties preparatory to accompanying Sophie and her father part way to town! Yes; Sophie was a child, and had borne sorrow enough, and she deserved her joy, because she stood so ready with her smiling gratitude to hail the rising sun. Deft was a woman, and was magnanimous, and could endure!

As they walked together toward the town, keeping to the beach, or in the narrow path that ran between the shore-rock, as pleased Sophie best, their talk was the pleasant talk of friends. The morning was lovely; many a bird answered the caroling of the child, and Deft gathered wild flowers as they went their way. Few were those blossoms—and they gave ample evidence to the sterility from whence they sprung; but the child received them as if they were red roses like those that are the glory of Damascus.

As they approached the town Deft left her companions to go on together. The child kissed her when they parted, and took Deft's promise that she would soon come down to visit her, with grateful confidence.

Deft Hunter went home. She returned to her labors there, making the house tidy, cleaning the light-house lamp, preparing to return to the pin-cushion making, broken off yesterday, as if she were the same person who went from work pleasuring at the call of Captain King. Hard labor would have suited her, but when she sat down to sew her will was not equal to that, and so she went to walk along the light-house path.

Just before she left the house two boatmen, her father's friends, had landed from their skiff, and now came strolling toward the house. They came by a path that left them unobserved, until they had approached too near to allow her retreat, if she had desired it.

One of these men was a gossip, whom nothing possible for him to know ever escaped. He came to Light-house Corner to-day with a special burden; came against the wish of his companion, for he found his craft too heavy for his boat.

He seemed disappointed when he had accosted Deft, to learn, in answer to his inquiry after the old man, that Hunter had gone to town. He had learned a bit of news last night while tippling in one of the wharf grog-shops, which he desired to discuss with old Earl, and he was a little put out to find that it must be with his daughter, for the occasion was not to be lost.

Knowing what her father's first question would be when she told him of the guests who came during his absence, Deft invited them to the house to try a glass of beer; they did not wait for her to repeat the invitation.

"Here's bad luck to the sneak that gets Earl Hunter's place," said the gossip; and he drank off his tumbler without pausing once for breath.

"What place is that?" asked Deft, without suspicion of the answer that would follow.

"You haven't heard they talk of rotating the light-house?"

"No. What do you mean?"

"Nothing."

"Pooh!" said the boatman's companion; but what he meant by that the gossip could not precisely tell, and so he flashed out a little.

"Pooh yourself! Didn't they say he had held it long enough, this snug berth? It's an older man than Earl that's going to get it, and one that's poorer; and he's served his country longer. No offense to Hunter—he didn't cut off his right arm himself. There's more than one that's disabled and poor. That's what they said. You've got it cheap as I. It's seventeen years, isn't it, Deft, since your father came down here?"

"Has any body complained of him?" asked Deft, in sad bewilderment. "Yes, it's seventeen years and more."

"Complaint!" said the gossip's companion; "I'd like to see the chap complaining of Earl Hunter! Salt or fresh, I'd skin him as I would an eel!"

"Complaint!" echoed the other; for his heart was warmed by the beer, and the expression of Deft's face—he should have a pretty picture of that face to paint when he described this scene, and he felt accordingly grateful to Deft, and had really no ill-will toward her father, being merely one of those persons who like to see things continually moving. "Complaint!" said he; "don't we always say, there goes Deft up to hang out our beacon, when we see the light struck? And I swear I've seen you up in that ere balcony, Deft, many a night when I couldn't get another man to even say he saw the light."

"Have you?" said Deft. "Do you suppose that he will hear of it in town?"

"Hear what?"

"About leaving the light-house. How very strange it seems!"

"I don't suppose you ever thought—"

"No, never. He is getting old."

"But he's got you!" suggested the younger man of the two, and this was not the gossip. He was thinking now of quite another matter.

"Yes, so he has," replied Deft, looking at the speaker, manifestly thankful for this timely suggestion. Yet all the consolations that belonged to this great fact did not speedily make themselves evident to her.

"See, Captain King's a good deal about here, off and on, ain't he? Did he ever tell you about that girl that danced to the theatre two nights?" said the gossip, who was now through with Earl's business.

"Three," put in his companion.

"Two. I saw her both—"

"I saw her three."

"No matter. She was a stunner. Where does the Captain keep her? They say he bought her of the theatre man, and won't let her dance any more. I've kep a sharp look-out, for one. I'd know her in Indy. Did you ever see her, Deft? King turns every thing to gold he touches. I think he's sent her off to dance in the big houses, where she'd bring more pay. That is my opinion."

"Did you ever see her dance, though?" inquired the younger man of Deft.

"No, I never heard of her."

"Why, I thought Captain King—he raved, they said—"

"I never heard him," answered Deft. But she asked no questions of the men. And now, having finished the jug of beer, they said they must be off. She walked with them to the beach, and told them, as they shoved the boat from the hospitable shore, that even if her father lost the place they must not forget to come again, in remembrance of these seventeen years. So they rowed away to praise the stout heart that was breaking—to repeat what she had said—that long as she lived her father should have his light-house.

IV.

When the sun went down Deft lighted the lamp in the tower, that mariners and boatmen might hail the shore in safety. But if failure in that duty had promised the shipwreck of the world, I wonder if she would have lighted the lamp for your sake, happy reader? She stood in the door-way and watched the twilight as it advanced with steady pace toward night, who should absorb it. Her thoughts were rigid. She could do nothing with them. Was nothing to be done? Nothing. She knew of no one to whom she could apply in her father's behalf but Captain King. If what these men said was true he could do nothing.

But if he could do any thing should he have the privilege? Better wander with her old father over the wide earth, seeking for their graves, than look now to him for help. For Captain King was suddenly disgraced, degraded, in her eyes. She had no tender thoughts to bestow upon her sorrow. The charm of the home was rudely torn away. Her faith in him gone, there was nothing else that she could mourn.

But when Deft Hunter saw her father returning home in the twilight, the rigid, dreadful thoughts relaxed—wrath and defiance went clean out of her mind. Old and maimed, bound to this nook by the love of many years, that he should be sent forth houseless, and she liable to death or disaster! She went creeping down the narrow tower stairs to meet him—trembling, fearful, but tearless.

She looked at him as she had never looked before, her eyes searching his face to discover if he knew his evil fortune. When she saw that he was happy she herself took heart, and spoke in a tongue just now unknown to her.

Earl Hunter, for his part, was so intent on the pleasant surprise intended for his daughter, that he did not observe the paleness of her face, nor that all the accustomed elasticity of her step was gone. By his side she walked more heavily, more wearily than he.

"You are late, father," she said, as they went home.

"Yes," he answered; "I—I've been visiting. Up four pair of stairs—a nice little spot too." This speech was eager as a child's.

"What's that?" asked Deft, softly.

"Sophie, you know," replied the old man, looking at his daughter sideways, with a knowing smile.

"What of Sophie?" asked Deft, and she tried not to speak, tried not to look, her inmost thought.

"Yes, I met her in the street, and she carried me off with a beck; for she said she had something for you, and here it is."

He gave his basket to Deft. A little white paper parcel lay in the corner, but Deft was in no haste to open it. Her father looked much more impatience and interest—his face, indeed, was a curious representation of delight.

"Open it, Deft," said he. So she took out the package and opened it—beautiful flowers again.

"Captain King sent 'em to her, and she was up to dividing. You must go and see her room. She wants you to come."

"Yes," Deft commented, kindly. But she had laid the flowers back in the basket. She did not care to hold them in her hand. She hardly looked at them. Their purity, their sweetness, was not dear to her.

Old Hunter could talk of nothing else but of Sophie, and her singing, and her little room, until he fell asleep. She had played for him, and sung for him, and when he set out to come home she walked with him through the street till he came to the road from which he struck into the path that led to the light-house.

As he had talked Deft's hard thoughts became pitiful. The flowers seemed to plead for that poor girl of whom her father spoke so softly. She must visit her. She must—a vague plan for the girl's salvation, or deliverance, or justification, moved her to much thinking. Very grave and calm she became, trying to shape her thought.

For a time, while she sat in silence by the fire and her father slept his evening sleep, she quite forgot about the light-house business. But a glance at his wrinkled forehead, at his white hair, at the smile shining as a ray of sunlight over him—this glance conquered her to the overthrow of her composure. Peaceful slumber! she almost wished that he might never wake from it.

She promised her father that she would go with him to town next day. For he would have her make her vague promise that she would some day visit Sophie definite and immediate as to time. It was his pleasure that was to be consulted; besides, Deft had determined to see Captain King, even for Sophie's sake. The next morning, therefore, saw Earl Hunter and his daughter and Messmate on their way to town.

Earl went at once to market that he might secure the finest fruit. Deft left him at Sophie's door. But she only waited there upon the second landing until her father should have time to pass on beyond sight, when she descended the stairs again, hurried to the wharf, and sought for Captain King. She went straight to his warehouse on this search, but the Captain was not to be found that day; he had left town yesterday, one of his men told her, but when he would return was quite uncertain. In a week perhaps.

Deft Hunter may have felt some slight relief in hearing this. There was no other man to whom she could apply in her father's behalf; and when she left the wharf it was with a recognition of the fact that during the conversation she proposed she might have told him all. There was now no danger—no opportunity of resort to him—no blame for neglecting to seek his interference. She returned to the street and the high brick building in whose fourth story attic was Sophie's abode. She ascended the flights of stairs without pause at either landing: she looked neither to left nor right—she was thinking of but one door, one face. At that door she knocked, but neither face nor voice replied. Again, again. Then she tried the door; it opened, and she stood in the chamber her father had described. It had a cheerless look to the eyes of Deft Hunter, in spite of carpet on the floor, books on the table, and a glass of flowers. Sophie was not there.

Deft crossed the room; she looked again around her, looked from the tiny window which the sunlight never entered. She sat down as if to wait. She rose up again. She recognized those books. The name of Captain King was written in each. She had held them in her hands before now. Each one was a favorite with him. Well, why should she wait here?

So Deft went away.

V.

Nearly a week passed on, and nothing more was seen or heard of Sophie or the Captain; and the dreadful secret of the light-house business was with Deft a secret still, and a torment and a terror, or she had not kept the secret.

Was the girl's heart frozen that its surging was so noiseless?

One day, as once before, Earl Hunter, preceded by Messmate, went to call Deft out to an afternoon's sail. The Captain and Sophie were waiting in the sail-boat, the old man said, and having delivered King's message he went back to the beach as fast as his feet could carry him. Deft offered no opposition to her father or herself. She must make one of this party of pleasure; if there existed no necessity except in her own mind, it there existed. And so she followed her father once more to the boat. Sophie had brought no basket of flowers with her today; no guitar lay wrapped in shawl or dress in the bottom of the boat; no wreath of myrtle was wound around the crown of her straw-hat; no gay scarf on her shoulders; she wore a shawl that would protect her, and a dress that any where, under ordinary circumstances, would have escaped observation. But her spirits had not undergone like modification; they were greatly gayer than before, and she welcomed Deft's appearing with a smile of perfect joyfulness, both hands stretched out toward her as Deft stepped into the boat, and it was for her father's sake, and for woman's sake, that Deft bent down and kissed Sophie, while the Captain rowed them from the shore. Ah, Polycrates, what didst thou know of sacrifice?

Deft might control her heart and tongue, but she could not at will rebuke the paleness of her face, that it should leave her when Sophie or the Captain questioned her, would know what had happened—if she had been ill? Neither could she, because it was her pleasure, persuade those anxious questioners that nothing had happened—that she never was stronger in her life. Neither did her offer to prove said strength by taking the oars and managing the boat prove any thing to either mind.

They did not go to the fort this afternoon, nor stop at any point until about sunset, when the Captain brought the boat down to a remote pier of the town and announced to Deft that he should not take her home till evening. They would return by moonlight, he had told her father; there was something going on in town which he wished her to witness; but, in the first place, they must get rid of Sophie. Deft let him have his way. Still the Captain seemed in no great haste to rid himself or Deft of Sophie; he took the girls to see a famous picture then on exhibition, after that they went into a restaurant and he ordered supper, to which he alone did any justice, for since they came to shore the girls were very quiet; and one of them, the strongest and the bravest, was, moment by moment, giving way to the sad fear that oppressed her, and the conviction of the hard task she must perform ere that evening should come to an end.

Leaving the restaurant the Captain, with Deft on his left arm, and Sophie on his right, led the way down the street, and halted at the door of the house where Sophie lodged. There he seemed to hesitate as to the further conduct of his plans, and having hesitated one moment other moments of doubt followed till Sophie, who guessed what was passing in his mind, whispered something in his ear, whereat he rallied, and said, aloud,

"So, so, Deft, you and I will go to the theatre and let this madcap look after herself. She says she will join us in time. But that's her look-out, if she won't go now."

Sophie ran up the stairs before the words were fairly out of his mouth; and Captain King wheeled about in an instant with Deft on his arm, and so they walked together in silence to the theatre.

It was not till they had taken their seats in the pit, already full of people, that the Captain spoke to Deft. But when she had recovered from the agitation of finding herself in the midst of such a glare of light, and such a buzz of talking, and Captain King had twice called her by name, endeavoring to obtain her attention, she hearing him each time, and pretending that she did not, all to gain possession of herself, which it seemed to her in this age of five minutes in which they had been alone together in the street and in the theatre, as if she never should do again, she turned her face toward him, and asked did he speak to her?

He had a folded piece of parchment in his hand when she looked, his face was full of emotion.

"Deft," said he, "you don't know how near you were to a precipice; your father came within one of losing his place. I swear I thought it was all over. But read that."

Deft Hunter took the document, but she did not open it.

"He will not lose it," she said. When she knew all, and was so cool about it, the Captain was amazed, and a little provoked.

"Here's a treat," said he. "I thought I had a surprise for you; but, by George, it's the other way!"

"I heard that an old man was trying for the situation," said Deft.

"What did you do about it?"

"Nothing."

"Did your father?—of course he knew it too."

"No."

"What! you alone? Who told you, Deft?"

She answered him. "You kept it to yourself, then. Would not even tell me!" he exclaimed. The Captain then thought over that fact in silence. She let him make the most of it unhelped.

"I heard what some folks were up to," said he, quietly, at length; "there was only one thing to do. I did it. I went to the office of the man who managed the business; I made short work of it. I would have walked a hundred miles, and begged harder than I had to beg, but Earl Hunter should have kept his post. He will keep it till the day of his death; there it is, signed and sealed."

All this was spoken in an undertone for her ear only. It seemed to Deft as if every ear in the theatre heard—as if every eye were upon her—as if every creature saw her sorrow and her shame: she would have burst into crying had her heart been free to its own way of expression at that moment. She would have fled from the house. No, she must sit still, just there, and thank him as he did deserve. But how shall she ever say to him what duty and womanhood demand that she shall say? even to him who has saved her old father from going down in sorrow to the grave?

VI.

The stage-bell rang, the curtain was rolled up, the play began. What was it to her? She held the document which Captain King assured her secured her father's office to him while he lived; she thought of poor Sophie. She will be brave, she will be just, her duty shall be done. Yes, yes, she dares not name her name, but she will be just, trust her heart; for herself—no matter. If Sophie belongs to this man, he shall never wait till he is rich before he lets the world know that she is at least honorably his.

All at once it is to Deft as if the Captain whispered Sophie's name. Deft looked at him; he is not speaking, and manifestly has not spoken to her—is not thinking of her; his face has an expression new to her, inexplicable. Her eyes follow his as if controlled by them; there, on the stage, stands Sophie. It is she whom the audience applaud.

Deft Hunter rose up in her seat with a low cry. A voice behind her said, instantly, "Sit down!" She stood in his sight; he did not hear the cry. Obediently she sat down; and then, of all those gestures and movements which were weaving a romance for the imaginations of the people—a romance strange as beautiful—she lost not one. But her face thus gazing was not like the face of Captain King, which was now bright as if it were illuminated.

A hundred times he glanced at Deft during this performance of ten or fifteen minutes. Once she looked at him, but their eyes did not meet.

When the excitement of this scene's representation was over, and the play went quietly on, Captain King turned to Deft Hunter. "Her fortune is made," said he.

And Deft looked at him. "For her owner, do you mean?" was on her lips, but she did not say it.

The Captain observed that look; and it was in his heart to answer, for he was angry that applause was wanting from the very lips that could have spoken the best, to his thinking. "Jealous of her!" But neither did he speak the hateful reproach.

But now came to utterance words Deft could not restrain.

"Captain King, what are you going to do with Sophie?"

"I don't know," he answered slowly, looking at the questioner amazed, and yet a smile lurked close behind the amazement.

"Then I know," she answered. "You must marry her. They say you have bought her. You own her! Good Heavens! The rest was true—is this? Then you shall marry her, I say." In the midst of the crowded, narrow seats, in the theatre's full glare, she spoke these words; standing on the beach with sea before and shore around, she could not have spoken less conscious of any presence save that of Captain King. His eyes flashed while she spoke: she was braver than a lion; for an instant his face was full of passion. He trusted himself to speak, however, and his voice trembled.

"The devil you do!" he exclaimed. "Hum—she is a pretty creature. I own her, do I? Well, she don't give me any trouble, why should I marry her? Deft, haven't I said a hundred times I wouldn't marry till I had an independence, and was able to support my wife well?"

"Yes," replied Deft, quietly; "but now you haven't a right to put it off a moment. You have no right to wait for independence. You have no right to be independent."

The Captain did not laugh, nor smile. He said, quietly, with dignity, but his anger was all gone,

"Since you say that, Deft, I won't put it off. I'll be married to-night. I thank you for your advice. Here, give me the document. It is mine. My wife shall carry it home to your father."

"Very well," said Deft, "she has a right. Thank you, Captain King. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you, Sir!"

There she sat beside him, tranquil, still as a statue—she had said all, and all was over. Duty, womanhood! she had flung love overboard; no danger of the fate of Polycrates. Self never would inform her human love again.

Just after she had thus answered the Captain the curtain was rolled up again, and Sophie appeared once more before the audience. Oh how they cheered her, because she came to show them beauty as she had found it! How they thanked her for that loyal service she was rendering, by all that was within and of her, to the truth as she perceived it! There was in this scene another person on the stage with her—a young man—and they danced together.

"Deft," said the Captain, "I may as well own up. It's all over."

"What?" she asked, as one might speak who is aroused from the unconsciousness into which he has been thrown by torture.

"I can't marry that girl. I can't marry Sophie."

"You can not, Captain King?" How gravely she spoke; there was at least no evidence of torture.

"She's married already."

"You are married to her. God—" But no, Deft did not speak that blessing, if it was blessing she had tried to pronounce.

"Not I!" said the Captain. "Don't you see, you blind girl, she's married to the stage, and nothing but death will them part, or I lose my guess. I mean that!"

"Ask her first," said Deft. "You must ask her, Captain King."

"Do you see that fellow dancing with her, Deft Hunter?"

"Of course I see him, Captain King."

"Deft, I'm getting angry. I don't understand you; by thunder you're an eclipse. That boy is her brother, or just as good and better! You don't understand relationships. I found him at last. They had lost each other, somehow. It was part of my business to find him when I went to look after the old man's light-house. Don't speak to me. Oh, you begin to see! They are going to play here, those two, for a month yet, maybe six months. I should think so, to look at this audience. Don't you see that if I marry that girl I must go on to the stage. I'd make a pretty dancer! wouldn't they applaud me! But for all that, I'm ready to be married to-night, and you're the woman to hold me to my word, if that's your game, Deft. And my wife shall carry the old man his commission. Oh, you girl! You are Deft Hunter, are you! Doubting me! But if you doubted me you did stand your ground for Sophie. Deft! I'm rich to my mind if you'll say it. Rich enough this minute. Don't girl; bear up, bear up! Hang your fine houses! where's a better than the old stone hut? See! overboard goes the ring! The fish don't swim that can catch it and be caught."

As one helpless, powerless, is borne through the fierce water that shines so bright, and looks so pure, by the strong arm of the swimmer, whom ocean can not master, to the calm, bright shore, so Deft Hunter, silent, voiceless, helpless, when there was only herself to help, let the Captain save her.

THE BAKERTOWN MILITIA.

THE townships of New England are mostly divided into parishes or ecclesiastical societies, which are subdivided into school-districts, not numbered according to age, like the Congregational Churches, but named from circumstances connected with the history of each particular section. Any native of this region will readily recall to mind some ludicrous names familiar from childhood, and if questioned, would doubtless be able to tell their histories. We had in our small parish a Bakertown district, a Palmertown district, a Brunswick, Pudding-hill, and Pinch-gut—which last always obtained a small share of the "means of grace" from the manifest aversion of ministers to making the appointments.

The origin of all these names I knew well when a child, and, harsh and vulgar as they may seem, should object much to their losing character by being exchanged for a nomenclature more euphonious and elegant. These districts are all picturesquely rugged, like the character of the English Puritan Carvers and Fullers and Robinsons, or of the French Huguenot Waldos, Devotions, and Luces, whose pilgrim feet found their way, some time toward the close of the seventeenth century, to the hills of Eastern Connecticut. But, though strongly tempted, I can not wander far into the past to-day.

The home of my childhood was in one of the wildest of these wild districts, sloping down to the beautiful Shetucket. Every rock and stream, as well as every shrub and flower indigenous to the region, was as familiar to my youthful eyes as the lambs of my father's flock or the fruits of his orchards. For no sooner were the winter snows melted from the hills than a merry party of us went forth to search for the scarlet berries of the winter-green among the leaves, or for the sweet, shade-loving arbutus, with which the woods abounded. And every summer month brought some new incentive to our roving young feet. There were whole meadows of strawberries in June, thickets of whortleberries and blackberries in July, copses of hazel-nuts in August, and all the autumnal fruits in grand succession to crown the closing year.

The district school-house stood in a secluded spot—a spot too barren for the culture of any thing on earth save country lads and lasses. But these flourished well here under birchen rule, and have gone forth noble men and women to the remotest ends of the world, with a farewell to Bakertown on their lips, and rich memories of many a Bakertown frolic in their hearts. Brothers and sisters of my native district, in whatever lands the fates may have wafted you, "Long may ye wave!" Should your eyes ever fall on this simple sketch, you will be ready to bear witness to the faithfulness of the representation.

Our school-house, like the Gospel-house, was "founded on a rock." Behind it rose a lofty ledge of granite—a natural fortification of the little seat of learning below. Every winter bastions and block-houses of snow were ranged along the summit of this ledge, and youths with martial airs, armed with strange-looking weapons, were seen going hither and thither, as though the Bakertown district were threatened with some foreign invasion. Sometimes a gay "Rob Roy" banner would float for a few hours over the parapet. But when school was closed you might have seen the same modestly folded around the form of the prettiest girl in the district—sweet Carrie Waldo, whose death not long after dissolved the whole parish in tears.

But the Bakertown boys became a little obstreperous at last, and as neither Brunswickers, Pudding-hillers, nor Pinch-gutters came to meet them in "battle array," they began, as larger armies have sometimes done, to seek a home field for action. Their weapons, which have not yet been described, became instruments of offense altogether, and led to their own destruction.

Never in any locality has the elder-shrub (Sambucus caprifoliæ) grown in greater luxuriance than in Bakertown. Its hedge-rows, crowned with myriads of white, umbrella-looking clusters, were the summer fragrance of the fields. So valuable were these blossoms accounted in the nursery hygiene that huge bouquets were hung to dry in the store-room of every farmhouse, while elderberry wine found a place in the cellar amidst the choicest domestic beverages. From some person—it must have been from the parish minister, I suppose, since no one else around knew any thing about Hebrew—we learned that that nation formerly made a musical instrument of the elder wood, called a "sambuca," whence its botanical name.

It was quite too learned a name, however, for the Bakertown boys. Their own plain elder or pop-gun wood suited their tastes better, and was a good deal more significant. "The oldest Jew living," they used to say, boastingly, "never begun to see any thing made of elder half equal to a Bakertown pop-gun!"

I don't know but the boys were right. I am very confident that pop-guns of such length and calibre were never seen elsewhere! And those were the weapons of the Bakertown Militia.

Every boy in school, and some of the girls too, if I recollect aright, had a gun suited to his size and capacity. Some of them were prodigious, and carried a double charge—and that, too, before the days of Colt's revolvers—not of fire and death, however, but only of tow wads. Such large arms belonged exclusively to the officers.

Some of our readers may have heard of the wag's logical way of showing the true ruler of a Connecticut community to be the Yankee school-master, "who ruled the boys, who ruled their mothers, who ruled the men, who ruled the roost!" One winter our time-honored ruler went to seek his fortune elsewhere, and we had a new teacher—a gentle, book-loving young man, reared in the neighborhood, consequently, prophet-like, without honor.

The old master had long been absolute. Insubordination never prevailed in his realm, for every symptom of disobedience was most effectually crushed in the bud. An adamant barrier rose betwixt his dignity and the turbulent waves of youth, which, surge and foam as they might, could never o'erleap that boundary wall.

But another order of things came in with the new régime. Was not the pale, stripling-looking youth the crazy old huckleberry woman's son, whom the children all laughed at while listening to her strange stories? Every body in the district knew "Granny Woodban." She was one of the Bakertown appurtenances, living in the berry fields all summer, and wandering off no one knew where in winter. Her son was a scholar and a genius, and had fitted himself for college behind the plow and in the chimney-corner of the farmer's kitchen, to whom he was "bound."

Such was the young man who had presumed to ask the district fathers for the privilege of guiding their sons and daughters a little way along the path of science, and for the consideration of ten dollars a month to outfit him for college. For which act of presumption the martial youths of the district voted him a suitable butt for pop-gun aim. As though the poor fellow's homelessness and worse than orphan lot were not sufficient for a nature sensitive as his to contend with, without the addition of insult and injury?

Meekly the new teacher commenced his work, determined to overcome by faithful, persevering kindness, the rebellious dispositions of his young subjects, and bring them all to friendly allegiance. It was a thing much more easily conceived than accomplished, however, as the poor young man discovered afterward to his sore grief and disappointment. Night after night, and day after day, did he rack his aching head for some mild means to win the refractory boys to obedience; he could devise nothing which had not been already tried. New books awoke no enthusiasm. The evening spelling schools were fully attended; sides were chosen, and every one was praised for doing well. But then, in the very face and eyes of the instructor, the victorious side would fire a pop-gun volley at its own success.

Now in all this the young master discovered more of mischief than of malice, and acted accordingly when counseled to inflict corporeal chastisement upon the offenders.

"Flog my boys soundly as they deserve," said one and another of the honest farmers, to the patient preceptor; "and if that don't supple them, we'll take 'em in hand ourselves."

It was friendly advice, and well meant; but the stripling teacher had no thought of matching his strength with the sturdy young yeomanry.

"They have been driven with too tight a check-rein already, and will come into a natural pace by-and-by," was the pleasant reply of the master.

"Wa'al! wa'al! mebbeso! But mind, Charley, we charge you not to let them run away with you fust. Solomon's law was a middlin' good one: 'A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back.' The lads are full on't, and no mistake."

"Full on't" they were indeed; but the long-suffering teacher was determined not to lose temper, though their pop-guns were the plague of his life. They greeted his morning advent to the school-room and his evening departure! Yea, sometimes in the very midst of his lessons, the pop-pop told that somehow one of the big guns had discharged its twin wads; by what impetus was not plain to be seen, as every boy in school appeared most intently studious at the moment.

But one day they went a step beyond even the teacher's patience and forbearance, and a crisis was the result. It was "Committee Day"—the day when the elected officers came to visit and examine the school for the first time that season. It proved a committee of one that afternoon, as only the parish minister made his appearance. According to custom we all rose at his entrance; but following no precedent whatever, the boys greeted his reverence with one of their tallest salutes, every one of them pushing his ramrod vigorously at the same moment.

A flush of mortification overspread the pale face of the master, who for a full hour had been prescribing tasks and exhorting us to good behavior; then he became paler than before. I was a little girl, and sat on a low bench directly in front of the desk; and should have cried outright but for the merry twinkle of the minister's black eyes, and the pleasant smile with which he received the salutation as though it had all been done by order of the teacher himself, and not by a band of young rebels.

It was very kind in the old man not to frown and scowl, and make bad matters worse by unfitting the poor master for the regular exercises of the afternoon. He felt it to be so, and the boys saw it in the same light, and did their very best afterward at the lessons, and kept unusually quiet during the "remarks," and in "prayer-time." Moreover, when going home from school that night, they declared they would make Parson Fisher their chaplain, as he knew how to appreciate an honor.

But the days of the Bakertown Militia were numbered. The next morning the teacher appeared with a countenance as serenely mild as ever, though some of the boys afterward affirmed they saw a tiger in his eye from the first.

"We will omit the usual exercises this morning," he said, pleasantly. "I think it would be better to have a drill. Captain Tracy, call out your company!"

Teacher and pupil exchanged glances. There was no mistaking the word of command. The "Captain" was chief no longer, but a subordinate; and prepared to obey the order of his superior.

The roll-call was made and responded to with military precision; then the young soldiers were ordered to fall into line in front of the school-house, where a drill began such as the little company had never before undergone.

The command, "Right!" was given in a full voice by the master, and every urchin did his best; though two or three of the younger ones turned heads to the left instead, and had to be regulated. Then came the second order, "Front!" and every face was turned forward.

"Attention!" All eyes were fixed on the master.

"Right—Face!" And the movement was performed accurately.

"About—Face!" was the next command, and there was some blundering, the right feet getting too near the left heels in the first place, which the master would by no means allow.

Captain Tracy stood resolutely by the teacher's side, watching with surprise and interest his instructions, and learning more than he had ever known before of military tactics.

After the "Facings" were gone through with sufficiently, the principles of the "Ordinary Step" were explained, and the mode of executing it. This took some time, and was followed by "Forward—March!" when the twenty boys were all in motion, and kept in motion until the order "Halt!" arrested their steps.

Four in rank, elbow to elbow, the young rogues were then drilled in the "Practice of arms;" and the way the pop-guns were handled for the next hour was amusing to the girlish spectators, though quite too tedious to detail. Enough that they "drew ramrods," "rammed cartridges," "made ready," "took aim," and "fired," until but one charge of tow was left. Then nothing remained for them but to "march" again at the master's command back into the school-house and fire a last gun.

It was done; and but one more order was given.

"Captain Tracy, I am satisfied with your company. Instruct your soldiers now to 'deposit arms;'" and he pointed significantly to the open Franklin stove.

There was no shrinking nor hesitation. With a proud gesture the gallant young leader advanced toward the stove and laid his own weapon first on the blazing fire, and in five minutes every pop-gun was reduced to ashes.

"We are your boys now for the winter, Sir," said the Captain—a great noble-hearted lad in spite of his mischief, as he bowed respectfully to the now recognized sovereign of the school-room! "We only wanted to know our master, and have found him at last, entirely to our satisfaction."

The drill ended in a hearty laugh, with the kindest feelings on all sides. At noon the pop-gun company was disbanded by mutual consent and dispersed forever. A "debating club" arose out of its ruins; and before spring those same soldier-students were gravely discussing questions of national policy and moral justice, to the infinite surprise and satisfaction of the district-fathers, and of the old parish minister also, who never, to his dying day, forgot the salute of the Bakertown Militia.

SUNSET AFTER A SHOWER.

OVER the hill-tops, fold upon fold,
Like blood-stained banners within the sky,
Braided with crimson and fringed with gold,
In a sea of amber the spent clouds lie.

Down in the valley the slumb'rous trees
Droop, heavily jeweled with fallen rain;
And a spicy scented, tremulous breeze
In ripples crosses the bending grain.

The winding river, like silver, gleams
Through dreamy vistas that melt and fade;
And the sunlight, falling in slanting beams,
Strikes deep in the heart of the forest's shade.

On distant uplands the lonely pine
Is ringed with purple and bound with fire;
The stones in the church-yard glance and shine;
And the weather-vane is a gilded wire.

The tapering cedar, like a spear,
Shoots out of the cliff, where stands revealed
The rocky ledge; and the herd appear
Like spots of color within the field.

VOL. XXIII.—No. 135.—A A

And the braided banners of cloud are seen
To fiercer burn, as with sudden shame;
While the vale below and the hills between
Are drowned in a yellow mist of flame.

And a farmer's boy, all aglare with light,
Looks over the cliff where the cedars grow,
And shades with his hand his dazzled sight,
And calls to his comrades down below.

Then the brazen woodlands echo and ring,
And the earth and sky seem to shout with him;

A pearly arch is the hawk's fleet wing;
And the sweltering landscape seems to swim.

On yonder hill-side a cottage shines—
The window westward flashes and glows—
It nestles amid its sheltering vines
Of glistening ivy like a rose.

And there in the porch two lovers woo—
Her slender figure his arms enfold;
While two doves in the dove-cote kiss and coo,
And ruffle their necks of green and gold.

A READING BY CHARLES DICKENS.

ON Thursday, April 13, of the present year, Charles Dickens read at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. I was in London, and went to hear him. This was the second in a series of three readings, and consisted of the "Christmas Carol" and a chapter from "Martin Chuzzlewit," introducing Mrs. Sairey Gamp.

Mr. Dickens appeared about eight o'clock, dressed in a sumptuous manner. Thus the nose-gay at his button-hole was a size larger and several hues brighter than that pleasant conceit of nature in fashionable circles is apt to be. And the area of frilled linen presented by his bosom was in extent great, and in whiteness out of the reach of suspicion. It was, moreover, studded with doubtless expensive and certainly showy buttons. In addition to which there was that in the tie of his white cravat which bespoke faculties of mind not developed, so far as I am aware, in any of the published works of its author. The handsome suit of black, with its crest of dazzling linen, was carried off well by his figure. Some men are born to dress well, some achieve fine dress, and an unfortunate majority have it thrust upon them. Most of us prefer to slouch, because conscience advises us that broadcloth and fine linen is not our clothes' line. I was not shocked by the elegance of Mr. Dickens's dress. I did not believe, as I regarded from my stall its many attractive features, that they were combined as an occasional oblation to the British aristocracy which was gathered about me and directly in front of him, in all the fullness of toilet, and all the glory of four shilling places (one stipulation of admission to which, duly "intimated" on the tickets, was the total absence of bonnet from the female head), and with which I was bravely pretending to be related, although inwardly conscious of offending the proprieties of that select circle at every button-hole and in every crease. Not shocked, because surely that man could not be accused of deferring to any poor and slavish taste; it could not be said that he needed the indorsement of good clothes to cover weak brains and empty heart. Indeed, it was gratifying to the senses to see the snug fit of his garments, for it told plainly that youth still holds hopeful and genial rule in the person of one of the world's best men, and that time has stolen from him none of the elasticity and strength which go into all of his sweet human philosophy, and give his writings their sympathetic touch. Besides, it was a handsome dress for any man. It was becoming and harmonious, and so was a piece of art as much as the finest-toned picture the writer ever drew. I am rapidly writing myself down a snob: but the English pay more attention to dress than we Americans; and in view of the comeliness and decent behavior which are imparted to all their public assemblies by attention to this matter, I am disposed to note the observance of a polite habit by Charles Dickens for the benefit of all men of letters in this country who profess an interest in æsthetics, and who hope to extend their cultivation by appearing before the public in mysterious and eccentric garb.

I would say, if closely questioned, that the crowning characteristic of Boz in print is youthfulness; just so of Boz in person. He is spry, stanch, and bright there; so he is here in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly. Years have gone since his boyish form was circumvented and besieged by my eager fellow-countrymen, and time, since then, has worn upon the edges of his life as the ocean has worn upon its shores; but I believe that, if his ample beard is growing gray, and if his active brain has at last cleared a small space on the top of his head, nevertheless the glance of his eye is full as rapid, and sure, and brilliant as then, his step just as light, and his fingers just as nimble for the story of the year. Long may it be before any one of the wonderful energies which have been exerted so long only for blessing and drawing together the people is paralyzed!

But I am not, like Mr. Thackeray, writing a series of "Roundabout Papers," and should be telling about the reading.

I suppose the applause of the large and intelligent audience which followed the first spoken words of Mr. Dickens, namely, that with permission he would pause five minutes after the reading of the "Christmas Carol," was a spontaneous grant of that permission, given in entire good faith, and in ignorance of the spell of eloquence which should presently bind every heart and make it stingy of time. It had just time to die away before Mr. Dickens began to read the "Carol."

And here, at the outset, and once for all, I must protest against the word read in this connection. That verb could have been properly used to express the process of Mr. Thackeray in the matter of the "Four Georges." It was not by impersonation, not by tone, gesture, and attitude, that Mr. Thackeray realized to his audience the characters of those illustrious monarchs; and you would say that as that little Christmas Story had already spoken for itself to hundreds of thousands of the old and young, and had left the impress of its characters upon all hearts capable of receiving an impression at all, it would bear the gentle treatment of the lecturer's desk without loss of effect. I can imagine the "Christmas Carol" read by its author with good emphasis and a sufficiently clear voice, but without any attempt to convey the distinctive traits, or character, of each personage beyond that of the words themselves; and can imagine an audience moved irresistibly by the simple reading. Add, then, to the natural effect of any intelligent reading of the matchless sentences of Boz, the great personal interest of a reading, even the simplest, by their live and hearty author; and superadd to this the powerful influence of one of the greatest actors alive. By this compound addition only can you form a conception of the actual charm of a reading by Charles Dickens. For Dickens is an actor; and the drama is all the more wonderful because the dramatis personæ are sustained by one man, and presenting, as Mr. Dickens's characters eminently do, the "very form and substance of the times," varying from light to shade as truly as the natural landscape, are sustained with equal fidelity and with the same striking success.

The English are proud of Robson. To leave London any time in the last ten years without seeing Robson would have been, as it is now, a liberty taken with the Lion. His little theatre in Wych Street is permanently plethoric. It is where Parliament "lets up." The bar and the clergy go to Robson for encouragement to pursue their steep and straight ways. If the excellent Queen shows a decided preference for any one of her round of metropolitan amusements, I think it is for the Olympic, for the royal box seems always swept and garnished as if she might drop in at any time, and royal laughter has had a good deal to do in raising the roof of the house time and time again. The night before this reading I had seen Mr. Robson in one of the parts which are deemed "his own"—a serio-comic old chandler in a little drama called "The Chimney Corner," which was then crowding the Olympic every night. The effect of the performance was so strong upon me—there was such deep feeling in the whole delineation of a single-hearted, queer-spoken tradesman, subjected to the crushing suspicion that his loved son was an arrant and heartless scoundrel, and struggling to bear up a name that, humble as it was, had never been dishonored, and to sustain the spirits of his old woman while his own were fallen quite out of reach—that I was in a measure loth to experience Dickens so soon, lest the best impression he could give me would be dull beside the vivid and warm impression of Robson. Yet it was not the enthusiastic verdict based upon some solitary stroke of mimetic skill, or particular sketch of character, but a gradually grown and ripened conviction, when the last word had been spoken and Dickens was himself again, that not only was he a greater than Robson—not only the greatest actor I had seen in England—but an artist who realized for the first time positively my highest conceptions of the art, and enfolded it so tenderly and imperceptibly with nature that it became a part of one's self—sensitive, suggestive, and intimate.

I am not a dramatic critic. But if it were my business to discriminate nicely—to play the detective upon the passions and sentiments of the human heart—I should be extremely happy to point out many of the most notable effects produced in the reading of the “Christmas Carol.” First, I should give, as concisely as possible, the plot of this interesting—No, is it not written among the bright holly-berries of every Christmas tree, and deep down amidst the uttermost plums of every Christmas pudding? Has it not sounded cheerily over thousands of leagues of winter frost, and with its Christian warmth made land and land one great hearthstone of charity and love? Will plum-puddings perish ever—will the cry of merry wishes ever be forgotten—will stockings fail of their saccharine supplies, while type holds together to tell that wondrous tale? Well could the reader omit many of the mere descriptive passages. The dramatic skeleton was clothed by his genius with flesh and blood; and the memory, not the imagination, of the hearer supplied the outer garments in which it was first introduced to society at large. Digressively, I thought that the critics who accuse Dickens of an excessive elaboration and descriptive word-spinning found some confirmation in this blotting out of all background from his pictures, and leaving his figures to stand alone against the clear blue of nature. His dramatic power is shown so great that I wonder the action was ever encumbered by episodes of the imagination, however brilliant or startling. Yet I believe that, in some theatres, the accumulation of scenery and properties is so enormous that they must be displayed on the stage in great and perhaps unwarranted profusion nightly, simply to get them out of the way.

“This is wonderful!” I said to my shilling copy of the “Christmas Carol,” when I found that certain gruff tones, like those of Scrooge—and so unlike the manly and pleasant tones of Mr. Charles Dickens—were actually proceeding from that gentleman's mouth. That mouth was strangely altered from the playful expression it wore a moment since. The jaw was dropped, and in falling it had pulled the corners of that mouth down with it, together with each and all the muscles of the face in general, so that the expression conveyed was one of tightness, and hardness, and coldness. What wonder that the voice which proceeded from that pucker of bad feelings should have seemed like the voice of my old master in the bill-breaking (and heartbreaking) line, who was daily ferocious about small scraps of paper flown to the floor, and used-up pens, and who died—a snug rest to his little soul!—some years after the publication of the “Carol?” It was evident to me, after comparing this sketch of a morose old man with kindred “assumptions” (regularly critical) experienced at various theatres, that this was Mr. Dickens's forte, or, to be more professional, his line; and I regretted sincerely that I was deprived of the pleasure of seeing his Scrooge with the important auxiliaries of dress, scenery, and space more extended than that of a desk. I wished that Tavistock House were opened occasionally to the select and critical public, or that Mr. Robson might be enabled to effect an engagement with Mr. Dickens, or that Mr. Dickens might become sole lessee and proprietor of the Olympic, and engage Mr. Robson as first supernumerary.

“This is wonderful!” I observed to the beautiful white flower without any smell that was sticking in the copious hair of the blonde aristocrat in the stall before me, as out of that same mouth proceeded a small and pleading voice, precisely like that of Scrooge's clerk; and the same remark, with forte emphasis, was addressed to the folds of my handkerchief when a stern, inflexible, and apparently remote voice called Scrooge to the scenes of Christmas Past, and the audience about me were hushed as I have seen many an audience hushed for the ghostly scenes of Hamlet or the “Fiery Phantom of the Ferns,” and I expected that the glaring lights of the chandeliers in the dome would burn low for once, and the nose of an old gentleman a few seats distant would emit a pale phosphorescent glow; and once more, at the risk of being tiresome, I repeated it to my shilling “Carol” when the sick and lame little voice of Tiny Tim arose from the bosom of the Cratchit family; and, finally, when I had actually seen the mother of that family, and trembled in the company of the two other spirits, and established an acquaintance of a close nature with the street-boy whom Scrooge requested to go and fetch the big turkey still hanging in the corner shop, and whose response consisted of the one word “Walker!” articulated with shrill incredulity, I saw clearly that that remark had lost all its original force, and was no longer applicable to any circumstance of the case whatever. I was ready to believe all I had ever heard of the charm of those private entertainments at Tavistock House, and to attribute the lion's share of the success to its master and proprietor; and was able to understand the interest in persons and things theatrical which has given the world, in the pages of his works, so many faithful sketches of life and character “behind the scenes.”

Besides all this versatile and truthful delineation—and I entreat all persons who have seen it and felt it to bear me out that I have not exaggerated its extraordinary dramatic merit—there is an element of the reading, which, although more closely allied to the personal than to the artistic side, gives it the pleasantest flavor. I allude to the unaffected and hearty enthusiasm of Mr. Charles Dickens himself. He evidently enjoyed the thing quite as much as any one present. I can not imagine a happier condition for a successful author or artist of any kind than to be able to share the favor of the public toward his works—to appreciate and rejoice in his own “good things,” long after they have been set down in the catalogue of past successes—to recognize suddenly, some fine day, in a page not often turned, one more clever bit than he had given himself credit for, and to make of the matured children of his fancy or sober judgment constant companions. And truly the sight of this great writer chuckling over every one of his own funny conceits, or droll expositions of character—following the ghosts of his own creation as if indeed he were walking through the dim shadows of the Christmas Past and Future, and seeming relieved and glad of a glass of water when the mystic spell was broken—pausing after an amazing recital of the dance that Mr. Scrooge was made to see, ending with that irresistible idea of legs that actually “winked,” in order to put the book up to his face, as if marginal red face and merry twinklings of eyes and mouth did not tell the audience that he was quite overcome with laughter—I say, to see all this was to explode at once the dismal theory that comedians are the heaviest of sobersides off the stage, and that facetious authors view their own jokes with loathing. I could see the good thing coming on. Mr. Dickens’s own eyes and mouth couldn’t keep the secret. The one began to expand and twitch at the corners, and the other to be rapid in their orbits. Then the reader seemed to draw up closer to his audience, as if not to miss the shock when it came, and presently, with a very ridiculous attempt to be serious for the moment, he let it fly. Waiting a few seconds to catch the shouts of the galleries, as well as the more dignified explosions of the stalls, he threw himself back a step or two from the desk and gave himself up to it.

He appeared particularly to enjoy Mrs. Sairey Gamp, which historical personage, in company with her friend Mrs. Harris, was introduced after the reading of the “Carol.” I should say Mrs. G. is one of his favorite characters. The preparations of the Cratchit family for their Christmas dinner, however, were as clearly nuts to him. The progress of the pudding was as vast and serious a matter to that handsomely dressed gentleman as to the smallest and hungriest of the Cratchits, and its successful completion filled him with joy. The naturalness of this sympathy was attested, I think, by the vain show of calmness and insensibility on the part of the reader. But it imposed on no intelligent hearer. Why should he try to conceal that which is the very heart of his genius, sympathy—the golden undercurrent of all the writings of Charles Dickens, which has brought him near to so many hearts, and established him in the best seats in the houses of the highest and lowest?

The reading lasted nearly two hours. When it was done, Mr. Dickens bowed and lightly stepped away, without any allusion to the next and last reading of the course. The audience lingered, after their rounds of applause, until his retreating form “finally disappeared” behind the screen. I wonder if they, like me, were spooney during that brief pause, and followed Charles Dickens with benedictions for all the happiness and good cheer he has been able to bring into a world never too free of snarlers and sneerers, and longing desires of life, and health, and happiness, for him and his, these many years to come! If they were not spooney then, they had been more than once or twice during the two hours; and if Lord John Russell, that great man (who happened to be present on this occasion), had ventured so much as to suggest that I was standing there like a fool while he wanted to get by and thence home to dream of foreign dispatches, I should have retorted savagely that I saw him doing something besides the right thing with his handkerchief when the death of Tiny Tim was suggested, and indulging in immoderate laughter (for a minister) during the entire presence of Mrs. Gamp.

THE HELPING HAND.

“NOT even a word of recognition!” The speaker was a woman. Over her gentle face had fallen a shadow of disappointment. She was sitting at a table, in a plainly furnished room, with books, magazines, and writing materials before her. In her hand was a literary review, the last page of which she had just turned.

“Not even a word of recognition!” she repeated, in a tone of discouragement. “Every book but mine noticed; mine, into which my heart went with such a loving interest. I am hurt, and can not help it!”

She laid her cheek upon her hand, and sat, sober-faced, for a long time. Then arousing, with a sigh, she turned to the table, and shutting her port-folio, murmured,

“Yes, it may be so. Only a few possess distinguishing literary ability; only a few have power to command the public attention and move the public heart. I am not, it seems, of the number. Ah, well! It is of no use striving with the inevitable. I must step aside, and give place to men and women of higher endowments.”

She arose, and began walking, with slow, even steps, the floor of her room. After a while she resumed her place at the writing table. She had just seated herself when a servant came in and handed her two magazines and a letter. She glanced at the letter, and not recognizing it as from any known correspondent, deferred breaking the seal until she had looked into the magazines, which ought to contain notices of her book. Her hand was nervous as she cut the leaves of the first one opened; and her eyes went, hurriedly, from page to page. Then she became motionless and intent. There was recognition here! Twice she read the notice of her book; then leaned back in her chair, with wet lashes quivering on her crimson cheeks.

"Feeble, commonplace, and harmless. We may commend the volume to parents as a safe one to introduce among children."

That was the recognition.

"Feeble and commonplace." The tears which had wet her lashes swelled now to a flood and ran over her cheeks. She was hurt to the quick. Earnestly, thoughtfully, and with true and delicate perceptions of mental and moral states, had she written, thinking more of the good to be done than of the fame to be acquired. She had intruded her consciousness, with a clear-seeing vision, into the actual of human life, and held a mirror up to nature. But the critic, dipping in here and there, and scanning this page and that, out of all just connection, saw only commonplace things and trite moral sentiments. No brilliant passages arrested him; no gorgeous cloud-castles of thought which the sun of reason dissolves into airy nothings; no ambitious paralogisms of sounding and unusual words meant to conceal meagre thoughts; no, nothing of these were found: and so, without taking time to comprehend the author, her book was thrown aside with the easy utterance of "feeble, commonplace, and harmless," and thought of no more.

Nearly ten minutes went by, and then the other magazine was opened.

"Writes carelessly at times"—"a little more attention to style would give greater acceptability to her works"—"nothing very brilliant or striking; but a deal of human nature and solid sense"—"will do good in her day, but scarcely be heard of in the next generation; books of this class do not live."

There were some flashings of indignant feeling from the no longer wet eyes; lips curled proudly and a little defiantly. Our author was but human. The simple love of doing good was not strong enough to bear her calmly through an experience like this.

"A lady wishes to see you," said the servant, opening the door again.

"Who is it?" was inquired.

The servant gave her a card, on which she read the name of a friend.

"Say that I will be down in a moment." The servant withdrew, and she made a few trifling but hurried changes in her toilet.

"I fear my visit may be an intrusion on your time," said the friend, as they stood with warmly clasped hands; "but I felt constrained to call this morning."

"No visit from you can ever be an intrusion," was replied. Light was breaking through the face over which clouds lay a moment before.

"I have just finished your new book," went on the visitor. "As I turned the last page I felt a strong desire to tell you how much good it had done me. My mind was in darkness as to a great principle of life when I commenced reading. That principle you illustrated in so clear a manner that I now see it as in noonday light. I thank you, my sister, for true words distinctly spoken—thank you not only in my own name, but in the name of thousands to whom they will come in blessing. God has given you the power to move hearts, and, what is still better, the will to move them for good."

Dry eyes were wet again.

"There can be no higher praise than this!" was modestly answered. "Whatever power I possess is, as you have said, God's gift; and I pray ever that He will show me how best to use it in His work. I am not very strong of wing; I can not, eagle-like, dwell above the mountains. At best I am a home-bird, singing under the eaves, or cooing at the windows."

"The birds we love and cherish," said the friend. "But why do I see tears on cheeks that should be radiant with smiles?"

"The heart is weak. It is not always satisfied with the simple doing of good. To do good is so easy, so unimposing, so unattractive, and commonplace. The world admires the brilliant and the aspiring; will stand gazing at the eagle as he rises toward the sun, all indifferent to the robin, the thrush, or the dove. The imposing and the difficult extort admiration, while a simple good deed is often misjudged as pharisaical, and earnest admonition to do right sneered at as cant."

"Dear friend, I can not bear this from you," answered the visitor. "Why in so strange a state? You are not envious of the eagle?"

"Oh, no, no! Not envious, I trust."

"What then?"

"I am human, and human nature is weak. We can not, unmoved, hear our work depreciated."

"Has yours been depreciated?"

"Yes. This book, which has helped you, meets with no favor from critics. One passes it as of no account, not so much as announcing its publication, while another calls it dull and harmless. I should not care for this, I know. But the heart is weak. Such things hurt and discourage me. I feel as if I had no true power."

"And yet you have power to move the heart and enlighten the understanding, as thousands can testify. You need not care for a superficial or prejudiced critic, if you can speak to the people, and stir the common pulse. Your work is with and for the people. You comprehend their daily life-trials, and are gifted with ability to speak to them understandingly. Your work is not to amuse, nor to extort admiration, but to help. You do not write from a poor selfish desire to get praise and fame, but to do good—good in all degrees of life, from the highest to the lowest. And few, my friend, have been more successful. I would rather have your sheaves in my garner on that day when the Lord of the Harvest shall come, than the sheaves of any worker that I know in your field of labor. I say this sincerely, and may it give you comfort and strength! Don't, as Emerson says, think, in your work, of its acceptability, but of its excellence. Do it always earnestly and well, according to the gifts by which you are endowed of God, and He will take care that no hand obstruct its course. Just so sure as it is vital with the power of helping your brother or sister in weakness, or of lighting them in a dark way, will He make your voice heard."

"I thank you for such strong words of encouragement," said our desponding one, as the calm dignity of conscious strength and purity of motive came back into her face; "and thank you, especially, for that last suggestion. Emerson has struck the right key—has given the true philosophy. I have been thinking more of the acceptability of my work than of its excellence; more of what might be said of it than of what it was. Thanks, again, for this helping hand in a moment of weakness! I shall be stronger, I trust, in the future."

Alone, after this friend had departed, and stronger than before she came, the criticism that stung so sharply was read again.

"'Writes carelessly at times.' That is a fault," she said, "and should be corrected. 'A little more attention to style would give greater acceptability to her works.' Then it is my duty to give it more attention; and I will endeavor, and feel obliged and not hurt by the suggestion. 'Nothing very brilliant or striking, but a deal of human nature and solid sense.' Why, that is a positive compliment! I read it as a sneer before; but now it has a tone of sincerity and goodwill. 'Will do good in her day, but scarcely be heard of in the next generation; books of this class do not live.'"

The closing sentence touched the quick again. Not heard of in the next generation! No permanent life in such books! It was hard to accept of that judgment.

"But what," she asked herself, as right thoughts took their right position in her mind, "have I to do with the next generation? My work is in the present, and if I can do good in my day, the effect will not only go to the next generation, but to all generations. As to the life of my work, if there be in it a heavenly vitality it will not soon die."

The letter which had accompanied the magazines, and which had been forgotten, now looked up from the table and claimed attention. The seal was broken:

"DEAR LADY,—Forgive this freedom; but my heart is so full of thankfulness that I am constrained to write. Your last book has been to me a saviour and a consoler. Oh, in what a midnight of passion and error was my soul groping, when light came to me through you, and I saw a gulf at my feet! Back, back, back I moved, shuddering! And now I am on firm ground, with reason clear and conscience in her place. How clearly, yet how tenderly and lovingly, did you demonstrate a truth, which, had it come to me in almost any other way, I would have rejected. But as a gentle, wise, and considerate sister you approached me, and laying your hand on my arm, said, 'Come and let us reason together.' You first won my confidence, then beguiled my interest, and then told me the truth in such calm, direct, and earnest words that I was convinced, warned, and saved. God bless you, my sister! You will never know the good you are doing until it is revealed in the world to come. Go on—go on, in Heaven's name! The heart of a stranger blesses you, and says, Faint not, fail not."

Tears flooded the lady's face again; but there was no bitterness in them now. The helper was helped in her hour of weakness, and strengthened against the enemies of her peace—enemies, we mean, who were lurking in her own bosom, and exciting pride, ambition, and love of fame, so that they might act as hindrances. Stronger, calmer, and in a nobler spirit even than before, she turned to her work again, and gave to it that living vitality by which it had power to overcome evil and establish good. Neglect and cold unappreciative criticism had made her comprehend her own weakness, and been the means of opening her mind more interiorly, so that it could receive a higher influx of light. She was stronger and wiser from self-conquest, and thence able to infuse more of wisdom and human love in all that came from her hand.

LOUIS NAPOLEON: PRINCE AND EMPEROR.

I.—PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON.

IN the spring of 1848 I made a flying trip to Europe for the benefit of my health—a trip literally unpremeditated three hours before it was undertaken. I reached Liverpool early in April, at the commencement of the lovely spring season of England. I think that the most charming weather I have ever known in any part of the world I have found in the British Islands during the months of April, May, and June, particularly the two latter. Nothing can be more strongly contrasted than the London of that period of the year and the London of November.

In my opinion the English climate is greatly misappreciated by foreigners. The sun is not always obscured by fogs, as many hasty tourists, in their exceptional experience, assert to be the universal case. I am confident that nowhere else can out-door exercise be taken with enjoyment so many days of the year, and so many hours of the day, as in England. I have always sensations of physical comfort there which I never experience any where else. This I attribute to the moisture with which the atmosphere is generally impregnated, and which exercises a most soothing influence upon the nervous system. Here the dryness of the air keeps us constantly strung up above concert pitch. We are all the time under the influence of an artificial stimulus. We burn our candles at both ends. I account in this way for many of our national peculiarities, both physical and moral.

I took the afternoon train for London with two countrymen, one of them a distinguished politician and the other a leading member of the press. Being all of us smokers, we were anxious to obtain a carriage where we could enjoy our weeds without interruption. On all the European railways (except in Germany) there are regulations prohibiting smoking, but their violation is always connived at by the guard (for a consideration), provided no occupant of the same carriage objects. The first-class carriages contain but six seats, and hence it is not always difficult to make up a unanimous party. In the present instance we feed the official in advance for the purpose of securing a place to ourselves. Just as he was unlocking the door of a hitherto unoccupied carriage for us to enter, an elderly and exceedingly gentlemanlike Englishman, with one arm, came up, and remarking that he did not think he could be mistaken in taking us for Americans, inquired if we had any objections to his joining us, as he recognized us as smokers from the cigars in our mouths. Of course we assented readily, and this was the commencement of one of the most agreeable journeys I ever made by rail. Our accidental companion turned out to be Sir Fitzroy Somerset, afterward Lord Raglan. In his capacity of aid-de-camp to the Duke of Wellington, he had been on a special mission to some of the great manufacturing towns to watch the movements of the disaffected Chartists, from whom a formidable demonstration was expected in London upon the occasion of the presentation of the monster petition to the House of Commons, which was to take place in the course of a few days. It will be remembered that this echo of the Paris Revolution of the previous February was looked forward to, throughout England, by the orderly classes, with very considerable apprehension.

We arrived at London in the evening, and parted with our distinguished traveling companion with mutual assurances of the pleasure we had derived from our chance acquaintance. My friends had rooms engaged at Morley's Hotel, Trafalgar Square; and although I, as an old habitué of London, was only too familiar with this second-class inn with first-class prices, I was unwilling to forego their company, and therefore ordered my traps to the same destination.

I found that nothing else was thought of or talked about in the capital but the Chartist business. There was very serious and widely-spread alarm, in which the Government, to all appearances, fully participated. Apropos of this, I will mention a circumstance of comparatively secret history. The Duke of Wellington was sent for by the Queen, and requested to take supreme command of the troops upon the occasion. This he consented to do, with the proviso, however, that he should have an absolute dictatorship for the time being, and be under no circumstances subject to any orders from the Home department. This condition was acceded to, and there is no doubt that had an attack upon London been attempted he would have proceeded to the utmost extremities in its defense. The Court retired to Windsor or the Isle of Wight—I forget which—a day or two before, and Punch and the other wits amused themselves vastly at the expense of Prince Albert, who as a field-marshal should have remained at the post of danger. It was supposed that her Majesty was peremptory upon the subject, and overruled any martial propensities which her consort might have possessed.

Great preparations were made for the defense of the Bank, the Royal Exchange, and other public edifices—especially the Bank, the treasure in which was likely to attract the cupidity of a revolutionary mob. The roof was protected by sand bags, behind which marksmen could be safely placed. The night before the anticipated outbreak large stores of arms were conveyed there and to other places in covered wagons from the Admiralty. My friend of the press came to grief that night from his excess of curiosity. About nine o'clock in the evening he made his way down past the Houses of Parliament to the head of Westminster Bridge, where cannon were planted to rake the insurgents who were expected to come over on the morrow from their camping-ground on Kennington Common. Here he was ordered back in very peremptory fashion. Strolling up Whitehall, he managed in some way to slip by the sentinel and to get into the court-yard of the Admiralty, admission to which was strictly forbidden for the nonce. Here he was pounced upon in short order. In vain he protested that he was only an enterprising Yankee, actuated by no worse motive than curiosity. He was carried off to durance vile, and only liberated the next day upon establishing his identity.

The most exaggerated rumors were circulated in reference to the number of the hostile masses collected on the Surrey side. The general estimate did not fall short of thirty or forty thousand, which was afterward proven to be enormously in excess of the reality.

The preservation of the peace was primarily intrusted to the police, and, in addition to the regular force, a large number of special constables were enrolled for the occasion. The military was only to be called out as a last resort. Some twenty Americans of us lodging at Morley's offered our services as specials, which offers were unhesitatingly accepted. And when the time came, each armed with a formidable club which he had received from the authorities, we were as ready as any loyal subjects to do battle in defense of law and order. It was rather an interesting and exciting sight as, at nine o'clock on the morning when the demonstration was to come off, I was quietly taking my tea and muffins and looking out of the coffee-room window upon Trafalgar Square. The whole area was densely filled, principally by a large body of police, who were going through their military evolutions with the precision of soldiers. Among them was a small corps of mounted constabulary, ready for a charge down Parliament Street if occasion should require it. A good many roughs were scattered about, but they gave no indications of any but the most peaceful intentions.

At ten o'clock I emerged from the hotel, and took a short stroll up the Haymarket. The shops were every where closed and the streets were filled with people. I only remained out about half an hour and then returned to my quarters.

About eleven o'clock I noticed unusual indications of preparation among the police on the square, and shortly afterward a dense mass, composed of the lowest classes of the population, came struggling up Parliament Street and commenced to debouch upon the open area. They were singing and shouting, and seemed more impelled by the love of a frolic than by any thing else. In a moment about a dozen mounted policemen charged at a full gallop, and the mob, by some remarkable power of elasticity, made way for them in every direction, laughing and hurrahing as they did so. This brilliant cavalry coup decided, as it were, the fate of the day. The Chartists never attempted to cross the river, overawed probably by the reception which they knew was prepared for them. After that there were nothing but amusing episodes. It was known that London was full of French revolutionary agents, and wherever these gentry showed themselves they were treated with any thing but distinguished consideration by the populace. I saw one unfortunate apostle of liberty, equality, and fraternity so severely ducked in the basin of one of the fountains of Trafalgar Square that I was afraid that the poor man was taking his last bath.

The rest of the day was a sort of carnival. No one attempted to transact any business, and the shops remained closed. Fun was universal, and the special constables, whose name was legion, paraded the streets with a consciousness that their valor had not been very severely tried. That evening the monster petition was rolled into the House of Commons and duly presented by its godfather, Fergus O'Connor. The next day I happened to be accidentally at the railway station as Fergus was leaving for the country. Poor fellow, he died insane some years ago, and I am not quite certain that his insanity was of very recent date.

One or two evenings afterward, the Court having returned to Buckingham Palace, the Queen went in state to the opera. I took especial pains to be there, for I expected an extraordinary exhibition of loyalty. And I was not disappointed. I recollect that the opera was Don Giovanni—a work which calls for the entire strength of the company, both male and female. The house was packed from pit to dome. Her Majesty entered as the orchestra was playing the overture. In a moment the whole house rose and cried with one voice for "God save the Queen." The orchestra ceased playing, the prompter's bell tinkled, the curtain rose and displayed all the principal artists ranged in a semicircle on the stage. At a signal from the conductor a prelude was played, and then Grisi advanced to the footlights, and with the glorious voice she then possessed, sang the first verse, the whole house standing, Majesty and all. The chorus was taken up by the other singers and by the entire pit. Then Mario sang a verse, and then Persiani, and then Lablache. I never witnessed such a scene of wild enthusiasm. It was so contagious that I am confident that her Majesty had no more loyal subject there that evening than myself. The boxes forgot their propriety entirely, and marquises and countesses vied with each other in waving their handkerchiefs and clapping their hands.

I mentioned at the outset that I had come over in the pursuit of health. I was the bearer of a letter of introduction from a distinguished physician in this city to Sir Benjamin Brodie. I had called upon Sir Benjamin soon after my arrival in London, when he made an appointment for me to come again at nine o'clock on the morning after this operatic fête. Punctually at the appointed hour I arrived at his house in Saville Row. The servant who admitted me told me that Sir Benjamin was very busy with some ladies who had come from a long distance in the country, and that I should have to wait until they left before he could see me. Accordingly I was shown into the library, where I found a cheerful fire, and the morning papers lying upon the table. Drawing up an arm-chair to one corner of the fire-place, I seated myself, crossed my legs, and was soon deeply immersed in the leviathan columns of the Times.

I had been reading ten minutes, perhaps, when the door opened, and another gentleman was ushered into the room by the flunky. The stranger was a short, thick-set man, evidently a foreigner, and dressed in an irreproachable suit of mourning. I glanced at him furtively from my paper, and settled it in my own mind that he must be a German. In accordance with English custom, not the slightest recognition of the other's presence passed between us. He hovered over the table a moment, selected a paper from among several still lying there, settled himself in a chair at the other corner of the fire-place, and followed my example by devoting himself to the news of the day.

After a time I became tired of reading, and threw down my journal. The stranger in a few minutes did the same. I then had an opportunity to notice his features more particularly. He was a heavy, dull, impassive-looking man, and his half-closed eyelids gave a peculiar expression to his face. I observed that his arms and legs indicated remarkable strength, but he did not look like a person of much activity. His arms were very long, and his legs quite short; for he stood of low stature, and sat decidedly tall. He had a curious habit of rubbing the side of his nose with his forefinger—a habit which has frequently attracted my attention since in the same personage. For some minutes we sat like two fools, or like two thoroughly well-bred Englishmen (by no means synonymous terms, however), pretending to gaze at the fire. At length my companion opened the way for conversation by remarking that it was a fine day. His accent, which was very marked, confirmed me in the impression that he was a German. I assented to his observation, and the ice once broken, we soon got on famously together—he taking me for an Englishman, and I taking him for a German. From one subject we passed to another, until he introduced that of the Chartist affair, upon which he talked so well that I became greatly interested. He was unbounded in his praises of the good sense of the English people, particularly of the lower middle classes, meaning the shop-keepers and artisans. He was happy at having had the opportunity of seeing so satisfactory and striking an exhibition of this. "You will never see a violent revolution succeed in England," he went on to say, "although with your institutions you are in a state of continuous revolutionary progress, so to speak. There is a vast difference between the classes to which I have alluded here and on the Continent, especially in France. Every thing moves here in old and well-worn grooves. The London shop-keeper of to-day follows the same business, at the same stand, which his father and his grandfather followed before him. He has the sense to appreciate the difficulty of making a livelihood among so dense a population should he once get off the track. In a word, he knows that, in a general scramble, he has more chance of losing than of gaining. Hence, apart from his feeling of loyalty, which is deep-rooted, should an effort ever be made to overthrow the Government, he would always stand by the authorities. Your agricultural population is only instinctively loyal, not intelligent. I do not mean at all to imply by what I have said that your shop-keepers and artisans are not dissatisfied with many things, and do not claim and will not exercise the right of unlimited grumbling. But at the bottom they know that your Constitution is a self-purifying machine, and that there is a never-ceasing tendency to improvement. On the contrary, every Frenchman is a man of unlimited ambition. He is impulsive and emotional—moved, too, by noble instincts. One of his great mistakes is that he always expects to better himself by a change; consequently he is always ready for a change. He can not be governed as your people can. His God of to-day is his demon of to-morrow."

I do not wish to be understood to quote these as the precise words of my interlocutor. But they represent substantially what he said.

We must have been talking together half an hour when Sir Benjamin opened a door which communicated by a passage-way to his study, and bowing to my companion, called me in—probably because I alone had an appointment. As soon as I was seated he asked me if I knew who it was that we had left behind us in the library. I told him that I did not—that I thought he was a German—that at all events he was a remarkably intelligent man, although he by no means looked so. "Well," he said, smiling, "that is Louis Napoleon!" This, be it remembered, was a very few weeks before he passed over to France to take his seat as a member of the Legislative Assembly. I asked Sir Benjamin what was the motive of his visit to him. He told me he had some trouble about the heart—whether organic or functional I did not inquire. I never met

Louis Napoleon again until I saw him in Paris, six years later, Emperor of the French.

And here perhaps I ought to close this chapter, as my personal reminiscences of the exiled Prince go no farther. But the subject is a tempting one, and as accident has brought me into contact with many persons who knew him during his residence in England, the reader will perhaps excuse me if I draw a little upon the recollections of others.

One of the best friends he ever had on the north side of the Channel was Miss Burdett Coutts. This estimable lady was unceasing in her kindness to him; and what is still more, she was the first person to appreciate him at any thing like his actual value. So high an estimate did she form and express of his ability and genius that her friends were greatly amused at what they considered her good-natured but most unfounded prejudice in his favor. The fast young men of London generally pronounced him in their polite slang "a bloody fool." He was very intimate at the hospitable house of Mr. B——, the great London merchant, at East Sheene. Mrs. B—— had a horror of smoking; but the Prince, when a visitor, was allowed to smoke, as a special favor, in his own room. Upon such occasions the other gentlemen present were told that, if they wished to smoke, they might do so in the Prince's room. One evening he was very anxious to return to London about ten o'clock. He had not come in his own carriage, and he was reluctant to ask Mr. B—— to lend him one. In this dilemma he came to a friend of mine who was stopping in the house, and asked him if he minded requesting another gentleman with whom he was intimate to lend him his cab to go to town, without mentioning for whom he desired it. My friend unhesitatingly complied with the request: but the owner of the cab insisted upon knowing who wanted it, saying that he suspected it was "that bloody fool, Louis Napoleon;" and if so, that he should not have it. And it was with the utmost difficulty that he was finally induced to yield the point.

Lady Blessington and Count D'Orsay were like a sister and a brother to him. The gates of Gore House were open to him at all hours, and he freely availed himself of the tendered hospitality. The only reproach of serious ingratitude of which the subject of this chapter has ever been accused refers to his alleged neglect of these persons, when, during his Presidency, they came over to Paris after the breaking up of the London establishment in consequence of pecuniary reverses. So far as D'Orsay is concerned, the President tardily, it is true, conferred upon him an exceedingly honorable and tolerably lucrative place, which, however, he did not live long to enjoy. His neglect of Lady Blessington, although perhaps not excusable, may be partly accounted for by the peculiar position which her ladyship occupied in English society. He may have hesitated to invite her to his balls and receptions, fearing to give too much offense to her countrywomen. At all events he delayed a very long time before doing so.

Lady Blessington was one of the wits of her day. Shortly after the French Revolution of February, 1848, a foreign ambassador in London asked her in French what she thought of M. De Lamartine. "He reminds me," she instantly replied, "of an incendiary who has turned fireman." Some time after her arrival in Paris an invitation came from the President to a ball at the Elysée Bourbon. This she accepted, and as soon as the President saw her enter the room he advanced to her, and, taking her by the hand, said he was glad to see her, and asked her if she intended to remain long in Paris. "No," she promptly answered, "do you?"

No one in London, it is said, had a more open palm for the future Emperor than Mitchel, the manager of the St. James theatre. It may be remarked that no borrower of money ever more scrupulously returned it than Louis Napoleon has done. When he and the Empress paid the Queen a visit in 1854 or 1855—I forget which—he had been but a few hours in London before he sent for Mitchel, with whom he conversed familiarly for a considerable time, showing that with the change in his fortunes he had not forgotten old friends.

It is related—but I can not vouch for the truth of the story—that upon some occasion a wag imposed upon the credulity of the Prince by a forged letter of invitation to dine with the Queen at Windsor. Now in those days her Majesty was on terms of great intimacy with the Orleans family, and ignored poor Louis Napoleon completely, having declined even to receive him at Court. However surprised, therefore, he must have been at so unexpected a mark of royal favor, it would seem that he did not suspect its genuineness. Donning a full uniform, and arraying his groom in a gorgeous livery, he drove to Windsor, where he discovered that he had been hoaxed, and it is said that the Queen was not even gracious enough to see him and relieve somewhat his mortification. If this is not a canard, he has had an ample revenge. He has both visited and received her Majesty since he has become the most powerful monarch in the world.

I recollect meeting a gentleman who had known the Prince well. He told me that he once went out hunting with him and his cousin, Prince Napoleon. As they were driving to cover, Louis Napoleon was dull and moody, whereas his cousin was full of excitement about the anticipated sport. But the moment they backed their horses they changed characters. The one became full of daring and energy; the other was quiet if not timid.

During the Presidency Lord A——, formerly Prime Minister, paid a visit to Paris. After being there a week, constantly in the society of the President, he wrote to a friend in London that he could make nothing out of him but a dismal, dreary creature! How wide of the mark he was time has made manifest.

II.—THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III.

I have had very frequent opportunities of seeing the Emperor Napoleon III. in public, and more than once I have met him under circumstances of some interest.

Some time in the winter of 1854-'55 I had the honor of being presented to him and the Empress at the Tuileries. It was one of those wholesale presentations of Americans which take place periodically, and which are always more or less accompanied with ridiculous incidents. The day appointed was, as is usual for such ceremonies, a Sunday, and the summons was only issued Saturday evening, and not received by many of the parties interested until the next morning. Gentlemen were required to present themselves "en uniforme," and ladies "en toilette de ville"—this latter expression meaning in full visiting dress. The embarrassment resulting from the tardiness of the notice may be imagined. The men rushed frantically to Woodman's, on the Boulevard des Italiens, that accomplished snip being the purveyor-general of court-dresses to Yankee Doodledom in Paris, and constantly keeping on hand an assortment ready made, which he hires out as masquerade costumers do. Those who were fortunate enough to present themselves Saturday evening, not only had the first choice, but were in time to have such alterations made as were required to give something of a fit, whereas the unfortunates of Sunday morning had to take what was left as they found it.

Such a battalion as presented itself at the Palace at noon could only be compared to Falstaff's regiment or a New York militia company. Coats too big and coats too small; sleeves too long and sleeves too short; trowsers dragging under the heel of the boot, and trowsers not reaching down to the ankle-joint; a miscellany of cocked hats, and a universality of swords that would trip up the inexperienced wearers. And all this, apart from its unsuitableness to each individual case, worn with the awkwardness peculiar to novices in such attire. The women were more fortunate, being generally provided with all the necessary articles of adornment, nothing unusual to them being required. Charming as most of them appeared, there were a few whose appearance was such as to keep their male companions in countenance. You will find at any time in Paris a certain number of peripatetic American ladies whose whole being is shrouded in mystery—who come no one knows whence, and after a while go no one knows where. They usually rejoice in the convenient title of widows, and are looking after some important interests, the precise nature of which it is difficult to ascertain. I recollect, upon the occasion in question, one little woman whom nobody knew, and whose appearance excited some attention. She wore a rusty black silk dress, very high in the neck, an enormous shell cameo brooch, and a Canton crape shawl, which had been originally white in years gone by, but which was then, to speak plainly, most disgustingly dirty. After we had formed in a line on one side of the room, finding herself inconvenienced by the heat, she removed this shawl and threw it carelessly upon an arm-chair, of which several were standing in a row opposite to us. A few minutes afterward a chambellan or aid lounged into the room, and stood for a moment by the fire-place. Suddenly this suspicious-looking garment caught his glance, and he stuck a glass in his eye to examine it more particularly. Then, stepping on the points of his toes, he deliberately advanced to it, skewered it on the tip of his sword, gravely recrossed the room with it, and threw it down out of sight in a corner. It was not a pleasant thing to see done, but the owner was an "unprotected female," and her ideas of "toilette de ville" were evidently not up to the standard of the French Court.

Imagine us, then, ranged as in a drill-room, awaiting the imperial approach. In the same room with us, on the other side, was a delegation of Spaniards, Mexicans, and South Americans. We were probably placed together on account of the affectionate sympathy existing between our different nations. In another apartment, the door of which was open into ours, were congregated the English and Germans, the greater part of the former (the men I mean) in scarlet yeomanry uniforms, with an occasional sprinkling of stunning Highland costumes. The British ladies, in general elegance of mise and beauty and grace of person, bore no comparison to our fair countrywomen. Why are the English women so unaccountably awkward? why have they such painfully large hands and feet? and why is their taste in dress so almost universally bad? Beautiful complexions and full forms can not atone for these deficiencies, nor can altogether cultivated minds and kind hearts.

Their Majesties visited this last-mentioned apartment first. Accident had placed me at the head of our line close to the door, in such a position that I had the full benefit of seeing how things were done before my turn came. At length the Emperor and Empress crossed our threshold, the former followed by a male, and the latter by a female, suite. The Emperor stopped directly in front of me, whereas the Empress continued on until she reached the person at the further extremity of the line. His Majesty merely exchanged with me a few commonplaces in French, and then addressed himself to my next neighbor. I continued to keep my eye on him in his downward progress until he crossed the Empress in her advance in my direction, after which my attention was directed exclusively to her. In due time she reached me, and had commenced saying something in very indifferent English, when she was interrupted by a laugh and the words, "Mais parlez lui donc en Français; il le parle aussi bien que nous!"—"Speak to him in French; he speaks French as well as we do!" Looking up in amazement, whom should I perceive but the great man himself, who, it seems, having completed his tour, had returned to the starting-point!

I have been trying in vain, ever since I commenced this chapter, to recall the name of the Italian shoemaker who fired at Louis Napoleon on the Champs Elysées, some time in the spring or early summer of 1855. He was an emissary from London, but died, if I recollect right, without exposing his confederates. He had provided himself with two pistols—the one a revolver, and the other an ordinary double-barreled one. He fired two shots from the side of the road at the Emperor, who was on horseback and quite near him, and fortunately for Europe and the world both missed. I happened to be in a carriage with some friends at a distance in the rear of but a few hundred yards, near enough to see the puffs of smoke, to observe immediately thereafter the gathering of a group of people, and then to notice the legs of a man who was being dragged into a cab. We were on our way to the Bois de Boulogne, and curious to ascertain what had happened, we ordered our coachman to drive on rapidly. When he arrived at the Barrière de l'Etoile, we stopped a moment, and, in reply to our inquiries, learned that the Emperor had been fired at, that he had escaped any injury, and that he had pushed on for the Bois, escorted by his aids Ney and Fleury. We were also told that the Empress and her ladies, in two Court carriages, had preceded him some ten minutes, and as yet knew nothing of the occurrence. In the hope of overtaking him before he reached the Bois, we put our horses to the top of their speed. But he must have ridden very rapidly, for we saw nothing of him until we came to the lake, when we perceived the party on horseback, followed by the carriages on the other side, coming toward us on their return. We at once reined up on the side of the road, and standing uncovered awaited their approach. The Bois was very crowded that afternoon, but evidently the news of what had happened had not yet reached there. As Napoleon passed we cheered him loudly, and in such a significant manner that he could not doubt our knowledge of the attempted assassination. He bowed in return, and I shall never forget his look. His teeth were closely set, and his face was literally of the color of old parchment. That this meant fear, I do not believe for a moment. The man does not know what fear is. It only indicated the strong emotion under which he was laboring. When the Empress came by she was smiling and chatting with the lady on her left, evidently in entire ignorance that her husband's life had been threatened. The moment the cortège passed, we wheeled into line and endeavored to keep up with it. But it was of no use. Our horses were not equal to the task, and when the imperial party reached the Triumphal Arch we were a long way behind. By this time the news had spread like wild-fire through Paris, and the Avenue of the Champs Elysées was one dense mass of human beings. As soon as the Emperor appeared he was cheered most vociferously, and he had not proceeded far before the pressure became so great that he was compelled to dismount from his horse, and walk all the remaining distance, which is a long one, to the palace.

I have already spoken of Prince Napoleon's Saturday evening receptions. Among them there was one which was particularly brilliant and distinguished. The leading lion of the occasion was the young King of Portugal, who was visiting Paris accompanied by his brother, the Duke of Oporto. The King was a slight, fair-haired, German looking boy (his father is a Coburg), timid as a girl, blushing whenever he was spoken to. He wore a pair of gloves immensely too large for his hands, which (his hands) he seemed to be in continual distress to know what to do with. He was almost swallowed up in the broad ribbon of a Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, which he put on according to royal etiquette, the French Emperor having assumed that of the Tower and Sword of Portugal. The Duke of Oporto was a rosy, plump, cool little fellow, increased in the oddest little dress coat imaginable, the skirts of which were a mere apology for skirts. The company besides included the Emperor and Empress. I never saw her Majesty look so lovely as she did that evening; Ex-Queen Christina of Spain, her husband, the Duke of Rianzeres, and their dashing-looking daughters, the eldest of whom is the Princess Czartoriska; the heir to the throne of Denmark; the Duke of Brunswick; old Prince Jerome; the Princess Mathilde; and of course the host, Prince Napoleon. A word about the Duke of Brunswick, whose peculiarities, although familiar to people in Europe, are probably less known on this side of the Atlantic. He is a deposed monarch, whose brother was put in his place by the people of the Duchy many years ago. When he left the country he managed to bring the crown jewels with him, and they have never found their way home again. For a long time he lived in London in great splendor, but recently he has taken up his residence in Paris, where he keeps up a sort of Oriental establishment just beyond where Judge Mason used to reside. His name may be recollected in England in connection with a vile paper called the Satirist, which I do not suspect any of my readers of having ever seen. This publication used to attack him week after week in the most scurrilous manner, and he determined to put it down, which he succeeded in doing after a great deal of perseverance. His eccentricities border upon insanity; indeed some people think he is stark mad—his subjects evidently thought so. He knows more about diamonds than any man living, and has one of the most magnificent collections in the world. He adorns his person profusely with them. Every button in his waistcoat is worth five thousand dollars. He wears a most extraordinary wig made of silk. The evening I refer to he had on a black silk coat, cut by himself it was said; certainly no civilized tailor would be guilty of such an atrocity. His face was painted in thick coats, not delicately touched. His manners are abrupt and supercilious. He is certainly a character. I was most amused by a dialogue which I overheard between him and the Princess Mathilde while standing at the Buffet, but I do not feel that I have the right to repeat it.

I have said that I never saw the Empress look so charming. She was seated on a sofa, floating in a sea of gauze, with a lady on each side of her, and I was standing facing her in a group at some distance, lost in admiration of her beauty. Some way off to the left stood the Emperor talking with the Pope's Nuncio. I was neither looking at nor thinking of any one but the Empress when suddenly some one said, "Bon soir." I abruptly turned my head, and, to my intense amazement, found it was the Emperor who was addressing me. I was both surprised that he recognized me, and still more so that he should speak to me, who was probably the most insignificant person present. He observed my astonishment, and with a smile went on to say:

"I have been walking through your department in the Exhibition this afternoon, where I saw many things which interested me, and one which I could not understand, and which has intrigued me—qui m'a intrigué—ever since. In one corner of Mr. Goodyear's compartment I observed a lot of cannon-balls of vulcanized India rubber stacked as in an artillery yard. How India rubber can be used for offensive purposes in warfare I can not conceive. That it might be advantageously, in combination with other substances, employed for defensive purposes I can well imagine—in breast-works, for instance. Perhaps you can give me the information."

I should say here that this was just before the opening of the Exhibition to the public. Now I had not even noticed the cannon-balls in question, and had to say as much to his Majesty, feeling at the same time desperately mortified at my ignorance. Of course I then understood why I had been spoken to. Having addressed me, I suppose the Emperor thought it would hardly be civil to leave me abruptly. His next question was if I took much interest in military matters. I told him that of course I took a certain interest in them, but had no professional knowledge upon the subject. He asked me if I had noticed the new cuirasses which he had given the Imperial Guard. I answered that I had, but that I did not understand the difference between them and the old ones. "I will tell you in a word," he said. "Their weight is" (I forget how much) "less, and their power of resistance" (same obliviousness) "greater." He then went on for some time to speak of arms and uniforms. Finally, he broke in,

"Have you heard the news from the Crimea this afternoon?"

This news referred to a successful demonstration on the part of the French. I answered that I had, and he continued:

"Well, it is encouraging—c'est encourageant; but we are still far enough off from Sebastopol!—mais nous sommes encore assez loin de Sébastopol!"

This was said with a smile, and in the most natural way possible—precisely as any one might have spoken to a friend in the street. Evidently he meant nothing more than he said. Had the remark been made public, people would have tortured their brains to find some Sphinx-like significance in it.

Hereupon he bowed, and, turning on his heel, left me.

The next morning, bright and early, before breakfast, I went over to the Palace of Industry, and made my way straight to the compartment of Mr. Goodyear. The first things my eye fell upon were the cannon-balls in question, piled up as his Majesty had described. In a few minutes Mr. Goodyear, Jun., came in, and I eagerly asked him for an explanation.

"Why, they are ten-pin balls, to be sure!" was his reply.

I never had the opportunity of setting the Emperor right upon the subject.

It would be out of place, in a series of light sketches like this, to attempt a serious appreciation of the genius and character of the singular man who rules the destinies of Europe. He is still something of a myth to his own subjects; a silent man among a proverbially talkative people—a man who never gesticulates in a land where gesture expresses more than words, he is only to be made out by his acts. His manner is eminently simple and natural. Like Captain Bunsby, although he talks but little, he keeps up a d—l of a thinking; but when he does talk, he does so without mystery.

Like most other people I have read a great deal about him. Nothing that I have ever seen, either in French or in English, in the way of an estimate of him, at all equals what Mr. Wyckoff has written in his last book. I do not know Mr. Wyckoff. I never, to my knowledge, saw him but once, and then he was pointed out to me at one of Mr. George Peabody's Fourth of July dinners at the Star and Garter, Richmond. But I strongly recommend any one who wishes to know more of Louis Napoleon than he will find elsewhere, to consult that book.

Among many talents which the Emperor possesses, he is probably unsurpassed as a judge of horses. As a rider, I never saw his equal, unless it was the late King of Holland. Insignificant on foot, he is superb on horseback. From the length of his body he looks like a tall man when mounted, and he and his steed compose a perfect centaur. To see him galloping at a review with the cent gardes at his heels is a magnificent spectacle.

It is not very often you see him in a carriage. Occasionally he gets himself up in gorgeous attire and accompanies the Empress. And sometimes of a morning you meet him driving himself a pair of spanking bays up the Champs Elysées, accompanied by a single groom, who sits behind him. But he goes mostly on horseback. At the time I have been speaking of he used to wear habitually, when riding for pleasure, an old blue frock-coat, the seams of which were white, and he indulged in a particular pair of old linen or cotton gloves, which it was distressing to behold.

His tact is wonderful. He has an extraordinary knowledge of the superficial peculiarities of the French people as well as of their deeper characteristics. Many anecdotes of him are related which show this.

When the Russian war was over he determined to make General Bosquet a marshal. Accordingly he invited him to a dinner-party at the Tuileries in common with a large party of guests, without communicating a word about his intention to him. After the cloth was removed the Emperor requested all to fill their glasses for a toast. When all were ready he proposed "the health of Marshal Bosquet."

While the works for the completion of the Louvre were going on, the Emperor used often to stroll there, cigar in mouth, to watch their progress. Upon one occasion he had not been there long when he noticed a group of stonecutters talking eagerly together. Presently one of them, cap in hand, advanced toward him in a hesitating and abashed sort of way: "My Emperor," said the man, "I have made a bet of five francs with one of my companions that you will allow me to light my pipe from your cigar." "You have lost," answered his Majesty, laughing; "but here is the money to pay your bet and treat your friends besides," at the same time handing him two Napoleons of twenty francs each. He thus managed to preserve both his dignity and his popularity. When Queen Victoria was in Paris, the Emperor was particularly attentive to the Prince of Wales. This rather distressed the Queen, who was afraid that some bad influence might be exerted upon her eldest son—that he might be induced to smoke cigars, or do something still more horrid. It is related that one day, when both families had been lunching at the palace of the Elysée Bourbon, the Emperor suddenly disappeared and the Prince with him. It turned out that they had gone by themselves for a two-hours' drive; whereat the maternal anxiety and distress were of the most acute kind.

I do not think that he is fond of these United States. I have some reasons for thinking so which I do not consider myself at liberty to give. But he is very civil to our individual countrymen, and sometimes very patient with them.

I knew a Spanish gentleman of rank who was sent to this country some years ago on a special mission. He had been very intimate in society in Madrid with the Empress long before she aspired to a crown. On his return from America he stopped for a time in Paris. Immediately on arriving he addressed a note to her Majesty requesting the honor of an interview. He received a prompt reply, in which she said that she regretted that her husband being at Boulogne, she could not see any one in his absence; but that he would be back in a fortnight, when she would be most happy to receive my friend. Accordingly, after the delay indicated he received an invitation to take tea at St. Cloud. He went and spent the evening en petit comité with their two Majesties. The Emperor did not talk much.

He was reading, or, more probably, pretending to be reading, the papers nearly all the time. The Empress was most particular in her questions about this country. Were the women so handsome as she had been told? Was there so much luxury in the great cities as she had heard? Was New York so magnificently built as was reported? I have reason to think that my friend gave a pretty favorable account of every thing. Finally, her Majesty asked him, all things considered, which he preferred, Paris or New York? "Paris, of course," he replied. Hereupon the Emperor withdrew his head from behind his paper, and, with a grim and ironical smile, exclaimed, "Quel mauvais goût!"—"What bad taste!"

MRS. JUJUBE AT HOME.

WHY this line of carriages standing in stately repose before Madame Larami's door in Great Jones Street? Why that continual in-pouring of old ladies in quiet silks and Indian shawls, and young ones trembling beneath the weight of flowery bonnets, and rustling with brocades? Madame Larami's negro boy, Alphonse, is weary of continually opening that heavy door, and bowing to his mistress's customers as they sweep up stairs to the show-rooms. He is beginning to doze, and the poor boy will be fast asleep in another half hour. Meanwhile Madame Larami herself is up stairs in her element. And what an element it is! What clouds of tarlatane floating like pink and blue atmospheres through the three rooms that form, en suite, the temple in which Madame Larami, as high priestess, sells, like other sacred officers, the benedictions and scapularies of the God of Fashion! What wonderful bonnets perched on wire frames, buried in masses of the best French flowers! What rivers of ribbons! What acres of shawls! What odors of luxury and elegance! The place glistens with shining satins and bloomy silks. Little groves of Marabout feathers wave gently in the perfumed air. Long mirrors here and there duplicate, reduplicate, and multiply in bewildering infinities all the elegances, the wonders, the charms of this rich interior. The rooms are filled with ladies whose toilets display an intoxicating splendor. They talk, they whisper, they admire this bonnet; they criticise that mantilla. They survey each other's toilets with eyes practiced in such scrutiny. A confused murmur of voices, a voluptuous rustling of rich silks, an intoxicating odor of a thousand delicious perfumes, intermingling, fill the rooms. Through this wondrous atmosphere Madame Larami glides quietly and gracefully. Her black eyes see every thing, her crimped and rather brown ears hear every thing. She receives orders, and delivers them to her book-keeper with wondrous rapidity. She displays a silk, calls attention to a bonnet, or insinuates a charming shawl. With what address she induces those who hesitate over a mantle to make their decision! How carelessly she attracts their attention to those dangerously beautiful pocket handkerchiefs just arrived from Paris! There is a new style of sleeve to be shown to Mrs. Chrysalis, which will suit her figure admirably; Madame has a marvelous piece of lace for old Mrs. Honiton, who patronizes "point," and comes to parties looking as if she had been dipped in coffee after she was dressed. A hook has been baited for fat Miss Tintamarre with a freshly-invented collar, which is fast and knowing, and will suit that rapid young lady admirably. Miss Toko fastens on a pocket handkerchief, price one hundred and fifty dollars, the beauty of which consists in having only one square inch of material in the centre that can by any possibility be applied to the use for which pocket handkerchiefs were invented. The tall bride, Mrs. Tantalus, better known as having been the sarcastic and witty Miss De Fleche before her marriage, ponders over a brocade of large pattern. By-the-way, why will large women always wear large patterns? They surely ought to know that it nearly doubles their apparent size. In short, this is a field-day at Madame Larami's. All New York—or at least all that set that think themselves New York—is thronging to her show-rooms. There is a terrible murmur of consultation, and one might hear such words as "hoops—powder—wonder if it is becoming—red heels—shocking trouble," floating about the apartments. You get naturally interested in all this excitement, and begin to wonder at the cause of this concentrated extravagance on the part of your lady friends. You listen a little more attentively, and at length you discover that Mrs. Jujube is about to give a bal poudré. Yes! all those heads that you see now dressed à la Vierge or à l'Impératrice, will have to be twisted and frizzed out, and greased and fluffed all over with flour; and those little feet, now pattering about Madame Larami's floor, will then be aching in queer little shoes with high heels and diamond buckles. There will be monstrous skirts and long stomachers, fans and whalebone hoops. Marquises will be abundant, and abbés as gay and dissipated as if we lived in the time of Scarron and De Retz. Dolcissimi, the Italian barber, is about to reap a golden harvest. He has already one hundred ladies on his list whose heads will have to be powdered and tortured for that eventful evening. His labors will commence at six o'clock in the morning and end at eleven at night. What lies he will tell in his broken English during that time! What ecstasies he will fall into over Miss Griffin's hair, who is as gray as a badger! How gracefully he will compliment old Mrs. Honiton on the smallness of her ears—for even Dolcissimi can not discover in that wretched old woman any other charm! With what a greasy chuckle the fellow will hint at Miss Tintamarre's approaching marriage! Nor is the excitement confined to Dolcissimi's establishment. There is a fashionable fever in all the pulses of the city. Livery-stable keepers, ladies' maids, supper-contractors, musicians—all share in this tremendous agitation. Mrs. Jujube's bal poudré will be one of those rare events that even fashionable people will remember for two months after it has taken place.

"Now, Harriette," said Mr. Roland de Boore to Miss Jujube as they sat together on a big sofa, arrayed in all the splendors of powder and brocade—"now, Harriette, you must on no account dance with that young fellow Beaufort. I positively object to it."

Miss Jujube bit her pretty lips, and said nothing.

"This is your bal de débüt, and it is given to announce at the same time your engagement to me. Now it would never do for the future Mrs. Roland de Boore to be seen dancing with an artist—a fellow that draws things for comic periodicals."

"Mr. Beaufort is as good a gentleman as any that will be here to-night," said Miss Jujube, in a cold and rather haughty tone. "Besides, he is clever, and I like him."

"A gentleman, Harriette! Why, he's an artist!"

"The words mean the same thing, Sir."

"Then am I to understand that you refuse to obey me?"

"There can be no disobedience where there is no right to command."

"Really, Miss Jujube," said Mr. Roland, with a furious look in his small white eyes, "one would think that you were more interested in this artist fellow than in your future husband."

Miss Jujube did not reply; but she rose slowly from the sofa, walked toward a mirror at the other end of the room, and, turning her back on Mr. De Boore, commenced arranging some of the pearls in her hair. Mr. De Boore, who was pale and short, with very thin legs, that were now completely lost in a large pair of mousquetaire boots, clutched the hilt of his sword, and uttered an exclamation which was neither "Mordieu," nor "Cap de Biou," nor any of the oaths of the period in whose costume he had attired himself.

"Well, Madam," he exclaimed to a large, red-faced woman who now sailed majestically into the room, arrayed as Anne of Austria—"well, Mrs. Jujube, this is a pretty bringing up to give your daughter!"

"What's the matter, my dear Roland?" said Mrs. Jujube, suddenly stopping, and looking as if she would like very much to have given a tragedy start, but was afraid of shaking the powder out of her hair.

"Matter, Madam! Matter enough, I should think. Harriette there treats me as if I were a dog, instead of her husband that is to be."

Harriette remained perfectly immovable before the mirror.

"Harriette, I am astonished!" exclaimed Mrs. Jujube. "What I hear is really dreadful! May I beg that you will immediately express your regret to Mr. De Boore?"

"I shall do no such thing, mamma!" said Harriette, turning round with a cold, determined air. "Mr. De Boore chooses to insist on obedience before he has bought his slave. Let him see to his purchase."

"I'm sure I asked nothing unreasonable," said Mr. De Boore. "I merely desired her not to dance with that fellow Beaufort—an artist, you know. It's highly improper the attention that Harriette pays him."

"Will you come and see the theatre, Miss Jujube?" said a tall, handsome-looking young fellow who just entered; "every thing is arranged."

"With pleasure, Mr. Beaufort," answered the young lady, taking the new-comer's arm, and sweeping by poor little Mr. De Boore as if he never existed.

"By Heavens, Madam!" said De Boore, in a fury, as the pair left the room, "if this continues the match must be off. That girl hates me!"

"My dear Roland," said Mrs. Jujube, laying her hand on his arm in a motherly sort of way, "you are quite mistaken. Harriette quite adores you; but she is very young, you know, and willful; and girls will be girls!" Here she looked profoundly at the young man, as much as to say, "There! you can't answer that, I think."

"She talked about my buying her!" answered De Boore, savagely. "You know very well that it is you who are buying me. You know very well that I could smash the house of Jujube tomorrow if I wished, and that the proposition came from your husband first."

"Alas!" answered Mrs. Jujube, with a reproachful sigh, "you do us injustice. Believe me, Roland, that no mercenary motive whatever induced us to seek this alliance. Your own merits, my dear young friend, were quite sufficient to account for our wishing this connection."

"Well, ma'am," said Roland, rather mollified, "I wish you would teach your daughter to be a little more respectful, if she is not affectionate."

"Taisez vous, mon ami!" exclaimed Mrs. Jujube, as a loud whistle without was followed by a scuffling in the hall; "here come all the people." And so Mrs. Jujube settled her skirts and prepared to receive her company.

Mrs. Jujube's ball was a most brilliant affair. "Our best society" is proverbially given to spending money, and such a golden opportunity as this was not lost sight of, I assure you. The diamonds, the dresses, the feathers, the jeweled poniards, the blazing buckles, that waved and flashed and rustled through the rooms that night were wonderful to behold! There was a minuet à la cour danced at the beginning of the evening which had been rehearsed by the performers with the utmost care for weeks previous. Then with what wild joy did the assemblage launch itself into a redowa at the conclusion of the solemn ceremonial of the minuet! Toward the middle of the evening the theatre was thrown open. Among other entertainments Mrs. Jujube had fitted up a very pretty little theatre, where a select few were to perform a little comedy, written by Mr. Beaufort for the occasion. Of these theatricals Mr. Beaufort had taken supreme charge. He had painted the scenery, written the play, directed the rehearsals, and scolded the performers. The piece was called "An Impromptu Wedding," and turned on the adventures of a young French cavalier, who found himself, by a series of strange events, compelled to marry a lady in order to save her life; was miserable at the way in which he has been obliged to sacrifice himself; but in the end discovered that he loved his wife, and was happy as a prince forever after. Mr. Beaufort played the hero, and Miss Jujube the heroine; while Mr. Roland de Boore, to his great indignation, found that Mr. Beaufort had not included him at all in the cast.

As the curtain drew up and the lights blazed out the little theatre sparkled like a gem. The gay dresses of the audience, the picturesque groups that formed here and there, the nodding plumes, and diamond-hilted swords might have made one fancy that they were in the theatre at Fontainebleau, about to witness one of the masques or pastorals of which Louis the Fourteenth was so fond.

The play went on, and was acted with the greatest spirit. Miss Jujube played the adventurous court-lady with admirable grace and vivacity; and Beaufort's splendid figure and handsome face made him an excellent cavalier. The little drama proceeded. The lady was taken as a spy in the camp of the Prince de Condé, and was about to be hanged, and the young cavalier had been forced by the conspirators to whose party he belonged to offer himself as her husband in order to save her life. The Prince had sent for an abbé, and the ceremony was to be consummated on the spot.

"Do you know that ceremony looks horribly real!" whispered Mrs. Tantalus to Miss Tintamarre, just as the abbé was marrying the despairing couple, who exchanged vows with averted heads.

"Yes," answered the young lady; "and Harriette does not, it seems to me, act this part as well as she does the others. She should appear angry and horrified, whereas she looks as if she rather liked it."

"Look at Roland de Boore!" joined in Mrs. Chrysalis, pointing, with a malicious smile, to where that young gentleman stood leaning gloomily against a pillar. "He does not appear to have any taste for the drama."

"As I live," exclaimed Miss Tintamarre, "Beaufort is putting a real ring on her finger! Did you ever see such a piece of impertinence?"

"He gives it to her that she may put it in her husband's nose!" said Mrs. Tantalus, with a sneer.

"Pon my word," said Miss Tintamarre, as the curtain fell on the act, "I never saw any thing so like a real marriage!"

"Don't say so to Mr. Beaufort," answered Mrs. Tantalus. "He intends the play to be a comedy, and you would be turning it into a tragedy."

"Harriette may like that sort of thing," continued Miss Tintamarre; "but for my part, I know, I should be very sorry to play such a character, and be married, as it were, by a sort of drum-head court-martial."

"You will never, perhaps, be cast for the part, my dear," said Mrs. Tantalus, wickedly, for poor Miss Tintamarre was rather passée.

Miss Tintamarre colored.

"If I were," she answered, rather spitefully, "I would endeavor to sustain my rôle."

It was now Mrs. Tantalus's turn to look vexed, for the world said that that worthy lady led her husband rather a sad life of it. "That would be kind toward your husband," she answered, "for he would have much to sustain also."

If Miss Tintamarre had not known by long experience that those who entered upon a wordy war with Mrs. Tantalus were always sure to get the worst of it, she would certainly have resented this allusion to her corpulency. As it was she bit her lip, and sat out the rest of the play in silence.

The whole of this wedding scene, which Miss Tintamarre and Mrs. Tantalus made the subject of their jests, was gall and wormwood to Mr. Roland de Boore. If he had not been a coward, he would have liked to have jumped on the stage and torn Beaufort limb from limb. As it was, he contented himself with grinding his teeth, and vowing vengeance on Harriette as well as the presumptuous artist.

The ball went on. Redowa, Schottische, polka, all succeeded each other until the festival of motion was crowned by the immortal "German." Then arose the fiery mist of excitement in which the dance is veiled. Wearied feet no longer lagged, slender necks no longer drooped with fatigue. Languid eyes sparkled, grave lips smiled, as couple after couple swung off in the intoxicating waltz. Feuds between young people were made up that night with a twirl round the rooms. Soft speeches were panted out in the orbits of wild polkas, that made certain little hearts beat faster, and certain little heads dream when they went home. All was music, motion, and fiery excitement. The powdered heads grew mottled, and the thick brown locks began to shine through the grease and flour. The wide skirts began to collapse, and the cavaliers' lace ruffles became limp and tumbled. Even the fairest cheeks seemed somewhat flushed and heated. Occasionally some young mousquetaire, with unsteady eyes and slippery legs, would make his appearance on the floor, in a brief attempt to execute a figure; but he would, after a few brief plunges, be dragged home to his seat by his laughing partner, where he would console himself with the bottle of Champagne under his chair.

Beaufort and Harriette Jujube danced together, while a little way off stood Roland de Boore watching and keeping up his courage by periodical visits to the buffet.

"De Boore looks mischievous, Harriette," whispered Beaufort to his partner. "Do you think he suspects any thing?"

"He suspects every thing," answered Miss Jujube, knitting her brow. "His mind was created only to hold suspicions."

"Very shortly we will make the experiment as to whether it will hold facts," said Beaufort, with a laugh. "It's our turn, Harriette," and the young artist and his partner darted off into the basket figure.

German cotillions, however, like all mortal things, must end. One by one the chairs grew empty, and the dim eyes and weary legs began to slink out by the hall door to their carriages. Beaufort and Harriette were talking earnestly together.

"Harriette! come away from that fellow," said De Boore, coming up suddenly to them. His face was flushed, and one could see that he had been drinking.

Harriette looked at him as if she had never seen him before, and then without reply resumed her conversation with Beaufort.

"Don't you hear me?" shouted De Boore, maddened by this contempt. "Give up that beggarly artist, Madam, or—"

"She hears you perfectly well, Mr. De Boore," said Beaufort, advancing calmly, in all the dignity of his six feet upon poor little Roland, who shrank as he approached: "but she will not answer you, first, because you have no right to question her; secondly, because you are impertinent."

"What authority have you, Sir, to mix yourself up in this business, I should like to know? Stick to your pencils, Sir," cried De Boore, quailing, however, before Beaufort's steady glance.

"The authority of a husband, Mr. De Boore," said Beaufort, calmly. "This lady became my wife a few hours ago in the presence of witnesses, of which you were one. She never loved you.

Her consent to your engagement was forced from her, and she has freed herself."

"Then that cursed play was—was—"

"A reality, not a drama," continued Beaufort.

"It's false! I'll not believe it!" cried De Boore, aghast. "You are a liar, Sir. You could not be married without a clergyman."

"We had one, Sir. My friend Mr. Coggeshall, who played the abbé, has taken orders."

"It is infamous! It is a swindle!" shrieked De Boore.

"Mr. De Boore," said Beaufort, very shortly, "if you are abusive I will throw you out of the window."

"I will go and tell Mrs. Jujube," said De Boore, grinding his teeth.

"Do not trouble yourself to anticipate me," answered Beaufort; "I am going to tell her myself. Come, Harriette, let us look for your mother."

There was no remedy for it, and the matter had to be hushed up. Of course Mr. Jujube stormed and declared himself ruined, and Mrs. Jujube announced her intention of turning her daughter out of doors, every morning at breakfast for a week. But things settled down in the end. It was whispered about that Beaufort and Harriette had been married privately to please old Jujube, and the engagement to De Boore was every where contradicted. Few imagined that the ceremony had been performed on the stage of a theatre in presence of four hundred witnesses. Miss Tintamarre was one of the few who had hit upon the truth.

As one may imagine, a marriage so improperly managed could scarcely be happy, and at some future day I may give you the dark leaf which forms the life of Mrs. Beaufort, the Artist's wife.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

CHAPTER XV.

SAMARITANS.

THE children trotted up to their friend with outstretched hands and their usual smiles of welcome. Philip patted their heads, and sate down with very woe-begone aspect at the family table. "Ah, friends," said he, "do you know all?"

"Yes, we do," said Laura, sadly, who has ever compassion for others' misfortunes.

"What! is it all over the town already?" asked poor Philip.

"We have a letter from your father this morning." And we brought the letter to him, and showed him the affectionate special message for himself.

"His last thought was for you, Philip!" cries Laura. "See here, those last kind words!"

Philip shook his head. "It is not untrue, what is written here: but it is not all the truth." And Philip Firmin dismayed us by the intelligence which he proceeded to give. There was an execution in the house in Old Parr Street. A hundred clamorous creditors had already appeared there. Before going away, the doctor had taken considerable sums from those dangerous financiers to whom he had been of late resorting. They were in possession of numberless lately-signed bills, upon which the desperate man had raised money. He had professed to share with Philip, but he had taken the great share, and left Philip two hundred pounds of his own money. All the rest was gone. All Philip's stock had been sold out. The father's fraud had made him master of the trustee's signature:

and Philip Firmin, reputed to be so wealthy, was a beggar, in my room. Luckily he had few, or very trifling, debts. Mr. Philip had a lordly impatience of indebtedness, and, with a good bachelor-income, had paid for all his pleasures as he enjoyed them.

Well! He must work. A young man ruined at two-and-twenty, with a couple of hundred pounds yet in his pocket, hardly knows that he is ruined. He will sell his horses—live in chambers—has enough to go on for a year. “When I am very hard put to it,” says Philip, “I will come and dine with the children at one. I dare say you haven’t dined much at Williams’s in the Old Bailey? You can get a famous dinner there for a shilling—beef, bread, potatoes, beer, and a penny for the waiter.” Yes, Philip seemed actually to enjoy his discomfiture. It was long since we had seen him in such spirits. “The weight is off my mind now. It has been throttling me for some time past. Without understanding why or wherefore, I have always been looking out for this. My poor father had ruin written in his face: and when those bailiffs made their appearance in Old Parr Street yesterday, I felt as if I had known them before. I had seen their hooked beaks in my dreams.”

“That unlucky General Baynes, when he accepted your mother’s trust, took it with its consequences. If the sentry falls asleep on his post, he must pay the penalty,” says Mr. Pendennis, very severely.

“Great powers! you would not have me come down on an old man with a large family, and ruin them all?” cries Philip.

“No: I don’t think Philip will do that,” says my wife, looking exceedingly pleased.

“If men accept trusts they must fulfill them, my dear,” cries the master of the house.

“And I must make that old gentleman suffer for my father’s wrong? If I do, may I starve! there!” cries Philip.

“And so that poor Little Sister has made her sacrifice in vain!” sighed my wife. “As for the father—oh, Arthur! I can’t tell you how odious that man was to me. There was something dreadful about him. And in his manner to women—oh!—”

“If he had been a black draught, my dear, you could not have shuddered more naturally.”

“Well, he was horrible; and I know Philip will be better now he is gone.”

Women often make light of ruin. Give them but the beloved objects, and poverty is a trifling sorrow to bear. As for Philip, he, as we have said, is gayer than he has been for years past. The doctor’s flight occasions not a little club talk: but, now he is gone, many people see quite well that they were aware of his insolvency, and always knew it must end so. The case is told, is canvassed, is exaggerated as such cases will be. I dare say it forms a week’s talk. But people know that poor Philip is his father’s largest creditor, and eye the young man with no unfriendly looks when he comes to his club after his mishap—with burning cheeks, and a tingling sense of shame, imagining that all the world will point at and avoid him as the guilty fugitive’s son.

No: the world takes very little heed of his misfortune. One or two old acquaintances are kinder to him than before. A few say his ruin, and his obligation to work, will do him good. Only a very, very few avoid him, and look unconscious as he passes them by. Among these cold countenances, you, of course, will recognize the faces of the whole Twysden family. Three statues, with marble eyes, could not look more stony-calm than Aunt Twysden and her two daughters, as they pass in the stately barouche. The gentlemen turn red when they see Philip. It is rather late times for Uncle Twysden to begin blushing, to be sure. “Hang the fellow! he will, of course, be coming for money. Dawkins, I am not at home, mind, when young Mr. Firmin calls.” So says Lord Ringwood, regarding Philip fallen among thieves. Ah, thanks to Heaven, travelers find Samaritans as well as Levites on life’s hard way! Philip told us with much humor of a rencontre which he had had with his cousin, Ringwood Twysden, in a public place. Twysden was enjoying himself with some young clerks of his office; but as Philip advanced upon him, assuming his fiercest scowl and most hectoring manner, the other lost heart, and fled. And no wonder. “Do you suppose,” says Twysden, “I will willingly sit in the same room with that cad, after the manner in which he has treated my family! No, Sir!” And so the tall door in Beaunash Street is to open for Philip Firmin no more.

The tall door in Beaunash Street flies open readily enough for another gentleman. A splendid cab-horse reins up before it every day. A pair of varnished boots leap out of the cab, and spring up the broad stairs, where somebody is waiting with a smile of genteel welcome—the same smile—on the same sofa—the same mamma at her table writing her letters. And beautiful bouquets from Covent Garden decorate the room. And after half an hour mamma goes out to speak to the housekeeper, vous comprenez. And there is nothing particularly new under the sun. It will shine to-morrow upon pretty much the same flowers, sports, pastimes, etc., which it illuminated yesterday. And when your love-making days are over, miss, and you are married, and advantageously established, shall not your little sisters, now in the nursery, trot down and play their little games? Would you, on your conscience, now—you who are rather inclined to consider Miss Agnes Twysden’s conduct as heartless—would you, I say, have her cry her pretty eyes out about a young man who does not care much for her, for whom she never did care much herself, and who is now, moreover, a beggar, with a ruined and disgraced father and a doubtful legitimacy? Absurd! That dear girl is like a beautiful fragrant bower-room at the Star and Garter at Richmond, with honey-suckles mayhap trailing round the windows, from which you behold one of the most lovely and pleasant of wood and river scenes. The tables are decorated with flowers, rich wine-cups sparkle on the board, and Captain Jones’s party have every thing they can desire. Their dinner over, and that company gone, the same waiters, the same flowers, the same cups and crystals, array themselves for Mr. Brown and his party. Or, if you won't have Agnes Twysden compared to the Star and Garter Tavern, which must admit mixed company, liken her to the chaste moon who shines on shepherds of all complexions, swarthy or fair.

When, oppressed by superior odds, a commander is forced to retreat, we like him to show his skill by carrying off his guns, treasure, and camp equipages. Doctor Firmin, beaten by fortune and compelled to fly, showed quite a splendid skill and coolness in his manner of decamping, and left the very smallest amount of spoils in the hands of the victorious enemy. His wines had been famous among the grave epicures with whom he dined: he used to boast, like a worthy bon vivant who knows the value of wine-conversation after dinner, of the quantities which he possessed, and the rare bins which he had in store; but when the executioners came to arrange his sale, there was found only a beggarly account of empty bottles, and I fear some of the unprincipled creditors put in a great quantity of bad liquor which they endeavored to foist off on the public as the genuine and carefully selected stock of a well-known connoisseur. News of this dishonest proceeding reached Dr. Firmin presently in his retreat; and he showed by his letter a generous and manly indignation at the manner in which his creditors had tampered with his honest name and reputation as a bon vivant. He have bad wine! For shame! He had the best from the best wine-merchant, and paid, or rather owed, the best prices for it; for of late years the doctor had paid no bills at all; and the wine-merchant appeared in quite a handsome group of figures in his schedule. In like manner his books were pawned to a book auctioneer; and Brice, the butler, had a bill of sale for the furniture. Firmin retreated, we will not say with the honors of war, but as little harmed as possible by defeat. Did the enemy want the plunder of his city? He had smuggled almost all his valuable goods over the wall. Did they desire his ships? He had sunk them; and when at length the conquerors poured into his stronghold, he was far beyond the reach of their shot. Don't we often hear still that Nana Sahib is alive and exceedingly comfortable? We do not love him; but we can't help having a kind of admiration for that slippery fugitive who has escaped from the dreadful jaws of the lion. In a word, when Firmin's furniture came to be sold, it was a marvel how little his creditors benefited by the sale. Contemptuous brokers declared there never was such a shabby lot of goods. A friend of the house and poor Philip bought in his mother's picture for a few guineas; and as for the doctor's own state portrait, I am afraid it went for a few shillings only, and in the midst of a roar of Hebrew laughter. I saw in Wardour Street, not long after, the doctor's sideboard, and what dealers cheerfully call the sarcophagus cellaret. Poor doctor! his wine was all drunken; his meat was eaten up; but his own body had slipped out of the reach of the hook-beaked birds of prey.

We had spoken rapidly in under tones, innocently believing that the young people round about us were taking no heed of our talk. But in a lull of the conversation, Mr. Pendennis, junior, who had always been a friend to Philip, broke out with—"Philip! if you are so very poor, you'll be hungry, you know, and you may have my piece of bread and jam. And I don't want it, mamma," he added; "and you know Philip has often and often given me things."

Philip stooped down and kissed this good little Samaritan. "I'm not hungry, Arty, my boy," he said; "and I'm not so poor but I have got—look here—a fine new shilling for Arty!"

"Oh, Philip, Philip!" cried mamma.

"Don't take the money, Arthur," cried papa.

And the boy, with a rueful face but a manly heart, prepared to give back the coin. "It's quite a new one; and it's a very pretty one: but I won't have it, Philip, thank you," he said, turning very red.

"If he won't, I vow I will give it to the cabman," said Philip.

"Keeping a cab all this while? Oh, Philip, Philip!" again cries mamma the economist.

"Loss of time is loss of money, my dear lady," says Philip, very gravely. "I have ever so many places to go to. When I am set in for being ruined, you shall see what a screw I will become! I must go to Mrs. Brandon, who will be very uneasy, poor dear, until she knows the worst."

"Oh, Philip, I should like so to go with you!" cries Laura. "Pray, give her our very best regards and respects."

"Merci!" said the young man, and squeezed Mrs. Pendennis's hand in his own big one. "I will take your message to her, Laura. J'aime qu'on l'aime, savez-vous?"

"That means, I love those who love her," cries little Laura; "but I don't know," remarked this little person afterward to her paternal confidant, "that I like all people to love my mamma. That is, I don't like her to like them, papa—only you may, papa, and Ethel may, and Arthur may, and, I think, Philip may, now he is poor and quite, quite alone—and we will take care of him, won't we? And, I think, I'll buy him something with my money which Aunt Ethel gave me."

"And I'll give him my money," cries a boy.

"And I'll div him my—my—" Pshaw! what matters what the little sweet lips prattled in their artless kindness? But the soft words of love and pity smote the mother's heart with an exquisite pang of gratitude and joy; and I know where her thanks were paid for those tender words and thoughts of her little ones.

Mrs. Pendennis made Philip promise to come to dinner, and also to remember not to take a cab—which promise Mr. Firmin had not much difficulty in executing, for he had but a few hundred yards to walk across the Park from his club; and I must say that my wife took a special care of our dinner that day, preparing for Philip certain dishes which she knew he liked, and enjoining the butler of the establishment (who also happened to be the owner of the house) to fetch from his cellar the very choicest wine in his possession.

I have previously described our friend and his boisterous, impetuous, generous nature. When Philip was moved, he called to all the world to witness his emotion. When he was angry, his enemies were all the rogues and scoundrels in the world. He vowed he would have no mercy on them, and desired all his acquaintances to participate in his anger. How could such an open-mouthed son have had such a close-spoken father? I dare say you have seen very well-bred young people the children of vulgar and ill-bred parents; the swaggering father have a silent son; the loud mother a modest daughter. Our friend is not Amadis or Sir Charles Grandison; and I don't set him up for a moment as a person to be revered or imitated; but try to draw him faithfully, and as nature made him. As nature made him, so he was. I don't think he tried to improve himself much. Perhaps few people do. They suppose they do: and you read, in apologetic memoirs and fond biographies, how this man cured his bad temper, and t'other worked and strove until he grew to be almost faultless. Very well and good, my good people. You can learn a language; you can master a science; I have heard of an old square-toes of sixty who learned, by study and intense application, very satisfactorily to dance; but can you, by taking thought, add to your moral stature? Ah me! the doctor who preaches is only taller than most of us by the height of the pulpit: and when he steps down I dare say he cringes to the duchess, growls at his children, scolds his wife about the dinner. All is vanity, look you; and so the preacher is vanity, too.

Well, then, I must again say that Philip roared his griefs: he shouted his laughter: he bellowed his applause: he was extravagant in his humility as in his pride, in his admiration of his friends and contempt for his enemies: I dare say not a just man, but I have met juster men not half so honest; and certainly not a faultless man, though I know better men not near so good. So, I believe, my wife thinks: else why should she be so fond of him? Did we not know boys who never went out of bounds, and never were late for school, and never made a false concord or quantity, and never came under the ferule; and others who were always playing truant, and blundering, and being whipped; and yet, somehow, was not Master Naughtyboy better liked than Master Goodchild? When Master Naughtyboy came to dine with us on the first day of his ruin, he bore a face of radiant happiness—he laughed, he bounced about, he caressed the children; now he took a couple on his knees; now he tossed the baby to the ceiling; now he sprawled over a sofa, and now he rode upon a chair; never was a penniless gentleman more cheerful. As for his dinner, Phil's appetite was always fine, but on this day an ogre could scarcely play a more terrible knife and fork. He asked for more and more, until his entertainers wondered to behold him. "Dine for to-day and to-morrow, too; can't expect such fare as this every day, you know. This claret, how good it is! May I pack some up in paper, and take it home with me?" The children roared with laughter at this admirable idea of carrying home wine in a sheet of paper. I don't know that it is always at the best jokes that children laugh—children and wise men too.

When we three were by ourselves, and freed from the company of servants and children, our friend told us the cause of his gayety. "By George!" he swore, "it is worth being ruined to find such good people in the world. My dear, kind Laura"—here the gentleman brushes his eyes with his fist—"it was as much as I could do this morning to prevent myself from hugging you in my arms, you were so generous, and—and so kind, and so tender, and so good, by George. And after leaving you, where do you think I went?"

"I think I can guess, Philip," says Laura.

"Well," says Philip, winking his eyes again, and tossing off a great bumper of wine, "I went to her, of course. I think she is the best friend I have in the world. The old man was out, and I told her about every thing that had happened. And what do you think she has done? She says she has been expecting me—she has; and she has gone and fitted up a room with a nice little bed at the top of the house, with every thing as neat and trim as possible; and she begged and prayed I would go and stay with her—and I said I would, to please her. And then she takes me down to her room; and she jumps up to a cupboard, which she unlocks; and she opens and takes three-and-twenty pounds out of a—out of a tea—out of a tea-caddy—confound me!—and she says, 'Here Philip,' she says, and—Boo! what a fool I am!" and here the orator fairly broke down in his speech.

CHAPTER XVI.

IN WHICH PHILIP SHOWS HIS METTLE.

WHEN the poor Little Sister proffered her mite, her all, to Philip, I dare say some sentimental passages occurred between them which are much too trivial to be narrated. No doubt her pleasure would have been at that moment to give him not only that gold which she had been saving up against rent-day, but the spoons, the furniture, and all the valuables of the house, including, perhaps, J. J.'s bricabrac, cabinets, china, and so forth. To perform a kindness, an act of self-sacrifice; are not these the most delicious privileges of female tenderness? Philip checked his little friend's enthusiasm. He showed her a purse full of money, at which sight the poor little soul was rather disappointed. He magnified the value of his horses, which, according to Philip's calculation, were to bring him at least two hundred pounds more than the stock which he had already in hand; and the master of such a sum as this, she was forced to confess, had no need to despair. Indeed, she had never in her life possessed the half of it. Her kind dear little offer of a home in her house he would accept sometimes, and with gratitude. Well, there was a little consolation in that. In a moment that active little housekeeper saw the room ready; flowers on the mantle-piece; his looking-glass, which her father could do quite well with the little one, as he was always shaved by the barber now; the quilted counterpane, which she had herself made: I know not what more improvements she devised; and I fear that at the idea of having Philip with her, this little thing was as extravagantly and unreasonably happy as we have just now seen Philip to be. What was that last dish which Pætus and Arria shared in common? I have lost my Lempriere's dictionary (that treasure of my youth), and forget whether it was a cold dagger au naturel, or a dish of hot coals à la Romaine, of which they partook; but, whatever it was, she smiled, and delightedly received it, happy to share the beloved one's fortune.

Yes: Philip would come home to his Little Sister sometimes: sometimes of a Saturday, and they would go to church on Sunday, as he used to do when he was a boy at school. "But then, you know," says Phil, "law is law; study is study. I must devote my whole energies to my work—get up very early."

"Don't tire your eyes, my dear," interposes Mr. Philip's soft, judicious friend.

"There must be no trifling with work," says Philip, with awful gravity. "There's Benton the Judge: Benton and Burbage, you know."

"Oh, Benton and Burbage!" whispers the Little Sister, not a little bewildered.

"How do you suppose he became a judge before forty?"

"Before forty who? law, bless me!"

"Before he was forty, Mrs. Carry. When he came to work, he had his own way to make: just like me. He had a small allowance from his father: that's not like me. He took chambers in the Temple. He went to a pleader's office. He read fourteen, fifteen hours every day. He dined on a cup of tea and a mutton-chop."

"La, bless me, child! I wouldn't have you do that, not to be Lord Chamberlain—Chancellor what's his name? Destroy your youth with reading, and your eyes, and go without your dinner? You're not used to that sort of thing, dear; and it would kill you!"

Philip smoothed his fair hair off his ample forehead, and nodded his head, smiling sweetly. I think his inward monitor hinted to him that there was not much danger of his killing himself by over-work. "To succeed at the law, as in all other professions," he continued, with much gravity, "requires the greatest perseverance, and industry, and talent; and then, perhaps, you don't succeed. Many have failed who have had all these qualities."

"But they haven't talents like my Philip, I know they haven't. And I had to stand up in a court once, and was cross-examined by a vulgar man before a horrid deaf old judge; and I'm sure if your lawyers are like them I don't wish you to succeed at all. And now, look! there's a nice loin of pork coming up. Pa loves roast pork; and you must come and have some with us; and every day and all days, my dear, I should like to see you seated there." And the Little Sister frisked about here, and hustled there, and brought a cunning bottle of wine from some corner, and made the boy welcome. So that, you see, far from starving, he actually had two dinners on that first day of his ruin.

Caroline consented to a compromise regarding the money, on Philip's solemn vow and promise that she should be his banker whenever necessity called. She rather desired his poverty for the sake of its precious reward. She hid away a little bag of gold for her darling's use whenever he should need it. I dare say she pinched and had shabby dinners at home, so as to save yet more, and so caused the captain to grumble. Why, for that boy's sake, I believe she would have been capable of shaving her lodgers' legs of mutton, and levying a tax on their tea-caddies and baker's stuff. If you don't like unprincipled attachments of this sort, and only desire that your womankind should love you for yourself, and according to your deserts, I am your very humble servant. Hereditary bondswomen! you know, that were you free, and did you strike the blow, my dears, you were unhappy for your pain, and eagerly would claim your bonds again. What poet has uttered that sentiment? It is perfectly true, and I know will receive the cordial approbation of the dear ladies.

Philip has decreed in his own mind that he will go and live in those chambers in the Temple where we have met him. Vanjohn, the sporting gentleman, had determined for special reasons to withdraw from law and sport in this country, and Mr. Firmin took possession of his vacant sleeping chamber. To furnish a bachelor's bedroom need not be a matter of much cost; but Mr. Philip was too good-natured a fellow to haggle about the valuation of Vanjohn's bedsteads and chests of drawers, and generously took them at twice their value. He and Mr. Cassidy now divided the rooms in equal reign. Ah, happy rooms, bright rooms, rooms near the sky, to remember you is to be young again! for I would have you to know, that when Philip went to take possession of his share of the fourth floor in the Temple, his biographer was still comparatively juvenile, and in one or two very old-fashioned families was called "young Pendennis."

So Philip Firmin dwelt in a garret; and the fourth part of a laundress and the half of a boy now formed the domestic establishment of him who had been attended by housekeepers, butlers, and obsequious liveried menials. To be freed from that ceremonial and etiquette of plush and worsted lace was an immense relief to Firmin. His pipe need not lurk in crypts or back closets now: its fragrance breathed over the whole chambers, and rose up to the sky, their near neighbor.

The first month or two after being ruined, Philip vowed, was an uncommonly pleasant time. He had still plenty of money in his pocket; and the sense that, perhaps, it was imprudent to take a cab or drink a bottle of wine, added a zest to those enjoyments which they by no means possessed when they were easy and of daily occurrence. I am not certain that a dinner of beef and porter did not amuse our young man almost as well as banquets much more costly to which he had been accustomed. He laughed at the pretensions of his boyish days, when he and other solemn young epicures used to sit down to elaborate tavern banquets, and pretend to criticise vintages, and sauces, and turtle. As yet there was not only content with his dinner, but plenty therewith; and I do not wish to alarm you by supposing that Philip will ever have to encounter any dreadful extremities of poverty or hunger in the course of his history. The wine in the jug was very low at times, but it never was quite empty. This lamb was shorn, but the wind was tempered to him.

So Philip took possession of his rooms in the Temple, and began actually to reside there just as the long vacation commenced, which he intended to devote to a course of serious study of the law and private preparation, before he should venture on the great business of circuits and the bar. Nothing is more necessary for desk-men than exercise, so Philip took a good deal; especially on the water, where he pulled a famous oar. Nothing is more natural after exercise than refreshment; and Mr. Firmin, now he was too poor for claret, showed a great capacity for beer. After beer and bodily labor, rest, of course, is necessary; and Firmin slept nine hours, and looked as rosy as a girl in her first season. Then such a man, with such a frame and health, must have a good appetite for breakfast. And then every man, who wishes to succeed at the bar, in the senate, on the bench, in the House of Peers, on the Woolsack, must know the quotidian history of his country; so, of course, Philip read the newspaper. Thus, you see, his hours of study were perforce curtailed by the necessary duties which distracted him from his labors.

It has been said that Mr. Firmin's companion in chambers, Mr. Cassidy, was a native of the neighboring kingdom of Ireland, and engaged in literary pursuits in this country. A merry, shrewd, silent, observant little man, he, unlike some of his compatriots, always knew how to make both ends meet; feared no man alive in the character of a dun; and out of small earnings managed to transmit no small comforts and subsidies to old parents living somewhere in Munster. Of Cassidy's friends was Finucane, now editor of the Pall Mall Gazette; he married the widow of the late eccentric and gifted Captain Shandon, and Cass. himself was the fashionable correspondent of the Gazette, chronicling the marriages, deaths, births, dinner-parties of the nobility. These Irish gentlemen knew other Irish gentlemen, connected with other newspapers, who formed a little literary society. They assembled at each other's rooms, and at haunts where social pleasure was to be purchased at no dear rate. Philip Firmin was known to many of them before his misfortunes occurred, and when there was gold in plenty in his pocket, and never-failing applause for his songs.

When Pendennis and his friends wrote in this newspaper, it was impertinent enough, and many men must have heard the writers laugh at the airs which they occasionally thought proper to assume. The tone which they took amused, annoyed, tickled, was popular. It was continued, and, of course, caricatured by their successors. They worked for very moderate fees; but paid themselves by impertinence, and the satisfaction of assailing their betters. Three or four persons were reserved from their abuse; but somebody was sure every week to be tied up at their post, and the public made sport of the victim's contortions. The writers were obscure barristers, ushers, and college men, but they had omniscience at their pen's end, and were ready to lay down the law on any given subject—to teach any man his business, were it a bishop in his pulpit, a Minister in his place in the House, a captain on his quarter-deck, a tailor on his shopboard, or a jockey in his saddle.

Since those early days of the Pall Mall Gazette, when old Shandon wielded his truculent tomahawk, and Messrs. W—rr—ngt—n and P—nd—nn—s followed him in the war-path, the Gazette had passed through several hands; and the victims who were immolated by the editors of to-day were very likely the objects of the best puffery of the last dynasty. To be flogged in what was your own school-room—that, surely, is a queer sensation; and when my Report was published on the decay of the sealing-wax trade in the three kingdoms (owing to the prevalence of gummed envelopes—as you may see in that masterly document), I was horsed up and smartly whipped in the Gazette by some of the rods which had come out of pickle since my time. Was not good Dr. Guillotin executed by his own neat invention? I don't know who was the Monsieur Samson who operated on me; but have always had my idea that Digges, of Corpus, was the man to whom my flagellation was intrusted. His father keeps a ladies'-school at Hackney; but there is an air of fashion in every thing which Digges writes, and a chivalrous conservatism which makes me pretty certain that D. was my scarifier. All this, however, is naught. Let us turn away from the author's private griefs and egotisms to those of the hero of the story.

Does any one remember the appearance some twenty years ago of a little book called Trumpet Calls—a book of songs and poetry, dedicated to his brother officers by Cornet Canterton? His trumpet was very tolerably melodious, and the cornet played some small airs on it with some little grace and skill. But this poor Canterton belonged to the Life Guards Green, and Philip Firmin would have liked to have the lives of one or two troops at least of that corps. Entering into Mr. Cassidy's room, Philip found the little volume. He set to work to exterminate Canterton. He rode him down, trampled over his face and carcass, knocked the Trumpet Calls and all the teeth out of the trumpeter's throat. Never was such a smashing article as he wrote. And Mugford, Mr. Cassidy's chief and owner, who likes always to have at least one man served up and hashed small in the Pall Mall Gazette, happened at this very juncture to have no other victim ready in his larder. Philip's review appeared there in print. He rushed off with immense glee to Westminster, to show us his performance. Nothing must content him but to give a dinner at Greenwich on his success. Oh, Philip! We wished that this had not been his first fee; and that sober law had given it to him, and not the graceless and fickle muse with whom he had been flirting. For, truth to say, certain wise old heads which wagged over his performance could see but little merit in it. His style was coarse, his wit clumsy and savage. Never mind characterizing either now. He has seen the error of his ways, and divorced with the muse whom he never ought to have wooed.

The shrewd Cassidy not only could not write himself, but knew he could not—or, at least, pen more than a plain paragraph, or a brief sentence to the point, but said he would carry this paper to his chief. "His Excellency" was the nickname by which this chief was called by his familiars. Mugford—Frederick Mugford was his real name—and putting out of sight that little defect in his character, that he committed a systematic literary murder once a week, a more worthy, good-natured little murderer did not live. He came of the old school of the press. Like French marshals, he had risen from the ranks, and retained some of the manners and oddities of the private soldier. A new race of writers had grown up since he enlisted as a printer's boy—men of the world, with the manners of other gentlemen. Mugford never professed the least gentility. He knew that his young men laughed at his peculiarities, and did not care a fig for their scorn. As the knife with which he conveyed his victuals to his mouth went down his throat at the plenteous banquets which he gave, he saw his young friends wince and wonder, and rather relished their surprise. Those lips never cared in the least about placing his h's in right places. They used bad language with great freedom—(to hear him bullying a printing office was a wonder of eloquence)—but they betrayed no secrets, and the words which they uttered you might trust. He had belonged to two or three parties, and had respected them all. When he went to the Under-Secretary's office he was never kept waiting; and once or twice Mrs. Mugford, who governed him, ordered him to attend the Saturday reception of the Ministers' ladies, where he might be seen, with dirty hands it is true, but a richly embroidered waistcoat and fancy satin tie. His heart, however, was not in these entertainments. I have heard him say that he only came because Mrs. M. would have it; and he frankly owned that he "would rather 'ave a pipe and a drop of something 'ot than all your ices and rubbish."

Mugford had a curious knowledge of what was going on in the world, and of the affairs of countless people. When Cass. brought Philip's article to his Excellency, and mentioned the author's name, Mugford showed himself to be perfectly familiar with the histories of Philip and his father. "The old chap has nobbled the young fellow's money, almost every shilling of it, I hear. Knew he never would carry on. His discounts would have killed any man. Seen his paper about this ten year. Young one is a gentleman—passionate fellow, hawhaw fellow, but kind to the poor. Father never was a gentleman, with all his fine airs and fine waistcoats. I don't set up in that line myself, Cass., but I tell you I know 'em when I see 'em."

Philip had friends and private patrons whose influence was great with the Mugford family, and of whom he little knew. Every year Mrs. M. was in the habit of contributing a Mugford to the world. She was one of Mrs. Brandon's most regular clients; and year after year, almost from his first arrival in London, Ridley, the painter, had been engaged as portrait painter to this worthy family. Philip and his illness; Philip and his horses, splendors, and entertainments; Philip and his lamentable downfall and ruin, had formed the subject of many an interesting talk between Mrs. Mugford and her friend, the Little Sister; and as we know Caroline's infatuation about the young fellow, we may suppose that his good qualities lost nothing in the description. When that article in the Pall Mall Gazette appeared, Nurse Brandon took the omnibus to Haverstock Hill, where, as you know, Mugford had his villa; arrived at Mrs. Mugford's, Gazette in hand, and had a long and delightful conversation with that lady. Mrs. Brandon bought I don't know how many copies of that Pall Mall Gazette. She now asked for it repeatedly in her walks at sundry ginger-beer shops, and of all sorts of newsvendors. I have heard that when the Mugfords first purchased the Gazette Mrs. M. used to drop bills from her pony-chaise, and distribute placards setting forth the excellence of the journal. "We keep our carriage, but we ain't above our business, Brandon," that good lady would say. And the business prospered under the management of these worthy folks; and the pony-chaise unfolded into a noble barouche; and the pony increased and multiplied, and became a pair of horses; and there was not a richer piece of gold-lace round any coachman's hat in London than now decorated John, who had grown with the growth of his master's fortunes, and drove the chariot in which his worthy employers rode on the away to Hampstead, honor, and prosperity.

"All this pitching into the poet is very well, you know, Cassidy," says Mugford to his subordinate. "It's like shooting a butterfly with a blunderbuss; but if Firmin likes that kind of sport, I don't mind. There won't be any difficulty about taking his copy at our place. The duchess knows another old woman who is a friend of his" ("the duchess" was the title which Mr. Mugford was in the playful habit of conferring upon his wife). "It's my belief young F. had better stick to the law, and leave the writing rubbish alone. But he knows his own affairs best, and, mind you, the duchess is determined we shall give him a helping hand."

Once, in the days of his prosperity, and in J. J.'s company, Philip had visited Mrs. Mugford and her family—a circumstance which the gentleman had almost forgotten. The painter and his friend were taking a Sunday walk, and came upon Mugford's pretty cottage and garden, and were hospitably entertained there by the owners of the place. It has disappeared, and the old garden has long since been covered by terraces and villas, and Mugford and Mrs. M., good souls, where are they? But the lady thought she had never seen such a fine-looking young fellow as Philip; cast about in her mind which of her little female Mugfords should marry him; and insisted upon offering her guest Champagne. Poor Phil! So, you see, while, perhaps, he was rather pluming himself upon his literary talents, and imagining that he was a clever fellow, he was only the object of a job on the part of two or three good folks who knew his history, and compassionated his misfortunes.

Mugford recalled himself to Philip's recollection, when they met after the appearance of Mr.

Phil's first performance in the Gazette. If he still took a Sunday walk, Hampstead way, Mr. M. requested him to remember that there was a slice of beef and a glass of wine at the old shop. Philip remembered it well enough now: the ugly room, the ugly family, the kind worthy people. Ere long he learned what had been Mrs. Brandon's connection with them, and the young man's heart was softened and grateful as he thought how this kind, gentle creature had been able to befriend him. She, we may be sure, was not a little proud of her protégé. I believe she grew to fancy that the whole newspaper was written by Philip. She made her fond parent read it aloud as she worked. Mr. Ridley, senior, pronounced it was remarkable fine, really now; without, I think, entirely comprehending the meaning of the sentiments which Mr. Gann gave forth in his rich loud voice, and often dropping asleep in his chair during this sermon.

In the autumn, Mr. Firmin's friends, Mr. and Mrs. Pendennis, selected the romantic seaport town of Boulogne for their holiday residence; and having roomy quarters in the old town, we gave Mr. Philip an invitation to pay us a visit whenever he could tear himself away from literature and law. He came in high spirits. He amused us by imitations and descriptions of his new proprietor and master, Mr. Mugford—his blunders, his bad language, his good heart. One day, Mugford expected a celebrated literary character to dinner, and Philip and Cassidy were invited to meet him. The great man was ill, and was unable to come. "Don't dish up the side-dishes," called out Mugford to his cook, in the hearing of his other guests. "Mr. Lyon ain't a coming." They dined quite sufficiently without the side-dishes, and were perfectly cheerful in the absence of the lion. Mugford patronized his young men with amusing good-nature. "Firmin, cut the goose for the duchess, will you? Cass. can't say Bo! to one, he can't. Ridley, a little of the stuffing. It'll make your hair curl." And Philip was going to imitate a frightful act with the cold steel (with which I have said Philip's master used to convey food to his mouth), but our dear innocent third daughter uttered a shriek of terror, which caused him to drop the dreadful weapon. Our darling little Florence is a nervous child, and the sight of an edged tool causes her anguish, ever since our darling little Tom nearly cut his thumb off with his father's razor.

Our main amusement in this delightful place was to look at the sea-sick landing from the steamers; and one day, as we witnessed this phenomenon, Philip sprang to the ropes which divided us from the arriving passengers, and with a cry of "How do you do, general?" greeted a yellow-faced gentleman, who started back, and, to my thinking, seemed but ill inclined to reciprocate Philip's friendly greeting. The general was fluttered, no doubt, by the bustle and interruptions incidental to the landing. A pallid lady, the partner of his existence probably, was calling out, "Noof et doo domestiques, Doo!" to the sentries who kept the line, and who seemed little interested by this family news. A governess, a tall young lady, and several more male and female children, followed the pale lady, who, as I thought, looked strangely frightened when the gentleman addressed as general communicated to her Philip's name. "Is that him?" said the lady in questionable grammar; and the tall young lady turned a pair of large eyes upon the individual designated as "him," and showed a pair of dark ringlets, out of which the envious sea-nymphs had shaken all the curl.

The general turned out to be General Baynes; the pale lady was Mrs. General B.; the tall young lady was Miss Charlotte Baynes, the general's eldest child; and the other six, forming nine, or "noof," in all, as Mrs. General B. said, were the other members of the Baynes family. And here I may as well say why the general looked alarmed on seeing Philip, and why the general's lady frowned at him. In action, one of the bravest of men, in common life General Baynes was timorous and weak. Specially he was afraid of Mrs. General Baynes, who ruled him with a vigorous authority. As Philip's trustee, he had allowed Philip's father to make away with the boy's money. He learned with a ghastly terror that he was answerable for his own remissness and want of care. For a long while he did not dare to tell his commander-in-chief of this dreadful penalty which was hanging over him. When at last he ventured upon this confession, I do not envy him the scene which must have ensued between him and his commanding officer. The morning after the fatal confession, when the children assembled for breakfast and prayers, Mrs. Baynes gave their young ones their porridge; she and Charlotte poured out the tea and coffee for the elders, and then addressing her eldest son Ochterlony, she said, "Ocky, my boy, the general has announced a charming piece of news this morning."

"Bought that pony, Sir?" says Ocky.

"Oh, what jolly fun!" says Moira, the second son.

"Dear, dear papa! what's the matter, and why do you look so?" cries Charlotte, looking behind her father's paper.

That guilty man would fain have made a shroud of his Morning Herald. He would have flung the sheet over his whole body, and lain hidden there from all eyes.

"The fun, my dears, is, that your father is ruined: that's the fun. Eat your porridge now, little ones. Charlotte, pop a bit of butter in Carriek's porridge; for you mayn't have any to-morrow."

"Oh, gammon," cries Moira.

"You'll soon see whether it is gammon or not, Sir, when you'll be starving, Sir. Your father has ruined us—and a very pleasant morning's work, I am sure."

And she calmly rubs the nose of her youngest child who is near her, and too young, and innocent, and careless, perhaps, of the world's censure as yet to keep in a strict cleanliness her own dear little snub nose and dappled cheeks.

"We are only ruined, and shall be starving soon, my dears, and if the general has bought a pony—as I dare say he has; he is quite capable of buying a pony when we are starving—the best thing we can do is to eat the pony. M'Grigor, don't laugh. Starvation is no laughing matter. When we were at Dumdum, in '36, we ate some colt. Don't you remember Jubber's colt—Jubber of the Horse Artillery, general? Never tasted any thing more tender in all my life. Charlotte, take Jany's hands out of the marmalade! We are all ruined, my dears, as sure as our name is Baynes." Thus did the mother of the family prattle on in the midst of her little ones, and announce to them the dreadful news of impending starvation. "General Baynes, by his carelessness, had allowed Dr. Firmin to make away with the money over which the general had been set as sentinel. Philip might recover from the trustee, and no doubt would. Perhaps he would not press his claim? My dear, what can you expect from the son of such a father? Depend on it, Charlotte, no good fruit can come from a stock like that. The son is a bad one, the father is a bad one, and your father, poor dear soul, is not fit to be trusted to walk the street without some one to keep him from tumbling. Why did I allow him to go to town without me? We were quartered at Colchester then: and I could not move on account of your brother M'Grigor. 'Baynes,' I said to your father, 'as sure as I let you go away to town without me, you will come to mischief.' And go he did, and come to mischief he did. And through his folly I and my poor children must go and beg our bread in the streets—I and my seven poor, robbed, penniless little ones. Oh, it's cruel, cruel!"

Indeed, one can not fancy a more dismal prospect for this worthy mother and wife than to see her children without provision at the commencement of their lives, and her luckless husband robbed of his life's earnings, and ruined just when he was too old to work.

What was to become of them? Now poor Charlotte thought, with pangs of a keen remorse, how idle she had been, and how she had snubbed her governesses, and how little she knew, and how badly she played the piano. Oh, neglected opportunities! Oh, remorse, now the time was past and irrecoverable! Does any young lady read this who, perchance, ought to be doing her lessons? My dear, lay down the story-book at once. Go up to your school-room, and practice your piano for two hours this moment; so that you may be prepared to support your family, should ruin in any case fall upon you. A great girl of sixteen, I pity Charlotte Baynes's feelings of anguish. She can't write a very good hand; she can scarcely answer any question to speak of in any educational books; her piano-forte playing is very, very so-so indeed. If she is to go out and get a living for the family, how, in the name of goodness, is she to set about it? What are they to do with the boys, and the money that has been put away for Ochterlony when he goes to college, and for Moira's commission? "Why, we can't afford to keep them at Dr. Pybus's, where they were doing so well; and they were ever so much better and more gentlemanlike than Colonel Chandler's boys; and to lose the army will break Moira's heart, it will. And the little ones—my little blue-eyed Carrick, and my darling Jany, and my Mary, that I nursed almost miraculously out of her scarlet-fever. God help them! God help us all!" thinks the poor mother. No wonder that her nights are wakeful, and her heart in a tumult of alarm at the idea of the impending danger.

And the father of the family?—the stout old general whose battles and campaigns are over, who has come home to rest his war-worn limbs, and make his peace with Heaven ere it calls him away—what must be his feelings when he thinks that he has been entrapped by a villain into committing an imprudence, which makes his children penniless and himself dishonored and a beggar? When he found what Dr. Firmin had done, and how he had been cheated, he went away, aghast, to his lawyer, who could give him no help. Philip's mother's trustee was answerable to Philip for his property. It had been stolen through Baynes's own carelessness, and the law bound him to replace it. General Baynes's man of business could not help him out of his perplexity at all; and I hope my worthy reader is not going to be too angry with the general for what I own he did. You never would, my dear Sir, I know. No power on earth would induce you to depart one inch from the path of rectitude; or, having done an act of imprudence, to shrink from bearing the consequence. The long and short of the matter is, that poor Baynes and his wife, after holding agitated, stealthy councils together—after believing that every strange face they saw was a bailiff's coming to arrest them on Philip's account—after horrible days of remorse, misery, guilt—I say, the long and the short of the matter was, that these poor people determined to run away. They would go and hide themselves any where—in an impenetrable pine-forest in Norway—up an inaccessible mountain in Switzerland. They would change their names; dye their mustaches and honest old white hair; fly with their little ones away, away, away, out of the reach of law and Philip; and the first flight lands them on Boulogne Pier, and there is Mr. Philip holding out his hand and actually eying them as they got out of the steamer! Eying them? It is the eye of Heaven that is on those criminals. Holding out his hand to them? It is the hand of fate that is on their wretched shoulders. No wonder they shuddered and turned pale. That which I took for sea-sickness, I am sorry to say, was a guilty conscience; and where is the steward, my dear friends, who can relieve us of that?

As this party came staggering out of the Custom-house poor Baynes still found Philip's hand stretched out to catch hold of him, and saluted him with a ghastly cordiality. "These are your children, general, and this is Mrs. Baynes?" says Philip, smiling, and taking off his hat.

"Oh, yes! I'm Mrs. General Baynes!" says the poor woman; "and these are the children—yes, yes. Charlotte, this is Mr. Firmin, of whom you have heard us speak; and these are my boys, Moira and Ochterlony."

"I have had the honor of meeting General Baynes at Old Parr Street. Don't you remember, Sir?" says Mr. Pendennis, with great affability to the general.

"What, another who knows me?" I dare say the poor wretch thinks; and glances of a dreadful meaning pass between the guilty wife and the guilty husband.

"You are going to stay at any hotel?"

"Hôtel des Bains!" "Hôtel du Nord!" "Hôtel d'Angleterre!" here cry twenty commissioners in a breath.

"Hotel? Oh yes! That is, we have not made up our minds whether we shall go on to-night or whether we shall stay," say those guilty ones, looking at one another, and then down to the ground; on which one of the children, with a roar, says—

"Oh, ma, what a story! You said you'd stay to-night; and I was so sick in the beastly boat, and I won't travel any more!" And tears choke his artless utterance. "And you said Bang to the man who took your keys; you know you did," resumes the innocent, as soon as he can gasp a further remark.

"Who told you to speak?" cried mamma, giving the boy a shake.

"This is the way to the Hôtel des Bains," says Philip, making Miss Baynes another of his best bows. And Miss Baynes makes a courtesy, and her eyes look up at the handsome young man—large brown honest eyes in a comely round face, on each side of which depend two straight wisps of brown hair that were ringlets when they left Folkestone a few hours since.

"Oh, I say, look at those women with the short petticoats! and wooden shoes, by George! Oh! it's jolly, ain't it?" cries one young gentleman.

"By George, there's a man with ear-rings on! There is, Ocky, upon my word!" calls out another. And the elder boy, turning round to his father, points to some soldiers. "Did you ever see such little beggars?" he says, tossing his head up. "They wouldn't take such fellows into our line."

"I am not at all tired, thank you," says Charlotte. "I am accustomed to carry him." I forgot to say that the young lady had one of the children asleep on her shoulder; and another was toddling at her side, holding by his sister's dress, and admiring Mr. Firmin's whiskers, that flamed and curled very luminously and gloriously, like to the rays of the setting sun.

"I am very glad we met, Sir," says Philip, in the most friendly manner, taking leave of the general at the gate of his hotel. "I hope you won't go away to-morrow, and that I may come and pay my respects to Mrs. Baynes." Again he salutes that lady with a coup de chapeau. Again he bows to Miss Baynes. She makes a pretty courtesy enough, considering that she has a baby asleep on her shoulder. And they enter the hotel, the excellent Marie marshaling them to fitting apartments, where some of them, I have no doubt, will sleep very soundly. How much more comfortably might poor Baynes and his wife have slept had they known what were Philip's feelings regarding them!

We both admired Charlotte, the tall girl who carried her little brother, and around whom the others clung. And we spoke loudly in Miss Charlotte's praises to Mrs. Pendennis, when we joined that lady at dinner. In the praise of Mrs. Baynes we had not a great deal to say, further than that she seemed to take command of the whole expedition, including the general officer, her husband.

Though Marie's beds at the Hôtel des Bains are as comfortable as any beds in Europe, you see that admirable chambermaid can not lay out a clean, easy conscience upon the clean, fragrant pillow-case; and General and Mrs. Baynes owned, in after-days, that one of the most dreadful nights they ever passed was that of their first landing in France. What refugee from his country can fly from himself? Railways were not as yet in that part of France. The general was too poor to fly with a couple of private carriages, which he must have had for his family of "noof," his governess, and two servants. Encumbered with such a train, his enemy would speedily have pursued and overtaken him. It is a fact that, immediately after landing at his hotel, he and his commanding officer went off to see when they could get places for—never mind the name of the place where they really thought of taking refuge. They never told, but Mrs. General Baynes had a sister, Mrs. Major MacWhirter (married to MacW. of the Bengal Cavalry), and the sisters loved each other very affectionately, especially by letter, for it must be owned that they quarreled frightfully when together; and Mrs. MacWhirter never could bear that her younger sister should be taken out to dinner before her, because she was married to a superior officer. Well, their little differences were forgotten when the two ladies were apart. The sisters wrote to each other prodigious long letters, in which household affairs, the children's puerile diseases, the relative prices of veal, eggs, chickens, the rent of lodging and houses in various places, were fully discussed. And as Mrs. Baynes showed a surprising knowledge of Tours, the markets, rents, clergymen, society there, and as Major and Mrs. Mac. were staying there, I have little doubt, for my part, from this and another not unimportant circumstance, that it was to that fair city our fugitives were wending their way, when events occurred which must now be narrated, and which caused General Baynes, at the head of his domestic regiment, to do what the King of France with twenty thousand men is said to have done in old times.

Philip was greatly interested about the family. The truth is, we were all very much bored at Boulogne. We read the feeblest London papers at the reading-room with frantic assiduity. We saw all the boats come in: and the day was lost when we missed the Folkestone boat or the London boat. We consumed much time and absinthe at cafés; and tramped leagues upon that old pier every day. Well, Philip was at the Hôtel des Bains at a very early hour next morning, and there he saw the general, with a woe-worn face, leaning on his stick, and looking at his luggage, as it lay piled in the porte-cochère of the hotel. There they lay, thirty-seven packages in all, including washing-tubs, and a child's India sleeping-cot; and all these packages were ticketed M. LE GENERAL BAYNES, OFFICIER ANGLAIS, TOURS, TOURAINE, FRANCE. I say, putting two and two together; calling to mind Mrs. General's singular knowledge of Tours and familiarity with the place and its prices; remembering that her sister Emily—Mrs. Major MacWhirter, in fact—was there; and seeing thirty-seven trunks, bags, and portmanteaus, all directed "M. le Général Baynes, Officier Anglais, Tours, Touraine," am I wrong in supposing that Tours was the general's destination? On the other hand, we have the old officer's declaration to Philip that he did not know where he was going. Oh, you sly old man! Oh, you gray old fox, beginning to double and to turn at sixty-seven years of age! Well? The general was in retreat, and he did not wish the enemy to know upon what lines he was retreating. What is the harm of that, pray? Besides, he was under the orders of his commanding officer, and when Mrs. General gave her orders, I should have liked to see any officer of hers disobey.

"What a pyramid of portmanteaus! You are not thinking of moving to-day, general?" says Philip.

"It is Sunday, Sir," says the general; which you will perceive was not answering the question; but, in truth, except for a very great emergency, the good general would not travel on that day.

"I hope the ladies slept well after their windy voyage."

"Thank you. My wife is an old sailor, and has made two voyages out and home to India." Here, you understand, the old man is again eluding his interlocutor's artless queries.

"I should like to have some talk with you, Sir, when you are free," continues Philip, not having leisure as yet to be surprised at the other's demeanor.

"There are other days besides Sunday for talk on business," says that piteous sly-boots of an old officer. Ah, conscience! conscience! Twenty-four Sikhs, sword in hand, two dozen Pindaries, Mahrattas, Ghoorkas, what you please—that old man felt that he would rather have met them than Philip's unsuspecting blue eyes. These, however, now lighted up with rather an angry, "Well, Sir, as you don't talk business on Sunday, may I call on you to-morrow morning?"

And what advantage had the poor old fellow got by all this doubling and hesitating and artfulness?—a respite until to-morrow morning! Another night of horrible wakefulness and hopeless guilt, and Philip waiting ready the next morning with his little bill, and “Please pay me the thirty thousand which my father spent and you owe me. Please turn out into the streets with your wife and family, and beg and starve. Have the goodness to hand me out your last rupee. Be kind enough to sell your children’s clothes and your wife’s jewels, and hand over the proceeds to me. I’ll call to-morrow. By-by.”

Here there came tripping over the marble pavement of the hall of the hotel a tall young lady in a brown silk dress and rich curling ringlets falling upon her fair young neck—beautiful brown curling ringlets, vous comprenez, not wisps of moistened hair, and a broad clear forehead, and two honest eyes shining below it, and cheeks not pale as they were yesterday; and lips redder still; and she says, “Papa, papa, won’t you come to breakfast? The tea is—” What the precise state of the tea is I don’t know—none of us ever shall—for here she says, “Oh, Mr. Firmin!” and makes a courtesy.

To which remark Philip replied, “Miss Baynes, I hope you are very well this morning, and not the worse for yesterday’s rough weather.”

“I am quite well, thank you,” was Miss Baynes’s instant reply. The answer was not witty, to be sure; but I don’t know that under the circumstances she could have said any thing more appropriate. Indeed, never was a pleasanter picture of health and good-humor than the young lady presented: a difference more pleasant to note than Miss Charlotte’s face pale from the steamboat on Saturday, and shining, rosy, happy, and innocent in the cloudless Sabbath morn.

“TINTELLERIES, BOULOGNE SUR-MER, “WEDNESDAY, August 24, 18—.

“DEAREST EMILY,—After suffering more dreadfully in the two hours’ passage from Folkestone to this place than I have in four passages out and home from India, except in that terrible storm off the Cape, in September, 1824, when I certainly did suffer most cruelly on board that horrible troop-ship, we reached this place last Saturday evening, having a full determination to proceed immediately on our route. Now, you will perceive that our minds are changed. We found this place pleasant, and the lodgings besides most neat, comfortable, and well found in every thing, more reasonable than you proposed to get for us at Tours, which I am told also is damp, and might bring on the general’s jungle fever again. Owing to the hooping-cough having just been in the house, which, praised be mercy, all my dear ones have had it, including dear baby, who is quite well through it, and recommended sea air, we got this house more reasonable than prices you mention at Tours. A whole house: little room for two boys; nursery; nice little room for Charlotte, and a den for the general. I don’t know how ever we should have brought our party safe all the way to Tours. Thirty-seven articles of luggage, and Miss Flixby, who announced herself as perfect French governess, acquired at Paris—perfect, but perfectly useless. She can’t understand the French people when they speak to her, and goes about the house in a most bewildering way. I am the interpreter; poor Charlotte is much too timid to speak when I am by. I have rubbed up the old French which we learned at Chiswick at Miss Pinkerton’s; and I find my Hindostanee of great help: which I use it when we are at a loss for a word, and it answers extremely well. We pay for lodgings, the whole house — francs per month. Butchers’ meat and poultry plentiful but dear. A grocer in the Grande Rue sell excellent wine at fifteenpence per bottle; and groceries pretty much at English prices. Mr. Blowman at the English chapel of the Tintelleries has a fine voice, and appears to be a most excellent clergyman. I have heard him only once, however, on Sunday evening, when I was so agitated and so unhappy in my mind that I own I took little note of his sermon.

“The cause of that agitation you know, having imparted it to you in my letters of July, June, and 24th of May, ult. My poor simple, guileless Baynes was trustee to Mrs. Dr. Firmin, before she married that most unprincipled man. When we were at home last, and exchanged to the 120th from the 99th, my poor husband was inveigled by the horrid man into signing a paper which put the doctor in possession of all his wife’s property; whereas Charles thought he was only signing a power of attorney, enabling him to receive his son’s dividends. Dr. F., after the most atrocious deceit, forgery, and criminality of every kind, fled the country; and Hunt and Pegler, our solicitors, informed us that the general was answerable for the wickedness of this miscreant. He is so weak that he has been many and many times on the point of going to young Mr. F. and giving up every thing. It was only by my prayers, by my commands, that I have been enabled to keep him quiet; and, indeed, Emily, the effort has almost killed him. Brandy repeatedly I was obliged to administer on the dreadful night of our arrival here.

“For the first person we met on landing was Mr. Philip Firmin, with a pert friend of his, Mr. Pendennis, whom I don’t at all like, though his wife is an amiable person like Emma Fletcher of the Horse Artillery: not with Emma’s style, however, but still amiable, and disposed to be most civil. Charlotte has taken a great fancy to her, as she always does to every new person. Well, fancy our state on landing, when a young gentleman calls out, ‘How do you do, general?’ and turns out to be Mr. Firmin! I thought I should have lost Charles in the night. I have seen him before going into action as calm, and sleep and smile as sweet, as any babe. It was all I could do to keep up his courage: and, but for me, but for my prayers, but for my agonies, I think he would have jumped out of bed, and gone to Mr. F. that night, and said, ‘Take every thing I have.’

“The young man I own has behaved in the most honorable way. He came to see us before breakfast on Sunday, when the poor general was so ill that I thought he would have fainted over his tea. He was too ill to go to church, where I went alone, with my dear ones, having, as I own, but very small comfort in the sermon: but oh, Emily, fancy, on our return, when I went into our room, I found my general on his knees with his Church service before him, crying, crying like a baby! You know I am hasty in my temper sometimes, and his is indeed an angel’s—and I said to him, ‘Charles Baynes, be a man, and don’t cry like a child!’ ‘Ah,’ says he, ‘Eliza, do you kneel, and thank God too;’ on which I said that I thought I did not require instruction in my religion from him or any man, except a clergyman, and many of these are but poor instructors, as you know.

“‘He has been here,’ says Charles; when I said, ‘Who has been here?’ ‘That noble young fellow,’ says my general; ‘that noble, noble Philip Firmin.’ Which noble his conduct I own it has been. ‘While you were at church he came again—here into this very room, where I was sitting, doubting and despairing, with the Holy Book before my eyes, and no comfort out of it. And he said to me, “General, I want to talk to you about my grandfather’s will. You don’t suppose that because my father has deceived you and ruined me, I will carry the ruin farther, and visit his wrong upon children and innocent people?” Those were the young man’s words,’ my general said; and,

'oh, Eliza!' says he, 'what pangs of remorse I felt when I remembered we had used hard words about him,' which I own we had, for his manners are rough and haughty, and I have heard things of him which I do believe now can't be true.

"All Monday my poor man was obliged to keep his bed with a smart attack of his fever. But yesterday he was quite bright and well again, and the Pendennis party took Charlotte for a drive, and showed themselves most polite. She reminds me of Mrs. Tom Fletcher of the Horse Artillery, but that I think I have mentioned before. My paper is full; and with our best to MacWhirter and the children, I am always my dearest Emily's affectionate sister,

"ELIZA BAYNES."

POSSUM HUNTING.

THE first, and last time save one, that I ever went "possum hunting," was when a boy of about fourteen years on a visit to my maternal uncle residing in the upper part of Georgia. Our party was four in number, consisting of a young man named Poole, about eighteen or twenty, an old negro man named Sawney, and a negro boy about my own age.

Provided with fat lightwood torches, and accompanied by a good possum dog to tell us by his deep baying when the "varmint" had taken to a tree, we sallied forth in high spirits immediately after supper. Nor was it long before we had the satisfaction to hear his signal echoing through the forest and re-echoing in a neighboring swamp. Proceeding at a quick pace to the spot, we soon discovered the bright eyes and badger-like hair of the "varmint" in the top of a small tree, while the dog was now seated upon his haunches, whining with satisfaction at our approach, only giving an occasional short bark as he turned his head upward to look at his victim. The tree was a small one, and two of our party attempted to shake down the animal, seated in apparent comfort among its branches, grinning and growling savagely at us as we endeavored to shake him from his perch. A novice at the game of hunting coons and possums, I expected to see it flirited in a moment from the little oak-tree. But I was sadly disappointed. For when one foot lost its hold it clung to the branch by another, and finally, as if defying all our united efforts, swung by its tail, coiled several times around the small limb of the tree.

"Ah, Massa Poole!" said the experienced old negro, "dar's no manner ob use in tryin' to shake down a possum! He'll mek you b'liebe he tired, and jest ready fur drap into your hand, when he no tired t'all! Better cut um down at once."

This suggestion was adopted. No sooner was the tree felled than the dog pounced upon his victim, but was beaten off with blows and kicks by the old negro. The animal seemed already quite dead and limber, as if its body had been crunched and broken by the strong teeth of the cur. But to make sure work Poole took the possum from the old negro's hand, and gave it several hard blows with the butt-end of his gun. Our work being over at that spot, the game was lifted from the ground, and we continued our pursuit in quest of further sport.

But although our beginning was a good one, not so the ending. On and on we trudged through many a brake and brier, and mud and water, until we became so tired by our continued walking for several hours that we resolved to return home. But this soon proved to be as vain a hope as catching any more possums; and after walking and searching in vain for some mode of egress from the swamp until two or three hours past midnight, we all concluded that we were lost, and could not find our way home until the morning dawned.

As I have before stated, we had got into the dense and boggy swamp, covered in places with a greenish slime which concealed the black mud beneath, and afforded shelter for many a huge moccasin. It was dangerous to tread upon this soft mud. It was necessary to move slowly, once you had left the outer edge, often leaping from one root, or stump, or log to another. This process required both caution and activity to avoid slipping into the slimy fen, from which we could extricate ourselves with great difficulty, if at all, by rendering each other mutual assistance. For there were spots so moist and yielding that one must sink so deep into the mire as to be speedily suffocated in the slimy soil, or drowned in the stagnant waters which, like a green veil, concealed the hideous deformities beneath their surface. And besides this, who could tell but that in his fall he would wake up the smouldering ire of some huge moccasin, whose bite is as deadly as that of the rattlesnake, who gives its victim no warning, but stings quickly and under the security of concealment, and then silently creeps away. The very thought that at every step there was perhaps lying in its dismal retreat the assassin-serpent of the South, stretched at lazy length, and ready at a moment's warning to inflict its fatal bite—the bare idea of such a possibility is enough to chill the heart with horror. But when the probability, and, in our case, the almost certainty, stared us in the face, and when now and then we could see a monster swamp-moccasin, nearly as large as a man's thigh, creeping away at our approach, and shunning the blaze of our torches, it was enough to make us tremble with apprehension.

We had been picking our way with extreme caution for some time, when, as old Sawney, our leader and pilot, was about to step upon what seemed to be a black log lying just before him, he drew back his foot in sudden alarm, and cried out, in a terrified voice,

"Oh, my God! Massa Poole! look yere! My God! Massa Poole! 'tis de berry debble herself!"

He had nearly placed his foot upon a large alligator lying in his pathway at full length before him! The monster had evidently placed himself there in ambush in expectation of his prey! For, as it was subsequently proved to our amazement, we had several times passed that way—our footprints proved this—so that the monster must have very recently crawled to the spot, and, by assuming that motionless and impassive attitude, hoped to pass himself upon our credulity as an old black log which had been lying imbedded in the soft mud for untold ages.

No sooner did Poole perceive the alligator than he fired both barrels at the creature, who had no idea of moving from position or stirring a single muscle until he had felt the pressure of old Sawney's foot upon his back, and was thus certain of his prey. The gun was loaded with large-sized buck-shot, and told upon the alligator with deadly effect. But just as he fired, an owl, scared from its perch hard by at the deafening report of the gun, flew past us, and with one of its broad, blackish wings struck the torch from old Sawney's hand. We were thus, suddenly and in a single moment, enveloped by thick and horrible darkness—"a darkness which could be felt!" And there we were compelled to stand, fearing to move an inch from our tracks; for the alligator was still flouncing and splashing around the muddy waters, and we could distinctly hear the occasional hiss of a moccasin disturbed from its slumbers, or compelled to move from its own secret place of ambush by the convulsive death-throes of the aquatic monster who ruled the swamp as monarch of all the reptiles around him. But by-and-by his struggles ceased, and all was still and silent as the grave. Our awe and terror increased still more by the silence and the terrific gloom which appalled our spirits.

"Sawney!" said Poole, in a terrified whisper, as if afraid lest his words should be heard and understood by the inhabitants of the swamp, who might rise up en masse to hinder our further progress and prevent our escape.

"I yeres you, massa! I be listenin' berry 'tentive to you!" replied the old negro, in a low voice.

"What shall we do now, Sawney?"

"Well, massa! I 'spect I will hab to trust in God, and feel down in dis 'ere mud fur de fat lightwood, or stay still in our tracks till de mornin' come. Dem's de only two tings I can tink on. Berry bad fix, massa! You oughten to shoot so quick, massa, till I bin hide de torch from de owl. But 'what can't be cured must be indured,' as de good book say! I reckon I must run de resk of gettin' bit by de moccasin!" And stooping down the old man found the extinguished torch, which was soon relighted from the portable fire which he always carried with him.

The torch again relighted, it was determined to retrace our steps, and regain, if possible, the only dry knoll which we had encountered in our peregrinations. Our return was made with the same degree of caution, and when we reached the only terra firma which we had encountered for several hours—the knoll which we had twice visited and twice left behind us—our entire party hailed its appearance with a shout. The heart of Columbus did not beat with more rapturous joy when his look-out man cried out, "Land! land!" from the masthead, than did ours when we espied once more the spot whose comparative dryness invited us to spend upon its leafy surface the remainder of the night.

A fire was speedily built, and our entire party threw themselves upon the ground, forming a circle around the jovial blaze. But while the others slept I could not; and it was well, too, that my state of mental excitement kept me awake; for otherwise we would have lost our possum. Sawney had thrown it down by his side, supposing that it was quite dead. But either it had feigned death or was revived by the warmth of the fire, and began stealthily to creep away from its now sleeping captors. But he got no sympathy from old Sawney; for as I touched the old man, who, unlike the rest, slept in a sitting posture, dreaming and nodding over the fire as it burned lower and lower, until a single blaze flickered and flared up now and then, the old fellow raised his head and gave a low grunt. I pointed with my hand toward the fugitive creeping away slowly and stealthily as a cat creeps toward a bird. The old man understood my signal, and in a moment was upon his feet, and seizing the animal by the tail, exclaimed,

"Ah, ha! you good for nuttin' 'ceitful tief! You try to fool me?. Berry well! I see if I can't stop dem tricks." And pulling out his jack-knife, he did what he should have done before—cut the animal's throat, singed off all its hair over the fire, and took out its heart and viscera.

"Dere now! You is ready fur de pot, I reckon! Dat's de only place whar you can't come to life. You is den jist like de poor sinner when he is cast into debble's hot hole! De sinner can fool de ole debble, massa, and git out ob his clutches as long as he is in dis world; but when de debble put him into his big pot, and he begin to stew and to fry, ah, massa! den it be too late! De debble got um den too fast fur 'scape! Same like me now got dis possum swinged and ready fur de pot!

"And, massa," continued the old fellow, "while we's talkin' 'bout religion, I'll tell you 'zactly what I tink. Now you see, massa, we all make a berry great 'scape from sudden death to-night, tank de good Lord!—berry great 'scape, massa! And it was all de good Lord's doin's, massa! Ef He hadn't said to poor nigger's heart jest in time, 'Sawney, look what you 'bout! look whar you gwine to put your foot! dat's no log, Sawney!' please God, massa, Sawney's foot would a bin snapped off in a jiffy, same like glass. And den, massa, sure as fate, ef Sawney didn't git killed outright by de mean, stinkin' cuss, he would sartin to be drowned in de mud. But, massa, de good Lord is ebery where—in de swamp as well as in de 'pine-barren,' on land as well as on de big sea. De same God dat takes care ob de white buckra tinks 'pon de poor nigger too.

"Now Massa Poole and me don't 'gree togedder on de subject ob religion. Massa Poole's farer, and him too, is a Metterdist, and I is a Hard-shell Baptist. Massa Poole b'liebs in 'fallin' from grace,' but I b'liebs in de 'final pusseverance ob de saints.' Now I will 'lustrate dat to your onderstandin' by dis same possum when he was alive. Berry well! You see de possum in de tree; you shake de tree; you shake um, and you shake um. De possum let go one foot, den anurrer one; den tree foot. Now you tink you most got um! Ah, ha! you say; now I got you! You shake de tree 'gain, and de possum let go all his four foot. Tank God! I got you now! you say. You look on de ground—you no see de possum. Ky! you say; way de possum gone so quick? You look all round in de bush to see way he hide—you no find um. You look up in de tree, and please God, massa! you see um hangin' by de tail, laughin' at you same like white buckra laugh at poor nigger!

"Well, massa! jest so wid 'fullin' from grace' and de 'final pusseverance ob de saints.' You see de ole debble come to de Christian. Mebbe he high up in de tree, on de berry top ob de cross. De ole debble shake de cross; he trow stones; he hit um on de foot, on de hand, in de head! De Christian sin one time, two time, tree time. At last he sin one big sin. De debble trip um up now! He git poor Christian down flat in de mud! He beat um and beat um wid his big stick, till he tink poor Christian dead and nebber can git up any more! All poor Christian's friends gib um up for dead too; for de debble goes to dem and fools 'em. He tell 'em all, 'No use to pray for him any more, for he's nottin' more dan a rottin, stinkin' carcase! He's pisoned wid de gall and bitterness ob sin! You nebber will see your friend in hebben, for he b'longs to me now!'

"Well, massa! de debble goes away, and lef de poor Christian right dere; for he ain't got no time to stay dere to watch him, and he so greedy he want to catch heap ob sinners to put 'em all in his pot at one time. He want to hab stew, and roast, and brile all togedder! 'Cause he know berry well he can't hunt for no more poor sinner arter dis world close. Well! he lef poor Christian in de mud, and go off 'bout his bizzness; for Satan got heap o' bizzness, massa! Well! jest den, when all hope gone, de poor Christian, like de Prodigal Son, come to hisself. Like de possum, he open one eye fust, den he open de odder eye, and look round. He see now; and by de grace ob God he crawl out ob de ditch on his hands and knees. And although he's bruised and sore, and can hardly creep along, and may be for a long time 'fore he can 'tand up 'traight as he used to could, yet arter a while he gits back to de berry top ob de cross! And de top ob de cross, massa, is berry high—for it reaches clean up to hebben!

"Well, God bless you, massa, for listenin' to a poor old nigger!" said the good old man; and then he cried out, in a joyous tone, "De day is breakin', Massa Poole! and please God! dere's our own home fence, and we ain't been lost at all when we fust git to dis place! Why, massa! if we had jist gone ten steps more dis way we would a bin in de ole field!"

It was even so. We had been going round in a circle for several hours. But it gave us cause for gratitude to God for the manifestation of his providence; and perhaps many of our readers will say there is much of sound theology in old Sawney's lecture on "Falling from Grace" and the "Final Perseverance of the Saints."

THE COUNTERSIGN.

ALAS! the weary hours pass slow,
The night is very dark and still,
And in the marshes far below
I hear the bearded whip-poor-will.
I scarce can see a yard ahead,
My ears are strained to catch each sound;
I hear the leaves about me shed,
And the springs bubbling through the ground.

Along the beaten path I pace,
Where white rags mark my sentry's track,
In formless shrubs I seem to trace
The foeman's form with bending back.
I think I see him crouching low,
I stop and list—I stoop and peer—
Until the neighboring hillocks grow
To groups of soldiers far and near.

With ready piece I wait and watch,
Until mine eyes, familiar grown,
Detect each harmless earthen notch,
And turn guerrillas into stone.
And then amid the lonely gloom,
Beneath the weird old tulip trees,
My silent marches I resume,
And think on other times than these.

Sweet visions through the silent night!
The deep bay-windows fringed with vine;
The room within, in softened light,
The tender, milk-white hand in mine,
The timid pressure, and the pause
That oftentimes overcame our speech—
That time when by mysterious laws
We each felt all in all to each.

And then, that bitter, bitter day,
When came the final hour to part,
When clad in soldier's honest gray,
I pressed her weeping to my heart.
Too proud of me to bid me stay,
Too fond of me to let me go,
I had to tear myself away,
And left her stolid in her woe.

So rose the dream—so passed the night—
When distant in the darksome glen,
Approaching up the sombre height,
I heard the solid march of men;
Till over stubble, over sward,
And fields where lay the golden sheaf,
I saw the lantern of the guard
Advancing with the night relief.

"Halt! who goes there?" my challenge cry:
It rings along the watchful line.

"Relief!" I hear a voice reply.
"Advance, and give the countersign!"
With bayonet at the charge, I wait,
The corporal gives the mystic spell;
With arms at port I charge my mate,
And onward pass, and all is well.

But in the tent that night awake,
I think, if in the fray I fall,
Can I the mystic answer make
Whene'er the angelic sentries call?
And pray that Heaven may so ordain,
That when I near the camp divine,
Whether in travail or in pain,
I too may have the countersign.

CAMP CAMERON, July, 1861.

THE POT OF GOLD.

THE sun flung wide its golden arms
Above the dripping woods of Maine,
And wove across the misty sky
The seven-dyed ribbon of the rain.

An old wife at the cottage door
Sat with her grandson by her knee,
And watched the rainbow belt the clouds
And span the world from sea to sea.

Then, in that quiet evening hour,
The wondering boy a tale she told—
How he who sought the rainbow's foot
Would find beneath a pot of gold.

The eager boy drank in the tale—
His eyes were filled with feverish fire;
And in his fluttering heart there leaped
A wild, impulsive, vague desire.

And as the gorgeous sun went down,
And from the skies the mists were rolled,
He stole with hurrying step away
To seek the wondrous pot of gold.

Through lonesome woods with whispering leaves,
That sung an endless forest hymn,
Where shadowy cat-birds wailed unseen,
And squirrels leaped from limb to limb,

By rivers thundering to the sea,
By ragged hill and gloomy glen,
Through swamps where slept the sluggish air,
And by the pleasant homes of men,

The strange boy wandered night and day,
His eyes still filled with quenchless fire;
While still within his heart there grew
That wild, impulsive, vague desire.

Men marveled as he passed them by
With weary step and lagging pace;
And women, as they saw him, sighed
In pity for his child-like face.

And many asked why thus he went
O'er hill and flood, through heat and cold;
While he the steadfast answer made,
"I go to seek the pot of gold."

Then people smiled, and told the boy
That many a youth that quest had tried,
And some had fainted by the way,
And some had sought the end and died.

For never had the mystic goal
By any human foot been trod;
The secret of the rainbow's base
Was known but to its builder—God.

He heard, but heeded not. His eyes
Were fixed upon the horizon's brim.
What mattered to him others' fate,
'Twas not the fate in store for him.

And still the rainbow came and went,
And scarf-like hung about the sun;
And still the seeker's restless soul
Sang of the treasure to be won.

So went the time—till one dark day,
When flesh and blood could bear no more,
Haggard and pale he fainting fell
Close by the well-known cottage door.

VOL. XXIII.—NO. 135.—C c

With quivering lips he told his tale;
The pitying tears above him fell;
Once more around his couch he heard
The voice of those he loved so well.

And soon a modest, mild-eyed man,
With quiet voice stood at his side,
Telling a sweet, entrancing tale
Of One who suffered and who died.

And talked about a treasure, too,
Through pain and suffering to be won;
One that beyond the rainbow lay—
Ay, and beyond the parent sun.

As the boy heard the simple words,
From out his eyes the fierce fire fled,
And straight an unseen presence wove
A calmer splendor round his head.

And so his young life ebbed away;
His heart was still, his limbs were cold;
But by the smile upon his face,
They knew he'd found the pot of gold!

THE CONFIDANTE.

I DO not know whether there is any thing peculiar about me or not—I have sometimes had misgivings on that point. Be that as it may, I have always had a faculty of attracting toward me not only persons of my own sex but of the opposite, and of becoming the recipient of their confidence in a way that was often both fatiguing and annoying. But although I have had many intimate and warm friends among my male acquaintances, and had reason to think many admirers, yet I must own there were few, if any, who could be called lovers. I never could divine precisely the reason why it was so, for I was young, not ill-looking, had a handsome little fortune of my own; but, somehow, although I have listened to many a love tale, and shed tears of sympathy with those with whom the course of true love was not seeking a new channel wherein to flow smoothly and placidly, but was rushing along in the old way, over obstacles and impediments that sometimes threatened to prove insurmountable—although, as I say, I have listened to many a piteous love tale, I never was the moving cause of all these distresses. Love-sick, lackadaisical school-girls used to bring me their ill-written, oftentimes misspelled missives to decipher, and frequently to answer; and though I have penned the most heart-rending accounts of the cruelty of obdurate mothers and hard-hearted fathers, the answers were never directed to my address.

I could not pretend to enumerate how many love-sick swains have sighed in my ears of their dulcineas, who so excelled all the Venuses and Cleopatras that ever existed in poet's imaginations or in reality. Half of them, I must confess, appeared to me very commonplace sort of bodies; and even with all my most earnest desire to be a good listener and sympathizer, I could not force myself to regard them in the exalted light represented.

My school-days were long since over; I was past twenty-five, and still faithful to my vocation of listener and confidante; I had classified all my female acquaintances into Hebes, Venuses, Cleopatras, according to their size, style, and complexions. Many of the Hebes and goddesses had settled down into very matter-of-fact matrons, and were the happy mothers of little roly-poly pledges. One of my Cleopatras had married a widower for his money, and had become a sickly, disappointed, slatternly housekeeper, whom I invariably found, if I chanced to make a morning visit, with her hair uncombed in curl papers, lounging on a sofa with the last new novel, or lamenting over her ill-health and the trials of housekeeping. The old love tales were interspersed now with complaints of the dishonesty of servants and the woes of an ill-regulated and ill-kept household; and, the most painful of all, the want of sympathy and appreciation on the part of him who before marriage had been so enraptured, but who now failed to perceive the surpassing charms of this, his enslaver; and in fact I could not wonder at his disenchantment, for she invariably gave me the impression of a worn-out waxen doll, whose limp and bedraggled finery, faded cheeks, and despoiled flaxen ringlets could no longer attract the admiration of the juveniles of whom it had once been the crowning joy—for which they had quarreled, fought, and struggled, and had cast idly by, after the brief delight of possession had passed away.

These angels and goddesses had been so often reproduced that they were stereotyped on my brain. I felt as if I could manufacture and turn them off by the gross; and yet, by some infatuation, I was unable to break the spell that compelled me to listen.

The moment a lover approached me I was spell-bound, and as much compelled to hearken as if to the tale of the Ancient Mariner. Something in his glittering eye exercised a sort of power from which I could not withdraw myself, and I listened with my bodily ears, without any personal interest, until the tale was done.

Once—ah! that well-remembered once!—did the kindling eye and burning words of love and passion stir my sluggish pulses, give to my benumbed and half-wakeful senses the impression that I myself—pretty little, quiet, comfortable, well-to-do “fore-handed,” as the country people called me—Laura Simms, was the object as well as subject of all these confessions. It was some time before I was fully awake to the marvelous fact, and longer still before my sluggish pulses throbbed with answering joy to the blissful assurance of being at last truly loved. It stole upon me under the guise of friendship, gratitude, brotherly affection. The low-breathed tone of sympathy—the softened glance of the dark, piercing eyes—the gentle pressure of the hand, at first almost unperceived—the kindly, winning voice that whispered only, but in never-to-be-forgotten cadences—“My sister!”

Ah, that awakening! How can I describe the flutterings of the newly-aroused consciousness, the faint glimmerings, the dawning of the broad gleam of sunshine and happiness that lit up my whole existence!

I had never been aware of the sombre cloud that had surrounded me, but now I awoke to another life. I pondered over my newly-found felicity, but had no disposition to bestow my confidence on another; but I felt that the leaden dullness of existence was gone, and I could listen with living ears, with a soul to the outpourings of a nature stirred to its inmost depths as mine was now. I had not long to wait. I was aroused from my pleasing reveries by the entrance of a charming young friend whom I knew, by the sweet flutter of her address, had come to make me the depositary of another love secret.

There was no particular depth or strength of character, in fact nothing remarkable about her, except her beauty and the sweetness of her disposition; but I saw that something had touched a new spring, and she found revealed in her soul the strange and mystic lore which has puzzled wiser and more philosophic heads than her own dainty little one that drooped so tenderly under the wand of the mighty magician whose spell she owned. It was the old, old story.

“He was so noble! so good! so true! she could trust him with all her heart—she was so sure of his love; he could never deceive her. But there were obstacles; he had not told her what they were. Ah! she did not ask, she did not wish to know; she could trust and wait—her dear, dear Jabez!”

Jabez! Jabez! that was the name of my beloved. It wasn't a very romantic or poetical name, and it had an unpleasant significance which occurred to me broadly at that precise moment—“One who causes pain!” but Jabez! Jabez! it rang in my ear; it was Jabez who had shed a light and lustre on my hitherto uneventful life, and I could readily believe and sympathize with the young creature before me there might be another Jabez who could shed light and lustre on another life; so I lent a keener ear to my pretty Minny's sweet avowals of his plighted faith, her own deep, confiding love.

I saw how her gentle life-threads were entwined with his who had become the centre and light of her existence. She reminded me of a little bird who sits poised upon the swaying bough and pours out its sweet love-notes, and hails with rapturous song the coming season of happiness and hope. I could not find it in my heart to dim one joy by doubt or painful thought of the obstacles he mentioned, and so I listened as she caroled forth her little lay of blissful anticipations, until both were startled by a sudden and impressive ringing of the door-bell.

Minny sprang up, her face suffused with blushes, as if she thought her secret might be divined, and with a hasty kiss and “I'll come soon again and tell you all about him, and his name,” made her escape through the back porch.

The door opened, and Emma Clifton, a young widow and a dear friend of my school-days, entered.

“Why, Laura, I need not ask you how you are this morning, for you look as though you had discovered some elixir that can rejuvenate, almost recreate, you seem so fresh and young. You appear to have found out some new inner life. Heigh-ho! you are to be envied, you are always so quiet and happy, and never tormented with love affairs, and doubts and difficulties. Heigh-ho!"

She sighed again so drearily, and threw herself down into a large easy chair with a pettish, dissatisfied, yet really troubled air that made me feel sure there was something more than usual the matter.

"What's the trouble? what's amiss now?" I inquired, with more interest apparent in my manner than was my wont. She opened her eyes as much as to say, "Why really you are wide awake for once," but went on.

"That's just what I've come to talk to you about; but I can not begin," she said, coloring slightly with embarrassment. "Well," I said, "another love affair, I suppose; come tell me all, and you will be relieved."

"No, telling isn't the thing that will relieve my present dilemma. I have promised to marry one man, whom I do not love, to please my relations, and I wish to marry another, whom I do love, to please myself."

"But," I said, "why did you embarrass yourself thus to please your friends? You, who are rich and independent, might surely have suited yourself in a matter of such vital consequence. Ah! did I not know and realize for the first time of how much consequence?"

"But then you commence with mistakes Nos. 1 and 2. I am not rich, you perceive, but am dependent upon the bounty of these friends. The estate of my late husband has yielded me, as yet, nothing but the éclat of being a rich widow, which I have found a most inadequate means of keeping up the style and state of former times. My adorer, whom you must know, I shrewdly suspect of being more attracted by the fame of my fortune and expectations than enamored of my personal charms, I said, au commencement, must take his chance; if that is his object, he must run his own risks. My dear relations," she added, scornfully, "will not allow me to reject 'so fine an offer'—'such a rising man'—'so good a match!' for a little high-flown sentiment, 'and a widow too! it is altogether too absurd.' And, on the other hand, I have a secret inclination to punish his double-dealing, for I more than suspect, in fact I know he loves another who is not rich, and he intends to sacrifice his love, and perhaps her peace of mind, to his avarice and ambition, so that I do not feel that he is entitled to my respect or forbearance, and do not hold myself in honor bound to tell him his mistake. But again, he whom I really and truly love has no fortune, and I have told him that I have none; but he loves me all the same, and offers me an humble home, and an honest, faithful heart. To him my friends will not listen, I am sure, and indeed I have not spoken of him; they only surmise his love, and have endeavored to hasten forward the marriage with my first admirer, 'to prevent' my 'making a fool of myself,' as they politely and emphatically express themselves."

"But," I asked, "how could you, Emma, give your promise, loving one man, to marry another of whom you have such suspicions as you express to me?"

"Why, what a dear little innocent it is!" she replied, turning around and smoothing my cheek with her soft little palm.

"Can you not divine that I did not learn all this in a moment? In the first place, I didn't know that my Edward loved me; and the next, I was tired of dependence; and in the third, I did not know so surely that I despised my adorer."

"And what makes you so sure of that now?" I asked, half-amused at her distress.

"Oh! you matter-of-fact little Pagan, can not your imagination furnish any facts? Must I go through with all the vows of eternal devotion, the enchantment of my transcendental charms? Take it for granted that one and all were specified (except the length of my purse, which I believe he ought in honesty to have confessed was the chief and sole attraction); and being at the time under an especial attack of the blues—having had a stormy interview with my uncle in regard to my extravagance, and the number of my debts being duly paraded—and as I told you, in worse than doubt of the state of Edward's affections—so to save my adorer from despair and suicide, etc., I said yes—but repented in dust and ashes before the expiration of the next half hour, and with bitter lamentations and sorrow when I learned by an accident the secret of Edward's heart—how he had long and tenderly loved me before my marriage, but would not offer his poverty to the rich heiress lest his truth and devotion might be questioned.

"Distracted by a thousand conflicting emotions, I resolved to tell the truth and ask a release from my engagement; but scarcely had I opened my lips, when I was met by such an avalanche of protestations—such vows of love and despair, as a boy of nineteen might put into a sonnet—and before I had time to collect myself my uncle entered the room, looked at me sharply through his spectacles as if he suspected my intentions, and coolly took his seat and commenced a conversation in his blindest tones.

"Of course I had visions of unpaid bills, dependence, and the pleasing prospect of beggary before me, and retired discomfited.

"But the crowning point is yet to be told.

"Last night, at Mrs. Darlington's soiree, I had an interview with Edward; and my head and heart both aching, I made my escape to the dressing-room, and threw myself upon a couch, and held my throbbing temples to still the pain.

"I had not remained long when the sound of familiar voices arrested my attention. I heard the warmest vows of affection and devotion answered by low-breathed murmurs of answering love. He told his love; she confessed hers. He spoke of obstacles; she answered of her faith and trust, and all was at last sealed with a kiss long and fervent enough to plight a hundred troths."

"How could you listen, Emma Clifton?" I began.

"All very well for you to ask, my dear little innocent Laura; but I must own I felt slightly interested and curious to know how it would end, when I heard my affianced husband, Jabez Cressington, sealing his vows so convincingly to pretty little Minny Stafford."

"Jabez Cressington! Minny Stafford!" I repeated, in a tone so explosive that Emma started out of her seat with surprise at the unwonted empressment of manner so foreign to my quiet nature. It was the name of my own Jabez, dear reader, and I assure you the sudden shock startled me from my propriety.

I looked up from the complete overthrow of my chateau d'Espagne quite overwhelmed and bewildered, as one might amidst the dust and mortar of a more substantial fabric. I was in truth entirely swept from my resting-place, and can not adequately convey the impressions which possessed me at that moment. There was a ludicrous resemblance to the airy and baseless visions of the unwary milkmaid, and an odd commingling in my imagination of green gowns (not chosen with any special reference to my complexion it must be owned), eggs, unhatched chickens, spilled milk, and lost Jabezes that was certainly very confusing to a person of my quiet, unromantic, unimaginative temper, and systematic habits.

Emma's look of intense astonishment recalled me to myself. I had presence of mind enough left, and tact enough to so far control my scattered senses as to evade her evident curiosity by strong expressions of sympathy for Minny.

The rest of Emma's confidence I heeded not. I relapsed into my old way, and was simply the listening machine again, and she could not detect my secret in my manner.

That one delusion of my not very youthful fancy swallowed up all the romance of my life, and I quietly watch the advent of the gray hairs, and trace the crow's-feet upon my temples without flinching; and though the widower over the way has several times made feeling allusions to his own desolate state, and touchingly depicted the helpless, piteous condition of his four motherless children, I have always turned my listening ear (I mean the one on the machine side), and his words were so mixed up with the general confidences that I was ever after unable so to separate them as to make any particular application of them to my own case.

I shall die an old maid!

Emma Clifton arranged her affairs satisfactorily to herself, I suppose, for she married Edward.

Poor little Minny deserved a better fate than to become the wife of the selfish Jabez Cressington, and lose her identity in the shadow of his supreme vanity; but as women, like verbs, are made to do, to be, and to suffer, I believe she has fulfilled her mission. She is a pale, meek-eyed wife, having only the joys that such a woman could glean at the side of such a man.

UNITED STATES.

THE Thirty-seventh Congress met in extra Session on the 4th of July. In the Senate, from the Border States were present Messrs. Bayard and Saulsbury, from Delaware; Breckinridge and Powell, from Kentucky; Kennedy and Pearce, from Maryland; Polk, from Missouri; and Johnson, from Tennessee. The following new Members appeared: From Kansas, Messrs. Pomeroy and Lane, the former of whom drew the long, and the latter the short term; M'Dougall, from California; and Browning, from Illinois, chosen in place of the deceased Senator Douglas. At the opening of the session 43 Senators were present. Mr. Wilson gave notice that he should the next day offer a series of bills, the titles and main provisions of which are as follows:

1. "To confirm certain acts of the President for the suppression of insurrection and rebellion." This bill confirms and ratifies all the acts of the President in calling out the militia, increasing the military and naval force, and all the acts and proceedings incident thereto, rendering them as legal and valid as if done under the express authority of Congress previously conferred. It also authorizes the President, if during the recess of Congress hereafter, any dangerous combinations should arise, to call into the service of the United States such military and naval forces as he may deem necessary.

2. "To authorize the employment of Volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property." This bill authorizes the President to accept the services of volunteers in such numbers as he may deem necessary, for the purposes set forth in its title; and appropriates $300,000,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for this purpose. It prescribes the organization of these volunteers, the number of officers, and the pay of the men, which is in general to be the same as in the regular army, each volunteer also, when honorably discharged, to receive one hundred dollars, those wounded to be entitled to pensions, and the heirs of those killed to receive one hundred dollars, besides all arrears of pay and allowances.

3. "To increase the present Military Establishment of the United States." This bill provides for the addition to the present regular army of nine regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and one of artillery; the numbers of which are definitely prescribed. The enlistments in the regular army during the years 1861 and 1862 to be for three years, afterward for five years; the men enlisted to be entitled to the same allowances as those of the volunteer force.

4. "For the better organization of the Military Establishment." This bill provides for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War, and for various additions to the Adjutant General's, Quarter-master's, Engineers', Ordnance, and Medical departments of the army; for the appointment of Cadets in the Military Academy, and various other details of army regulations.

5. "For the organization of a Volunteer Militia force, to be called the National Guard of the United States." This important bill provides for a volunteer militia force of 240,000 rank and file, apportioned among the States in the proportion of their Representatives in Congress. It is to be composed of citizens, and those who have declared their intentions of becoming citizens, between the ages of 21 and 35. The Guard, or any part of it, may be called into the service of the United States by the President, in case of invasion or insurrection. Every member of the Guard to take an oath to defend the Constitution and laws of the United States, and obey the orders of the President. They are to be exempt from all other military duty, and from serving on juries, during their continuance in service.

A member may, after six years' service, receive a discharge, which shall exempt him from military service in time of peace. The uniform of each arm of the Guard to be the same throughout the United States, one suit to be furnished to each member. Of these 240,000 men, 80,000 are to be enrolled within one year, a like number in two and three years. The bill makes minute provisions for the enrollment and discipline of the Guard.

6. "To promote the efficiency of the Army." This bill provides that any commissioned officer who has served forty years may, at his own request, be placed on the retired list, with pay and allowances; and that any officer who shall become disabled or incapable of discharging his duties may, upon his own request or by direction of the President, after due medical investigation, be placed on the retired list, with pay and allowance as specified in the act.

Mr. Chandler gave notice that he should introduce a bill to confiscate the property of Governors, Members of Legislatures, Judges, and Military Officers above the rank of Lieutenant, who should be guilty of treason, or of aiding and abetting it; disqualifying them from holding any office of trust or emolument.

In the House 159 Members were present, including five from Northwestern Virginia. The Clerk called the names of the members elected from South Carolina, Arkansas, and Florida, who of course were not present. For Speaker, Messrs. Colfax, Blair, and Grow had been named on the Republican side. Mr. Colfax declined before the ballot commenced, being unwilling to delay the organization by a triangular contest. As the first ballot advanced it appeared that there would be no majority, although Mr. Grow had a plurality. Mr. Blair then requested his friends to change their votes from him to Mr. Grow, so that a choice might be made at once. This was done, and the result was that Mr. Grow was elected by a vote of 99; for Mr. Blair 11 votes were given; for Mr. Crittenden 12; the remainder were scattering. Hon. Emerson Etheridge, late Member of the House from Tennessee, was elected Clerk.

The President's Message is brief, confining itself wholly to the matter on account of which the extra Session of Congress was called. It begins by explaining the position in which the Administration found itself upon coming into office. In six States the functions of the Government, with the exception of the Post-office Department, were suspended. Forts, arsenals, arms, and public property in these States had been seized; the Confederate States had organized, and were invoking recognition and aid from foreign powers. The Administration had to prevent, if possible, a dissolution of the Federal Union, and a choice of means was to be made. The policy chosen was developed in the Inaugural Address. It looked to the exhaustion of all peaceful measures before resorting to stronger ones. The proceedings relating to Fort Sumter are clearly explained. The Government wished to retain it, not for aggression, but merely to maintain visible possession, and thus to preserve the Union from actual and immediate dissolution, trusting to time, discussion, and the ballot-box for a final adjustment. The enemy assailed and reduced the fort for the reverse object, to drive out the visible authority of the Federal Union, and force it to an immediate dissolution:

"Then and thereby," says the President, "the assailants of the Government began the conflict of arms without a gun in sight or in expectancy to return their fire, save only the few in the fort sent to that harbor years before, for their own protection, and still ready to give that protection in whatever was lawful. In this act, discarding all else, they have forced upon the country the distinct issue—immediate dissolution or blood. And this issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy, a government of the people, by the same people, can or can not maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes. It presents the question whether discontented individuals, too few in numbers to control the administration according to the organic law in any case, can always, upon the pretenses made in this case or any other pretenses, or arbitrarily without any pretense, break up their government, and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth. It forces us to ask, 'Is there in all republics this inherent and fatal weakness?' Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?"

No choice was left but to call out the war power of the Government to resist the force employed for its destruction. The President proceeds to explain and justify the responsibilities which he assumed in calling out the volunteer army, declaring a blockade, and in certain cases suspending the writ of habeas corpus. Nothing, he thinks, has been done which exceeds the constitutional power of Congress to sanction, and he confidently anticipates a full indorsement of all his acts. The paragraph setting forth the means which the Administration asks to be put at its disposal, is as follows:

"It is now recommended that you give the legal means for making this contest a short and decisive one; that you place at the control of the Government for the work at least 400,000 men and $400,000,000. That number of men is about one-tenth of those of proper ages, within the regions where, apparently, all are willing to engage; and the sum is less than a twenty-third part of the money-value owned by the men who seem ready to devote the whole. A debt of $600,000,000 now is a less sum per head than was the debt of our Revolution, when we came out of that struggle, and the money-value in the country bears even a greater proportion to what it was then than does the population. Surely each man has as strong a motive now to preserve our liberties as each had then to establish them. A right result at this time will be worth more to the world than ten times the men and ten times the money. The evidence reaching us from the country leaves no doubt that the material for the work is abundant, and that it needs only the hand of legislation to give it legal sanction and the hand of the Executive to give it practical shape and efficiency. One of the greatest perplexities of the Government is to avoid receiving troops faster than it can provide for them; in a word, the people will save their Government, if the Government itself will do its part only indifferently well."

Some space is given in the Message to an argument against the right of a State, as such, to secede from the Union, and other points of interest, which our space will not allow us to epitomize. The following paragraph develops the policy proposed by the Administration after the suppression of the insurrection:

"Lest there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the Southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the laws, and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government relatively to the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution, than that expressed in the Inaugural Address. He desires to preserve the Government, that it may be administered for all as it was administered by the men who made it."

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury is devoted to an elaborate exposition of the sum required to be raised and of the means of procuring it. The general result is that for the ensuing fiscal year the sum, in round numbers, of 320 millions of dollars must be raised. Of this 80 millions, representing the ordinary expenses of the Government should be provided by imposts and taxation, and the remaining 240 millions should be provided for by loans. The existing tariff will fall far short of producing this 80 millions, and the Secretary proposes certain modifications, the most important of which are a tax of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound on brown sugar, 3 cents on clayed sugar, 4 cents on refined sugars, 6 cents per gallon on molasses, 5 cents per pound on coffee, 15 cents on black, and 20 cents on green tea. He estimates that with these modifications the tariff will produce 57 millions; from sales of public lands 3 millions will accrue, leaving 20 of the 80 millions to be furnished by taxation. A tax of one-eighth per cent. on the real and personal property of the whole country—of one-fifth per cent. on this property in the States not under insurrection—or of three-tenths per cent. on the real property alone in these States, would either of them produce more than the 20 millions required to be raised by direct taxation. The Secretary also suggests that the required sum may be raised by moderate taxes on stills and distilled liquors, on ale, beer, tobacco, bank-notes, carriages, silver-ware, jewelry, and legacies; and still further suggests that both methods—a tax on all property, and a special one on these luxuries may be combined. He also suggests that “the property of those engaged in insurrection, or in giving aid and comfort to the insurgents, may be properly made to contribute to the expenditures made necessary by their criminal misconduct.” He further suggests a reduction of 40 per cent. on salaries, the abolition of the franking privilege, and other retrenchments. In suggesting these various modes, whether singly or in combination, to the choice of Congress, the Secretary urges the paramount and absolute necessity of “making such full provision of the annual revenue as will manifest to the world a fixed purpose to maintain inviolate the public faith by the strictest fidelity to all public engagements.”—To supply the 240 millions required for extraordinary expenses, the Secretary recommends that a subscription be opened for “a national loan of not less than 100 millions to be issued in the form of treasury notes or exchequer bills, bearing an interest of $7\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., to be paid half-yearly, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after three years from date.” He says that “as the contest in which the Government is now engaged is a contest for national existence and the sovereignty of the people, it is evident that the means for prosecuting it with energy to a speedy and successful issue should be made, in the first instance at least, to the people themselves.” The proposed rate of interest, besides being equitable, is convenient for calculation, being one cent per day on fifty dollars, so that it is only necessary to know the number of days since the date of a note, or the last payment of interest, to determine at a glance the amount due upon it. The Secretary further recommends the issue, if necessary, of bonds for a sum not exceeding 100 millions, at an interest not exceeding seven per cent., payable after thirty years in London or at the Treasury of the United States. These, he thinks, will be easily negotiable at home and in foreign countries. In addition to the foregoing, he proposes an issue of treasury notes for \$10 or \$20 each, payable one year from date, to an amount not exceeding 50 millions, bearing interest at the rate of 3 65-100, exchangeable for Treasury notes; or, if found more convenient, issued without interest, and payable in coin. In either form, these notes would prove useful, if prudently used; but the greatest care will be required to prevent the issue from being degraded into an irredeemable paper currency.—The increase of the public debt is thus stated by the Secretary: July 1, 1860, it was \$64,769,000; Jan. 1, 1861, \$66,243,000; March 7, 1861, \$76,455,000; July 1, 1861, \$90,867,000.

—In view of the embarrassments to the collection of the revenue from the insurrection, the Secretary recommends that, when necessary, duties may be collected on shipboard or beyond the reach of obstruction from insurrection; and that the President be empowered to determine by proclamation or other notification, within what limits insurrection has attained such an ascendancy as to compel the total suspension of all commerce, and to establish by license such exceptions to that suspension as he may deem expedient.—The Secretary urges the passage of laws to carry into effect the various recommendations embodied in his Report.

The Report of the Secretary of War gives a list of the seizures made by the seceding States previous to the inauguration of the present Administration. It embraces revenue cutters betrayed by their commanders or overpowered by disloyal troops; the Government arsenals at Little Rock, Baton Rouge, Mount Vernon, Apalachicola, Augusta, Charleston, and Fayetteville; the ordnance dépôt at San Antonio, and all the other Government works in Texas, which served as the dépôts of immense stores of arms and ammunition; forts Macon, Caswell, Johnson, Clinch, Pulaski, Jackson, Marion, Barrancas, M'Kee, Morgan, Gaines, Pike, Macomb, St. Phillip, Livingston, Smith, and three at Charleston; Oglethorpe Barracks, Barrancas Barracks, New Orleans Barracks, Fort Jackson, on the Mississippi, the battery at Bienvenue, Dupre, and the works at Ship Island; the Custom-houses at New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, and other important points, containing vast amounts of Government funds; the branch Mints at New Orleans, Charlotte, and Dahlonega; the marine hospital at New Orleans; the public property in Texas, handed over by General Twiggs, who deprived the loyal men of his command of the means of transportation from the State. In contrast with this conduct of General Twiggs, honorable mention is made of the course of Major Anderson at Fort Sumter, Lieutenant Slemmer at Fort Pickens, and Lieutenant Jones at Harper's Ferry.—The proclamation of the 15th of April, calling for 73,391 men, was responded to by more than 80,000, who are now under arms, notwithstanding the refusal of the Governors of several States.—Under the proclamation of the 4th of May, calling for volunteers to serve during the war, 208 regiments have been accepted. The total force now in the field is thus stated:

Regulars and volunteers for three months and for the war	235,000
Add to this fifty-five regiments of volunteers for the war, accepted and not yet in service. .50,000
Add new regiments of regular army.....	25,000
	75,000
Total force now at command of Government.....	310,000
Deduct the three-months' volunteers	80,000
Force for service after the withdrawal of the three-months' men	230,000

For the maintenance of this force, in addition to appropriations already made for the year ending June 30, 1861, the following are the estimates:

Quarter-master's Department.....	$70,289,200.21
Subsistence Department.....	27,278,781.50
Ordnance Department	7,468,172.00
Pay Department.....	67,845,402.48
Adjutant-General's Department.....	408,000.00
Engineer Department.....	685,000.00
Topographical Engineer Department....	50,000.00
Surgeon-General's Department.....	1,271,841.00
Due States which have made advances for troops	10,000,000.00
Total.....	$185,296,397.19

By the advice of the General-in-Chief one half of the officers of the new regiments have been appointed from the regular army, and the other half from civil life. Of the civilians appointed to regimental commands, "all except one are either graduates of West Point or have before served with distinction in the field; and of the lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and first-lieutenants, a large proportion have been taken from the regular army and the volunteers now in service; while the second-lieutenants have been mainly created by the promotion of meritorious sergeants from the regular service." The volunteer system is commended by the Secretary; "experienced men, who have had ample opportunity to familiarize themselves with the condition of European armies, concede that in point of personnel this patriot-army is fully equal to the finest troops of the Old World." Special commendation is given to the manner in which some of the New England States have armed and equipped their quotas; this is attributed to the efficient home organization of the militia in those States.—The deficiency in arms and munitions, arising from the bad faith of those intrusted with their guardianship, has been in a great measure overcome. "The arms and ordnance supplied from our national armories compare favorably with the very best manufactured for foreign Governments. The celebrated Enfield rifle is a simple copy of the regular arm manufactured for many years at the Springfield Armory. Arrangements have been made to rifle a large portion of the smooth-bored cannon now on hand. Arms have also been procured from private manufacturers, equal in quality and not much higher in cost than those made in the national work-shops. It is recommended that our troops be supplied from these sources, instead of making purchases abroad.—The large disaffection of army officers is referred to. "The majority of these officers solicited and obtained a military education at the hands of the Government—a mark of special favor, conferred by the laws of Congress on only one in 70,000 inhabitants. At the National Military Academy they were received and treated as the adopted children of the republic. By the peculiar relations thus established, they virtually became bound, by more than ordinary obligations of honor, to remain faithful to their flag." In view of this, it is suggested that there must be a radical defect in the system of education pursued at the Military Academy.—The appointment of a Military tribunal is urged, to have jurisdiction only in places where the functions of the Federal courts are interrupted.—The report closes with a tribute to "the veteran General-in-Chief of the Army, for the constant and self-sacrificing devotion to the public service exhibited by him in this grave crisis."

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy furnishes a complete abstract of the condition of that Department. On the 4th of March the total number of vessels of all classes was ninety, designed to carry 2415 guns; excluding those unfinished, those not worthy of repair, and those used for store-ships, the available force was 69 vessels, with 1346 guns; of these 42, with 556 guns, were in commission, the remainder being dismantled or in ordinary, nearly all of them being on foreign stations. The Home Squadron consisted of 12 vessels, with 187 guns, only 4 of which, with 25 guns, being in Northern ports. Of the 69 vessels regarded as available for service, the sloop Levant was lost in the Pacific, the steamer Fulton was seized at Pensacola, and one frigate, two sloops, and a brig were burned at Norfolk; the other vessels destroyed at this place were considered worthless, and were not included in the list of available vessels. This left at the service of the Department 63 vessels carrying 1174 guns, all of which, with the exception of 4, with 153 guns, are or will soon be in commission. Nine steamers have been chartered, and 12 steamers and 3 sailing-vessels have been purchased, making the entire naval force in commission 82 vessels, with upward of 1100 guns. The squadron on the Atlantic coast, under command of Flag-officer Stringham, consists of 22 vessels, with 290 guns and 3300 men. The squadron in the Gulf of Mexico, under command of Flag-officer Mervine, consists of 21 vessels, with 282 guns and 3500 men. The East India, Mediterranean, Brazil, and African squadrons, with the exception of one vessel each, have been recalled; this will add to the force for service on the Atlantic coast and in the Gulf about 200 guns and 2500 men.—Since the 4th of March 259 naval officers have either resigned or been dismissed from service. But while so many officers have proved unfaithful, the crews have throughout proved faithful.—Besides the vessels purchased, the Department has contracted for building 23 steam gun-boats of about 500 tons burden, and has made preliminary arrangements for several larger and fleetier vessels; the work on the eight vessels ordered to be built at the last Session is now vigorously prosecuted.—The appropriations for the Navy Department, asked by the Secretary, amount to $30,609,000.

On the 9th of June General Butler sent a strong detachment from Hampton and Newport News to attack two Confederate posts at Little and Big Bethel, about eight miles distant. The regiments were to unite at a point about a mile and a half from Little Bethel. Colonel Bendix's New York regiment had reached the spot, and Colonel Townsend's Albany regiment were coming up just at daybreak, when they were mistaken for enemies and fired upon by Bendix's regiment. The error having been discovered a junction was effected, and the troops, commanded by General Pierce of Massachusetts, advanced upon Little Bethel, which was abandoned at their approach. They then marched toward Big Bethel. They encountered a masked battery, of which they had no knowledge. They attempted to take this without success, and after fighting an hour and a half retreated. The loss in this affair was 16 killed and 57 wounded. Among the killed were Captain Greble of the regular army, and Mr. Theodore Winthrop, one of the aids of General Butler. Of the 73 casualties in this action, 21 occurred by the firing upon each other of the New York regiments.—On the 17th General Schenck, with the First Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, left the camp at Alexandria, to make a reconnoissance along the Alexandria and Hampshire Railroad. Guards were placed at various points, taking off a great part of the force. Near Vienna the road, after passing a deep cut, makes a sharp curve. This point was commanded by a battery hastily erected by the Confederate troops, of the existence of which General Schenck was ignorant. As the cars containing the remaining Ohio companies approached the spot a fire was opened upon them, killing about 12 men. The troops retired, carrying their wounded with them.—Harper's Ferry was abandoned on the 15th of June by the Confederate troops, commanded by General Johnson. The public works were burned and the railroad bridges partially destroyed. The garrison, numbering about 12,000, retired upon Martinsburg.—The Savannah, of Charleston, the first privateer
